REPORT.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE H. H. ASQUITH, Q.C., M.P., SECRETARY OF STATE.

1. The terms of reference direct us to inquire into certain specified matters connected with prisons. They include :—

A.—Administration :

1. Appointment of deputy governors.
2. Appointment of warders in charge.

B.—Prisoners :

1. Classification :
   - (1.) Juveniles.
   - (2.) First offenders.
   - (3.) Habitual offenders.
2. Treatment :
   - (1.) Accommodation.
   - (2.) Association in cells.
   - (3.) Visits and communications.
   - (4.) Prison offences.
   - (5.) Prison labour.
   - (6.) Prison occupation generally.

2. These points relate to all prisoners confined in local and convict prisons, and under treatment; (5) and (6) are submitted to us with special reference to the moral and physical condition of the prisoners.

3. While we are directed to inquire into the general condition of prisoners, the terms of reference do not include a general inquiry into the working of the Prison Acts; nor do they specifically mention the administrative authority.

4. At the outset, therefore, we had to consider whether we should limit the inquiry to the consideration of the treatment of prisoners under the existing Acts; or whether we should take into review the Acts themselves and the authority by which they are administered. The limitation we found it impossible to make. The important questions submitted under "treatment" clearly suggested that we should not only examine into present conditions of prison administration, but should endeavour by inquiry to discover whether any and what better system and methods of treatment could be adopted.

5. Moreover, we could not but be cognisant of the circumstances under which the inquiry was instituted. In magazines and in the newspapers, a sweeping indictment had been laid against the whole of the prison administration. In brief, not only were the principles of prison treatment as prescribed by the Prison Acts criticised, but the prison authority itself, and the constitution of that authority, were held to be responsible for many grave evils which were alleged to exist.

6. These criticisms we could not ignore. When we came to take evidence, we found that the opinions of nearly all the witnesses bore directly on the questions which had been publicly raised; and while on the one hand many of the charges made in the public prints against the present system were reiterated before us, on the other, as was to be expected, the responsible representatives of the Prisons Department were anxious to give their replies individually and to make a complete exposition of their case and opinions from their respective standpoints. We have therefore felt it our duty to enter upon a comprehensive examination of the conditions under which prisoners are confined, and have taken into view all the circumstances which presented themselves to our minds as bearing directly or indirectly upon the terms of the reference.

Acting upon this principle, we have considered the position of the prison staff, a subject not specifically referred to us. It is obvious that to maintain a high standard of prison treatment it is essential that the general conditions governing the employment of warders should be satisfactory. We have therefore endeavoured to ascertain whether the existing conditions are consistent with a humane and efficient discharge by the warders of their duties in connexion with the treatment of prisoners. It should, however, be observed that in 1891 a Departmental Committee inquired into the hours of duty, leave, pay and allowances, and terms of retirement of subordinate officers in both convict and local prisons. As the result of the report of this Committee, the Treasury sanctioned new rates of pay and emoluments, which have added about 14,300*l.* to the cost of the prison service.

17th Report of the Commissioners of Prisons, para. 67.

Previous Inquiries.

7. The year 1865 may be regarded as an epoch in prison legislation in virtue of the Act then passed, but we think it well to set out the principal inquiries which have been held into matters connected with local and convict prisons since the year 1860. The Act of 1865 consolidated and amended the law relating to prisons. It set up separate prison jurisdictions in the counties and towns and other territorial divisions which maintained or were liable to maintain a separate prison, if accommodation for its prisoners was not provided elsewhere. By the Act, the prison staff was constituted, the duties of the different classes of officials were laid down, and by several clauses, supplemented by 104 regulations in a schedule, the general government of prisons, and the treatment and discipline of the prisoners, were elaborately provided for. Responsibility was vested in the justices in sessions assembled, and the supervision and inspection of prisons were entrusted to two or more visiting justices, appointed annually by the justices in session.

Local Prisons.

11. The groundwork of the treatment of convicted prisoners in local prisons is laid down by the Act of 1865. Further provisions, including certain modifications, were introduced by the Act of 1877.

Since 1865 the main principles of prison treatment have not been altered, except in detail and in so far as they may have been affected by the radical change in the administration effected by the Act of 1877. Indeed, it may be said generally that neither those principles, nor the administrative system laid down by the Acts of 1865 and 1877, have been brought into question until the present inquiry was instituted.

Convict Prisons.

12. Convict prisons have been dealt with separately by the Penal Servitude Acts, 1853, 1857, 1864, the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, and certain other subsidiary Acts which came under the purview of the Penal Servitude Acts Commission of 1879.

During the last 40 years important alterations have been made in the treatment of prisoners, but continuity in the administration by the directors has been maintained throughout.

General Review.

13. We have to acknowledge the great assistance rendered to us by previous inquiries. Some branches of prison treatment were so exhaustively considered that it has not been necessary for us to traverse the same ground at any length. In particular, the reports of the Royal Commission on the Penal Servitude Acts of 1879, and the Royal Commission of Inquiry into Irish Prisons in 1885, are full of interesting and valuable suggestions. We must, however, observe that these inquiries almost entirely overlooked the very important subjects of prison industries and the treatment of the younger classes of criminals.

14. Upon a general review of the management of English and Welsh prisons upon the existing methods laid down by the Legislature and regarding the treatment and condition of the prison population objectively, we consider that the long and able administration of Sir E. Du Cane has achieved a large measure of success.

Sir Godfrey Lushington thus describes the work which the Commissioners have accomplished:—"The work of taking over nearly 120 prisons all on a single day and "consolidating them into about 60; organising the staff, every member of which had 11,394.
"statutory rights reserved to him; re-arranging the building and establishing "uniformity, has really been a work of prodigious magnitude, on which an immense "amount of thought, contrivance, and skill has been expended; and it would be a "disappointment to me if the Committee have not found this vast machinery in "good working order, and everywhere showing marks of vigorous administration. By "that I mean that nothing has been left to chance or is the outcome of neglect, and "that the arrangements, whatever they are (whether you find them completely satis-"factory or no), have been advisedly adopted, and that the Commissioners have their "reasons to offer why the arrangements should be as they are and not otherwise."

It has, however, been frequently urged that the satisfactory condition of the prison system is proved by the decrease which during recent years has taken place in the prison population. We do not think that the contention is necessarily well founded, but these figures show that the prison population has fallen to a remarkable extent, an actual as well as a relative decrease having taken place.

15. The decrease of the prison population cannot be taken as a correct indication of a corresponding decrease in crime. The causes which contribute to the fluctuations of crime are frequently subtle, complex, and undefinable. Changes in criminal statistics are often the direct result of changes in the law or its procedure, which have nothing to do with prison treatment. The Reformatory and Industrial Schools Acts, the Summary Jurisdiction Act, and the shortening of sentences have relieved the prisons to a large extent On the other hand, under the Education Act and numerous local Acts, many persons have been imprisoned for offences which are in their nature non-criminal. The imperfect and needlessly complicated form in which criminal statistics have hitherto been compiled has increased the difficulty of arriving at accurate conclusions. A Departmental Committee has recently presented a report on the subject of judicial statistics, and the improved methods recommended will be embodied in the forthcoming volume for 1893–4. We have had the advantage of examining Mr. Troup, who was a member of that Committee, and his evidence is extremely interesting and important.

Mr. Troup shows that taking the decrease of 33 per cent. in the prison population as between 1883 and 1893, the number of committals to prison on conviction or on failure to find sureties only accounts for 3·5 per cent. of the decrease; and that the fair inference is that the diminution in the average length of sentences during the last 10 years approximately accounts for no less than 29·5 per cent.

Mr. Troup adopts as the safest test of the amount of serious crime in the country the number not of crimes tried on indictment, but of indictable crimes. The following figures show that during the last 20 years there has been a small but steady decrease, and this has occurred while the general population has increased by 25 per cent.

Number of Persons tried for Indictable Offences at Assizes and Quarter Sessions or summarily, during the period 1874–93.

—	Annual Average for each Period of Five Years.	Proportion to 100,000 Inhabitants.
1889–93 - - -	56,472	194

The general conclusions at which Mr. Troup arrived are that crimes of violence against the person show a decided decrease; offences against morality appear to have increased, probably following new and stringent legislation; all classes of crimes against property show an actual diminution, which, considered relatively to population, is specially noteworthy. Larceny, embezzlement, and receiving stolen goods constitute five-sixths of the total of crime, and the diminution in this class of offences is decided, though it is complicated by the changes which have taken place in procedure. Miscellaneous offences, with the exception of attempts to commit suicide, have also diminished. Mr. Troup therefore considers that the decrease in crime, though not at all proportionate to the decrease in the prison population, is real and substantial.

Judicial Statistics, 1893–4, Introduction, p. 75.

16. The fact that the great increase of the general population does not carry with it a proportionate addition to crime suggests at once that the spread of education, improved dwellings, sanitation, and more favourable condition of living in the building extensions to accommodate increasing numbers are unfavourable to the common forms of criminality, and that the more these improvements are effected in the lowest quarters of the large towns, the more satisfactory will be the general effect on criminality.

17. If the condition and treatment of prisoners at the present time are compared with what they were 60, 40, or even 20 years ago, the responsible authorities can justly claim credit for great and progressive improvement. The bad prisons have disappeared In the full consciousness of these improvements, it was not unreasonable that there should have been a somewhat rigid adherence to the lines of the Prison Acts, and great faith induced in the principles which they laid down. Moreover, the various inquiries which have taken place have all resulted in the general affirmation of the principles which were prescribed by the Acts. This was conspicuously so in the case of the lengthy inquiry into Irish prisons in 1885, when one of the chief efforts of the Commission appears to have been to raise the administration of the Irish prisons to the English level.

We do not consider, therefore, that there is reason for general condemnation of a system which resulted originally from careful inquiry and much deliberation; and which was specially and successfully designed to put an end to many glaring and patent evils. Similarly we do not consider that it is right to lay the burden of all the short-comings of the prison system on the central prison authorities who have carried into effect under successive Secretaries of State the Acts approved by Parliament; who have loyally and substantially carried out the various recommendations made from time to time by Commissions and Committees; and who, as administrators, have achieved in point of organization, discipline, order, and economy, a striking administrative success. Nevertheless, we feel that the time has come when the main principles and methods adopted by the Prison Acts should be seriously tested by the light of acquired experience and recent scientific research.

18. In proportion to the spread of education, the increase of wealth, and the extension of social advantages, the retention of a compact mass of habitual criminals in our midst is a growing stain on our civilisation. In any thorough inquiry into prison treatment, the closest regard must be paid to its physical and moral effect on prisoners generally. But the number of habitual criminals in and out of prison must form one of the standards by which the system must be tested and judged. Recidivism is the most important of all prison questions, and it is the most complicated and difficult.

19. Sir E. Du Cane has very truly said that nothing is more common than to find "that persons whose attention has been attracted only to some disadvantage in the "system finally decided on, discuss it without being aware that any alternative "would introduce still greater evils." It is easy to find fault, to form ideal views, and to enunciate lofty speculations as if they were principles arrived at by experience. It is extremely difficult to organise and carry out a perfect system with a reasonable regard to economy, which should provide equal advantages and similar methods of treatment, not in one great centre, which would be comparatively easy, but in greater or less degree in all the considerable centres of a great population distributed throughout the country, and which should apply uniformly to all the ever varying classes of offenders undergoing sentences from a day's imprisonment to penal servitude for life.

Punishment and prevention of crime, p. 8.

20. The difficulty of laying down principles of treatment is greatly enhanced by the fact that while sentences may roughly speaking be the measure of particular offences, they are not the measure of the characters of the offenders; and it is this fact which makes a system of prison classification, which shall be at once just, convenient, and workable, so difficult to arrive at.

21. For the purposes of this inquiry we have held 35 sittings. We have examined Sir E. Du Cane, and his three colleagues on the Prisons Board, as well as Colonel Garsia, the Secretary. Sir E. Du Cane during the past year has unfortunately suffered much from ill health. His evidence had to be postponed to a late period, and then had to be taken, owing to his ill health, under conditions which precluded the examination from being as full as we could have wished. Sir G. Lushington gave us the benefit of his long experience in the Home Office, and Mr. Troup and Mr. Duncan, also of the Home Office, gave us valuable information on criminal statistics and prison industries respectively. We examined altogether 56 witnesses, representing and including governors, deputy-governors, warders-in-charge, medical experts, chaplains, matrons, and representatives of four Government Departments, Prisoners' Aid Societies, the Howard Society, Visiting Committees, Reformatory Schools, Trades Unions, and ex-prisoners. The following prisons, refuges, and homes have been specially visited by members of the Committee:—

Convict Prisons.	Local Prisons.	Discharged Prisoners' Homes, and other Institutions.
Dartmoor.	Wormwood Scrubs.	Elizabeth Fry Refuge.
Portland.	Pentonville.	East Finchley Home.
Borstal.	Holloway.	Salvation Army "Bridge."
Dover.	Newgate.	" " Homes for Women
Woking.	Wandsworth.	Red Hill Reformatory.
Aylesbury.	Strangeways (Manchester)
Broadmoor (Lunatic Asylum).	Leeds.
	Knutsford.
	Winchester.
	Newcastle.
	Reading.
	York.
	Gloucester.
	Carnarvon.
	Cardiff.
	Cambridge.
	Carmarthen.

On these visits we have had the advantage of learning the views of many prison officials, including warders of all grades, whom the limits of time have not enabled us to call formally as witnesses. Sir Algernon West, a member of the Committee, was good enough to undertake a personal inspection of the Dutch and Belgian prisons, which has been of much use to the Committee. Other members of the Committee visited Glasgow and Perth prisons in Scotland.

22. The greater part of the evidence we have taken relates to local prisons of which the predominating importance is due to these considerations: (a.) The average number of local prisoners relatively to convicts is as 4 to 1; (b) the management of them, owing to the fluctuation and variety of the population is specially complicated and difficult; (c) it is in the local prison that the question of recidivism in the main has to be studied. The key of this question lies in the treatment of the young prisoners, and of a total population in the local prisons on March 31, 1894, of 14,339, 2,466, or about one-sixth were under 21. Of a total convict prison population at the same date of 3,588, only 86, or about one-fortieth were under 21.

It must also be borne in mind that the inquiries of the Royal Commissions of 1863 and 1879, and the Departmental Committee of Inquiry into the Treatment of Felony Convicts in 1869–70, were directed specially to the case of convict prisons, and have supplied us with much evidence which but for those inquires it would have been necessary to take.

Prison Act, 1877.

23. It will be convenient here to state briefly the general effect of the passing of the Prison Act, 1877. By that Act all local prisons were transferred from the local authorities in counties and boroughs to the Goverment, and placed under the authority of a newly constituted Board of Commissioners acting subject to the authority of the Secretary of State. It is needless to examine into the causes of the transfer. The evidence, much of which was given by witnesses well acquainted with prisons before and after 1878, is mainly favourable to the change. The best prisons under the former regime, while comparing satisfactorily in point of order and discipline with the prisons of to-day were managed on lines in all probability more likely to produce a healthy moral effect of a permanent kind on the prisoners. But in other cases the management was unsatisfactory. Taking the prisons generally there was no settled and uniform principle of treatment; the Act of 1865, which constituted the Prison Code, and which it was intended should be adopted and administered in all prisons alike, in many prisons was imperfectly carried out; and the resulting inequalities as between one prison and another led to a very considerable amount of mischief and inconvenience.

The effect of the transfer was far reaching. The intention of the Act was to produce an improved and uniform system through the strong and centralised administration of the Government, but at the same time to preserve local influences and the co-operation of the visiting justices by the institution of visiting committees to whom were assigned very extensive responsibilities and powers. The intention of the Act in this respect for the most part has been a failure, and for three main reasons. First the local authorities lost all financial control and were left with no direct interest in prison economy. They were left with no power proprio motu to take any action which involved expenditure. Secondly the abolition of the visiting justices by the Act appeared as a primary fact; and although in a sense they were set up again and under the rules issued by the Secretary of State given secondary powers, yet the general impression seems to have been that those powers were superfluous and put in rather for the sake of appearances to veil the abolition of the visiting justices. In the third place the strong and masterful action of the new Prison Department directed towards an absolute system of uniformity, carrying with it rigid discipline and perfect orderliness, was naturally calculated to overbear and repress what remained of the old authority in the different localities. Under these combined influences, while here and there owing to individual energy and capacity the visiting committees have exercised a considerable and beneficial influence, for the most part they have acquiesced in the supremacy of the central administration, have discharged their duties perfunctorily, and have not exercised the very considerable functions laid upon them by the Act.

As we have already stated the centralisation of authority has been a complete success in the direction of uniformity, discipline, and economy. On the other hand it carried with it some inevitable disadvantages. The great and, as we consider, the proved danger of this highly centralised system has been, and is that while much attention has been given to organization, finance, order, health of the prisoners, and prison statistics, the prisoners have been treated too much as a hopeless or worthless element of the community, and the moral as well as the legal responsibility of the prison authorities has been held to cease when they pass outside the prison gates. The satisfactory sanitary conditions, the unbroken orderliness of prison life, economy and high organisation, are held, and justly held, to prove good administration. But the moral condition in which a large number of prisoners leave the prison, and the serious number of re-committals have led us to think that there is ample cause for a searching inquiry into the main features of prison life. From the evidence submitted to us it appears that as a criminal passes into the habitual class, prison life, subject to the sentences now given, loses its terrors as familiarity with it increases.

24. Before passing to the particular points of our inquiry it is essential to enter upon some other general considerations—

Is the present Prison System sufficiently deterrent?

This question has to be satisfactorily answered before we can proceed to recommend any changes or modifications in it. The Royal Commission of 1863, expressed an opinion that the penal servitude system then in force "appeared not to be sufficiently "dreaded either by those who have undergone it, "or by the criminal classes generally." The Royal Commission of 1879, however, declared, after full investigation, that "the system (i.e., in the case of convicts) is effective as a punishment." A similar opinion in relation to local as well as convict prisons has been expressed by the most competent witnesses whom we have examined. But here a question of the utmost importance arises which we deal with later, that of the length of sentences. Among the numerous witnesses examined there appeared to be a consensus of opinion on two points in this connexion. First, they agreed that as a general principle short sentences were most desirable in the case of first offenders, and where extenuating circumstances could be shown to exist. Secondly, they agreed that short non-cumulative sentences on old criminals, and on persons habitually drunk and disorderly, were almost altogether ineffectual. We are aware that the question of judicial sentences is not within our reference, and that it would be improper for us to make recommendations on a matter not submitted to us, and upon which we have not taken evidence from high judicial authorities. But as you have directed us to consider the treatment of the habitual criminal, and as this leads us directly to the question of recidivism we trust we shall not be in error in presenting to you the opinions we have been, perforce, led to form from the evidence necessary and incidental to our inquiry.

We are of the opinion that, so far as first offences are concerned, the present prison treatment in convict and local prisons is amply sufficient for the purposes of deterrence.

Character of Necessary Changes.

25. The next consideration is the general direction of any changes which the course of our examination into the facts make us think necessary or advisable. Sir Godfrey Lushington thus impressively summed up the influences under the present system unfavourable to reformation: "I regard as unfavourable to reformation the status "of a prisoner throughout his whole career; the crushing of self-respect, the starving "of all moral instinct he may possess, the absence of all opportunity to do or receive a "kindness, the continual association with none but criminals, and that only as a separate "item amongst other items also separate; the forced labour, and the denial of all "liberty. I believe the true mode of reforming a man or restoring him to society is "exactly in the opposite direction of all these; but, of course, this is a mere idea. It "is quite impracticable in a prison. In fact the unfavourable features I have men-"tioned are inseparable from prison life." As a broad description of prison life we think this description is accurate; we do not agree that all of these unfavourable features are irremovable. Already in many respects and in individual cases they have been modified, and we believe that this modification can be carried much further in the direction of the treatment adopted and practised by the best of the existing reformatories. We think that the system should be made more elastic, more capable of being adopted to the special cases of individual prisoners; that prison discipline and treatment should be more effectually designed to maintain, stimulate, or awaken the higher susceptibilities of prisoners, to develop their moral instincts, to train them in orderly and industrial habits, and whenever possible to turn them out of prison better men and women, both physically and morally, than when they came in. Crime, its causes and treatment, has been the subject of much profound and scientific inquiry. Many of the problems it presents are practically at the present time insoluble. It may be true that some criminals are irreclaimable, just as some diseases are incurable, and in such cases it is not unreasonable to acquiesce in the theory that criminality is a disease, and the result of physical imperfection. But criminal anthropology as a science is in an embryo stage, and while scientific and more particularly medical observation and experience are of the most essential value in guiding opinion on the whole subject, it would be a loss of time to search for a perfect system in learned but conflicting theories, when so much can be done by the recognition of the plain fact that the great majority of prisoners are ordinary men and women amenable, more or less, to all those influences which affect persons outside.

26. From this point of view it is interesting to notice that the Royal Commission of 1879 acquiesced in the objection to the penal servitude system made on the ground that "it not only fails to reform offenders, but in the case of the less "hardened criminals, and especially of first offenders, produces a deteriorating effect "from the indiscriminate association of all classes of convicts in the public works." It is true that this referred to convict prisons only, and that in 1882 the star class of first offenders was instituted to meet the views of the Royal Commission. But we think for reasons which we shall subsequently proceed to state that the general prison system is still open to this reproach. Our inquiry has led us to think that the evils attributed to contamination have been exaggerated so far as male criminals are concerned. But grave evils are liable to occur from surreptitious communications among the women prisoners, and every care should be taken to keep them from being crowded together in chapel. Leaving this point aside for the present, we call attention to the finding of the Royal Commission in 1879, that the convict system not only failed to reform offenders, but on the less hardened, and especially the first offenders, it produced a deteriorating effect. The failure is yet to be found in local as well as convict prisons, but we are not inclined to attribute it to direct contamination by association as a primary cause of mischief.

Report, par. 72.

27. Upon what does the reformatory influence which we desire to bring to bear more fully on the prison population depend? We answer (i.) the administrative authority, (ii.) individual effort, (iii.) a proper classification of prisoners.

(i.) The population of every prison is a community in itself, changing with greater or less rapidity, but composed of individuals of varying character, aptitude, and history. For purposes of prison discipline it is comparatively easy to mass them together, to call each of them by a number, and by a cast-iron system to make them all go through the same tasks, observe the same hours, and lead the same lives. But under this orderly equality there exist the most striking inequalities. The hardened criminal bears the discipline without much trouble. Others are brutalised by it. Others suffer acutely and perhaps are permanently weakened by it in mind and body. What is a temporary inconvenience to the grown criminal, may be to lads and younger men a bitter disgrace from which they never recover to their dying day. It is impossible to administer to each man a relatively exact amount of punishment. But yet it is these very inequalities which often must produce that bitterness and recklessness which lead on to habitual crime. These inequalities must exist under the best available system. But the responsible authorities of the prison should have sufficient time at their command to observe prisoners individually, and sufficient discretionary power to give or obtain for an individual prisoner that guidance, advice, or help, which at such a crisis in his life may make a priceless change in his intentions or disposition. And it should be the duty of the central executive to co-operate with the local officials in carrying out satisfactorily this most important part of their functions. 3174, 3186. Royal Commission, Irish Prisons, 1885, Report, par. 79.

(ii.) Without an excessive and impossible increase in the number of higher prison officials adequate individual attention to prisoners could not be given. But the warders could be trained to do some of this work, and under proper rules and regulations outside helpers could be brought in to supplement the work of the prison staff. Ordinary amateurs, as a rule, would be worse than useless. There are, however, many men and women in every centre of population who by training and temperament are amply competent to render valuable assistance.

(iii.) The probabilities of success would be largely increased by a careful classification of prisoners. At present a large prison contains almost every type of offender. They are mixed up in hopeless confusion. In hospitals patients are classified and kept separate according to their ailments and requirements. The work of the doctor is simplified, time and effort are saved. The work of a prison chaplain in a large prison is inconceivably difficult, and his diagnosis has to be made under serious disadvantages. The smooth-tongued old offender occupies his time with meaningless professions of penitence; the prisoner who is reticent, because he feels his position, may have to be passed by for lack of time to penetrate his reserve. Old and young, good and bad, men convicted of atrocious crimes, and those convicted of non-criminal civil offences, are all to be found in the same prison. The chaplain and the governor have to attune their minds as best they can to each individual case as they pass from cell to cell. Under these circumstances their best efforts can only reach a portion of the prisoners. A sound and wise system of classification would make it more possible to deal with prisoners collectively by reason of their circumstances being at any rate to some extent of a like nature. Efforts could then be concentrated on the individuals who were contumacious, and with better chances of ultimate success.

Is Recidivism increasing?

28. It has not been part of our inquiry to make a full examination into criminal statistics, nor should we be justified in coming to any conclusions of our own upon them. We quote the figures given us by Mr. Troup as throwing interesting light upon our inquiry, and confirming, so far as they go, the opinions we have formed upon the general body of the evidence presented to us. From the point of view of the statistician the figures have yet to be tested by public criticism and examination, and we need only say here that at the present stage of statistical inquiry they are not put forward as either exhaustive or conclusive. Table IX. of the Judicial Statistics for 1893 for the first time gives in detail the number of previous convictions recorded against the total number of persons convicted.

Total Number convicted at Assizes and Quarter Sessions.	No previous Conviction.	Per-centage.	One or more previous Convictions.	Per-centage.
9,694	4,359	45	5,335	55

Of the 5,335, 2,988 had been previously convicted on indictment, as against 2,347 on summary process. It is, however, not unreasonable to suppose that this return of previous conviction is not exhaustive. The practice adopted until quite recently for the purpose of identification was necessarily imperfect. Upon the recommendation of the Departmental Committee, which was appointed in 1893, a new system has been organised, based on the methods invented by M. Bertillon and Sir F. Galton, and when sufficient time has elapsed for its full practical application more accurate results will be obtained.

We quote these results from a table prepared for the use of that Committee :—

	Approximate Per-centage of previous Committals.
Liverpool, Birmingham, Bradford	79
West Riding Yorkshire, Lancashire, Staffordshire	70
Norfolk and Suffolk	61

These figures show that the smallest per-centage of recommittals is, as one would expect, in London, where there are ampler opportunities than anywhere else for escaping identification.

The proportion of recommittals varies remarkably in the different classes of offences :—

Class	Offences.	Proportion of Recommittals.
I.	Against the person	30 per cent.
II.	Against property with violence	66 „
III.	„ „ without violence	64 „
IV.	Malicious injury to property	42 „
V.	Forgery and coining	37 „
VI.	Other offences	25 „

The per-centage is highest where the offence offers to the habitual criminal the best means of obtaining a livelihood. This is further illustrated by the fact that for the offence of larceny from the person there were 79 per cent. of recommittals and for simple larceny 78 per cent.

It appears, therefore, to be probable that rather more than half the number of prisoners convicted at Assizes or Quarter Sessions have undergone a previous conviction either on indictment or on summary process, and that the majority of recommittals are in respect to larceny. We have obtained a return from the Prison Commissioners in order to ascertain whether the proportion of reconvictions is increasing :—

* This return was prepared by the Commissioners at the request of Sir John Dorington.

The total number of commitments in each of the years specified was 132,238, 166,284, and 147,473 respectively.

As the returns in the Judicial Statistics, from which this is compiled, show only commitments, and are not confined to convictions, the figures cannot be considered as correctly representing the latter. The convictions have, however, been given as far as possible by eliminating from the number without any previous commitment those classes of persons described in the heading of this return.

As the returns of persons committed a second or third time, &c. are not composed except in part of the individuals shown as previously committed a first or second time, &c., these figures can only be taken as a rough approximation of the proportions reconvicted. They cannot be taken as referring to the same individuals.

The returns show the number of previous commitments on each occasion of a prisoner's committal; the same individual if committed more than once in the same year would be included in more than one column, i.e., as a second, third, or fourth committal.

It will be observed that the per-centage is as much affected by a rise or fall in the number of first commitals as in a fall or rise in the number of second committals, and so on. Further that the number of re-committals is affected by the success in identification, and so far has nothing to do with the effects of the prison system.

Notes by the Prison Commissioners.

Taking the figures for 1892–3, and with the reserves indicated above due to the difficulties of detecting first offenders, this table goes to show that of every 100 who go to prison a first time, 70 do not return again; of those convicted a second time 48 per cent. return again; of those convicted a third time, 64 per cent.; of those convicted a fourth time, 71 per cent.; of those convicted a fifth time, 79 per cent.: and it clearly follows from the last column that the old offender is constantly returning again.

Whether or no the per-centages for a given year are approximately accurate, it is difficult from the comparative statement to avoid the belief that the proportion of reconvictions during the last 20 years has increased. On the per-centages in the return it has increased in respect to the recommittals for the third time or more. But against this may be set the fact that since 1873 the methods of identification, though far from complete, have continued to improve.

It is not possible to make an estimate of any value of the number of habitual criminals in the country. Table XXVI. of the Criminal Statistics, on which we examined Mr. G. E. Smith, a Superintendent of the Metropolitan Police, is based upon police reports and estimates, and affords no basis for an accurate computation. Assuming, however, that the number of re-committed prisoners averages 7,000, and this is a moderate estimate, the figure 21,918 which represents "suspected persons" at large is not, we should suppose, by any means too great proportionately to the number of habitual criminals in prison. 2249–2378.

Headsprings of Recidivism.

29. Where are the headsprings of Recidivism? Doubtless in a large measure they are to be found in the social conditions of the general population. Lads grow up predisposed to crime, and eventually fall into it. Mr. Davitt told us that he was speaking to an educated habitual criminal in Dartmoor, and was pointing out how foolish it was, apart from the immorality of the thing, to risk getting seven years penal servitude for 10*l.* or 20*l.* of stolen goods. The man replied "Well, yes, that "is all right coming from you, but put yourself in my position. I never knew my "father or my mother. My first recollection is being turned out of a workhouse. "I fell among thieves. I got educated in crime. I learned to read and write in "prison. Unlike you I have had no moral training. Now I hold that man is naturally "a thief. Take for instance a child in its mother's arms; anything that excites its "fancy it wants to get, and if that natural feeling is not corrected by parental training "and moral influence and education it gets stronger as the child grows older. Now "I am such a product of your civilisation. You allowed me to grow up with these "animal instincts uncorrected, and then you send me to prison when I exercise them." 11,293.

This is an illustration of a state of things prevalent among the most wretched and criminal classes of society. Numbers of lads and girls have been permanently rescued by the industrial and reformatory schools. But a large number find their way to prison. It is certain that the ages when the majority of habitual criminals are made lies between 16 and 21. And from the interesting figures supplied by Mr. Merrick, the Chaplain of Holloway Prison, the most fatal years are 17, 18, and 19. The proportion of juvenile criminals relatively to the population of the same age is shown by the return on p. 29, of which the significance is apparent. This is corroborated by other experienced witnesses. It appears to us that the most determined effort should be made to lay hold of these incipient criminals and to prevent them by strong restraint and rational treatment from recruiting the habitual class. It is remarkable that previous inquiries have almost altogether overlooked this all important matter. The habitual criminals can only be effectually put down in one way, and that is by cutting off the supply. The improvement of general social conditions is the work of the community. But that some of its worst and most dangerous products, and that many of those who would lead honest lives under different surroundings, can be 1559. App. III. 3106 sq.

30. We have obtained through the Foreign Office a number of interesting reports on the working of prison systems in foreign countries. Information was specially asked for on the subjects referred to us, and a summary of it is placed in the Appendix. Valuable as it is, we feel that our own experience at home must in the main guide this opinion. Systems must vary according to national temperaments and requirements, nor is it possible to determine satisfactorily their comparative merits by prison statistics, even when accurate and complete.

But criminal statistics are very imperfect in those countries where interesting experiments are being made, or where systems are in force dissimilar from our own, which we could wish to test accurately. The information necessary for forming an opinion upon their merits being deficient, it is not possible to recommend large alterations upon the foreign experience. There are, however, many portions of the reports which are worthy of careful consideration, and some of our recommendations, to a considerable extent, will be based upon methods successfully adopted by other countries.

Treatment of Prisoners.

Accommodation.

31. Serious charges of overcrowding in the London prisons have been made. We have carefully examined the facts of the case. The Prisons Act of 1865 provides (section 17 (1)) that "in every prison separate cells shall be provided equal in number "to the average of the greatest number of prisoners, not being convicts under sentence "of penal servitude, who have been confined in such prisons at the same time during "each preceding five years." Further, the same Act, Schedule I., Regulation 26, provides that:—"Every male prisoner shall sleep in a cell by himself, or under special "circumstances in a separate bed placed in a cell containing not fewer than two other "male prisoners, and sufficient bed clothes shall be provided for every prisoner. A "convicted criminal prisoner may be required to sleep on a plank bed without a "mattress during such time as may be determined by the rules of the prison. Epileptic "prisoners, or prisoners labouring under diseases requiring assistance or supervision "in the night may at any time notwithstanding this regulation be placed by order "of the surgeon with not fewer than two other male prisoners." We find that the law as laid down in section 17 (1) has been observed, and the required number of separate cells has been provided. But this provision is not sufficient to ensure the full observance of Regulation 26. Since 1865 the practice of sending convicts to different local prisons has grown up, and this has added materially to the demand on accommodation, though, under the section, in providing accommodation the convicts are not to be taken into account.

701–4, 2927, 2542, 2949, 4049, 5072–8, 5262, 5328, 5431, 7297, 7306, 10,074, 10,097, 11,021–6.

Partly from this and partly from other causes it has occasionally happened that unusually large drafts of prisoners have had to be received, and in consequence the Regulation 26 of Schedule I. has not been adhered to. Ordinary prisoners have been placed in association, and although this may have been for only a single night, we are clearly of the opinion that the margin of accommodation ought to be sufficiently ample to make these occurrences impossible. Prison officials without exception agreed that such association is most objectionable morally and physically, and we think that it ought not to occur either on reception or for the purpose of confinement during the night.

The difficulty in providing accommodation appears to have been confined mainly to London and Manchester, Birmingham and Cardiff, and it is one which can be readily met by a better system of transfer. Under the present system governors have to obtain the consent of the Commissioners before they can transfer prisoners, and the Commissioners have to obtain the authority of the Secretary of State. We think that the Commissioners might be authorised to sanction or refuse transfers on their own responsibility. The new classification which we shall proceed to recommend will make changes calculated to give large and immediate relief to the prisons where the overcrowding has occurred.

Section 17 (1) of the Prison Act, 1865, requires amendment. All classes of prisoners should be included in calculating the average of the greatest number of prisoners in each of the preceding five years.

With regard to association under Regulation 26 there is some difference of opinion; but all witnesses agreed that where association is ordered on medical grounds it is essential that adequate supervision should be secured. Here again any difficulty likely to arise would probably be met by an improved system of classification. The class of prisoners usually placed in association ought as far as possible to be kept separate under special treatment and medical observation. We deal with this more fully later on. The phrase in Regulation 26, "special circumstances," appears open to some misconstruction. We think that association in sleeping cells should not be allowed under any circumstances, except for medical reasons and upon the express recommendation of the medical officer. This rule should be rigidly adhered to. 2930.

Visits and Communications.

32. Some experienced officials state that the present rules are quite adequate and need no alteration. The practice is laid down by Standing Order 213 in Appendix V. Mr. Manning, a governor of the widest experience, thinks that it would not be wise to give to governors a discretionary power to relax the regulations in favour of the prisoner, on the ground that it would lead to favouritism. But he thought more indulgence might be granted to prisoners in respect to visits after three months. We think that while there should be uniformity in practice and the greatest care taken against any weakening of the penal machinery, it is not advisable in this matter to lay down rigid rules from which there can be no departure. Many witnesses were in favour of extending existing privileges. Those who were most strongly in favour of the existing practice all admitted that, subject to the proper maintenance of regulations for the purpose of order and deterrence, they would approve of any regulation clearly calculated to produce a good moral effect on the prisoners. In other words, if without endangering discipline and impairing necessary severity in prison regulations, it appeared that extra visits to prisoners, or privileges to send or receive communications from friends and relations, would be beneficial to a prisoner and likely to assist in making him a better man, such relaxations would be desirable. We consider that it would not be wise to place so much extra responsibility upon the governors with regard to all prisoners. But the Visiting Committee should have power to consider each individual case on its merits either at the direct request of the prisoner or upon the representations of the governor or chaplain, and within certain limits (infra) to relax or maintain the regulations at their discretion. It should, however, be distinctly understood that any relaxation should not be in the nature of mitigation of punishment, but should only be made when, after careful consideration, it appeared clear that the ends of justice would be served by bringing good and healthy influence to bear on the particular prisoners. Sir E. Du Cane, who thought it might be advisable to allow more frequent letters and visits after three months, put in the condition that the increase of privileges should be in accordance with the mark or stage system. With this we concur. To allow indiscriminate visits either by undesirable persons or even by persons not likely to influence a prisoner in the right direction would be most harmful. But no hard and fast rules at any period should be allowed to keep from a prisoner any good influence which might help to reclaim him or save him from becoming a permanent member of the criminal classes. These recommendations apply equally to female prisoners. 743, 1835, 2566, 2569, 4064, 8770. 959, 809, 2565. 1533–41, 1728, 2622, 3033–3041, 5175, 6494, 6897, 9000, 9001, 10,897–10,901. 954, 1838, 4066, 4321, 7771–2. 10,897, 10,899. 6969.

33. There are but few prisoners other than those who are in a hopeless state through physical or mental deficiencies who are irreclaimable. Even in the case of habitual criminals there appears to come a time when repeated imprisonments or the gradual awakening of better feelings wean them from habitual crime. Governors, chaplains, matrons, male and female warders, by personal influence have reclaimed individual prisoners. Given more time and opportunity for the work of reclamation, it is certain that in proportion there would be an increased measure of success. Beyond question some prison officials with higher aptitudes for the work succeed when others fail. It should be the object of the prison authorities through the prison staff and any suitable auxiliary effort that can be employed to humanize the prisoners, to prevent them from feeling that the State merely chains them for a certain period and cares nothing about them beyond keeping them in safe custody and under iron discipline. The evidence in connexion with reformatories bears directly on this matter. It is no doubt true that lads and girls are more amenable to influence than grown men and women. But it is only a question of degree. Mr. Trevarthen's evidence in connexion with the Redhill Reformatory is to the effect that 91·7 per cent. of the inmates live satisfactory lives after leaving the reformatory. Observation of the individual cases is maintained for four years; and even allowing a considerable per-centage for erroneous reports and for subsequent failure, the result is most satisfactory. The Salvation Army has organized Discharged Prisoners' Homes for men and women, and although it is too soon to express a decided opinion upon their working, yet it is quite certain 2438–46, 2552, 2792, 2837, 2890–2. 8306–19.

that through these agencies a considerable number of apparently hopeless cases
Appendix V., 5056, 5454. have been satisfactorily dealt with. The same can be said with regard to the homes known as the Elizabeth Fry, the East Finchley Roman Catholic, and other institutions for discharged women prisoners. All those most praiseworthy efforts are attended by a certain measure of success. Experience at any rate shows, whether we look at the work done after prisoners have served their time, or at the individual efforts of prison officials while the prisoners are serving their time, that the present system, while admirable for coercion and repression, is excessively deficient on the reformatory side.

4902–8. 4964. 5523. Dr. Brayn, the governor of the Female Convict Prison, was of the decided opinion that lady visitors to female prisoners did good. The general opinion, however, appeared adverse to them unless specially qualified and selected with great care.

In female prisons there ought to be a female scripture reader in addition to the chaplain.

Prisoners' Aid Societies.

8027. 34. It is not easy to give a clear description of the working of the present arrangement. To each prison are attached one or more societies. Some do admirable work, but it is impossible to form a definite opinion upon either the extent or the 7229. permanent effect of the aid given. No doubt many prisoners are rescued by them, and much philanthropic effort is devoted to their welfare. Very interesting accounts of prisoners' aid work were given by Colonel Buchanan, Mr. Wheatley, Colonel Barker, of the Salvation Army, Miss Elizabeth Fry, and others. It is most desirable that fuller scope should be given to their able efforts and philanthropic enterprise, and that other societies should be encouraged to work in the same spirit. At present a Government grant of 1,500*l.* per annum is distributed under the regulations described in Appendix V.
10,038 sq. But it does not appear that there is either uniformity of action under definite principles, or that the various societies are so far organised as a whole that the effect of aid can be satisfactorily ascertained. There seems to be a great and unnecessary 2576, 8251. variation in the methods of working. In some cases the visiting committees appear to act as the Prisoners' Aid Societies; in others there is no connection or com-
1844, 7519, 10,041. munication between the two bodies. In some prisons the governors or the chaplains appear to be the motive force; in others these officers seem to have little or no know-
10,038. ledge of the societies. Mr. Ruggles-Brise, one of the Prison Commissioners, gave it as his opinion that a great deal of useful reform might be here started. "There is, he said, "a great want of uniformity in the work of the societies and in their methods. "In almost every prison a different method prevails, and I should like to see a uniform "system established." It is quite possible for a criminal committed to different prisons to receive aid from each society concerned with them, and it does not appear that individual societies in general are able to follow up and watch the cases in which aid has been given. It would be a grave mistake to check this voluntary work which does much good. But better and more practical results would be shown if there was closer and more skilled supervision over this branch of work as a whole. Either the responsibility of direction should be placed with the visiting committee, who would act under definite and uniform instructions from head-quarters; or the supervision should be given to the Inspector of Prisons or other officials appointed for the purpose. Facilities should be given to Prisoners' Aid Societies to follow up cases with the help of prison or police authorities both for the purpose of guarding against useless help being given to those who are re-committed, and of watching and assisting men and women really anxious to lead an honest life, and many of whom from one cause or another require something more than temporary assistance, and that in more than one locality, on discharge.

35. We are aware that official supervision and interference are likely to check voluntary effort if imposed without consultation and consent. We attach so much importance to the voluntary side of prisoners aid work, and its local character, that we do not feel in a position to formulate proposals which we have not had the opportunity of laying before the representatives of the societies collectively. The subject is of very wide scope, and requires a special study by itself. We think that some competent person should be deputed to visit every prison for the purpose of ascertaining the character and working methods of the society or societies existing in the neighbourhood whether or not attached to the prison, which take up prisoners aid work.
8287. His report having been received, a scheme for the better organisation and supervision of the societies might be drawn up, and in any case it would be desirable to hold a representative conference in London for the purpose of securing common and uniform action, providing for the most effectual distribution of the Government grant; and for stimulating the considerable number of societies which do little work or exist but in name. cf. par. 124.

While we refrain from formulating a plan for the management of the societies, there are certain matters in connexion with the subject upon which we desire to express a definite opinion.

36. We think it most desirable that further facilities should be given to accredited representatives of bonâ fide societies to see the prisoners before discharge. It is not advisable that prisoners should think that various agencies are competing for their patronage. But under the present system and with certain exceptions, prisoners are not seen before discharge. They leave the prison, and at the gate may find the agents of various societies waiting for them. Prisoners who are just released, with some money earned in prison in their pockets, and who perhaps see their old associates waiting for them, are too often not in a mood to receive friendly advice and assistance. It would be far better that if they can be persuaded before leaving prison to see the society's officers, they should be brought under this influence before release. The scramble at the prison gates would be avoided, and a better chance secured of persuading them to give up criminal practices. We recommend that prisoners should be shown a list of societies and their agents who are ready to help them, a week or more before discharge, and that they should be allowed to see the agent of the society which they prefer. We also think that if any bonâ fide society applies for permission to see a prisoner before discharge, leave should be given, provided that the prisoner consents. As Prisoners' Aid Societies are charged to a considerable extent with the responsibility of seeing to a prisoner's position after discharge, it is advisable that they should be consulted upon the kind of work likely to be most useful to the class of prisoners to be found in the particular prison. 47,762, 7103 sq., 7225, 7263, 10,500, 8791, 8977, 9617. 3072. 7102, 10,064, 8280. 10,296. cf. par. 111.

We think that the Government grant might, with advantage, be increased, and in any case it should be made applicable in the case of societies which conduct establishments for the reception and training of discharged prisoners on principles approved by the Government, and which can show that their efforts are practically successful. 10,298–10,308. cf par. 71.

Prison Offences.

37. Speaking generally, we are of the opinion that the present regulations governing punishments for prison offences have worked as well as could have been expected. As Sir G. Lushington said, every form of punishment is objectionable. Whatever may be said or proved against the nature or amount of punishment, the broad fact remains that the great majority of prisoners serve their time without any punishment at all. These are the figures for the year ending March 31st, 1894 :— 776–93, 1863. 10,330.

And the following return well illustrates the fact that a considerable proportion of convicts earn their whole remission.

38. During recent years there has been a distinct move forward in the direction of mitigating the severity of prison punishments. The use of the entirely dark cell has been discontinued since the publication of the Report of the Royal Commission on Irish Prisons in 1884; and the following figures show that corporal punishment has decreased in a striking degree in local prisons. In convict prisons the total number of instances also shows a marked decrease, but the percentage remains about stationary. It must, however, be noted that the convict population has been much reduced, but that there remain much the same number of hardened criminals of a low type.

This return relates to male prisoners alone.

NOTE.—Since January 1887, convicts have been detained in local prisons to undergo the first nine months of their sentences.

The figures for 1872–3 and 1883–4 are obtained from the Judicial Statistics, and for 1893–4 from the Reports of the Commissioners of Prisons and the Directors of Convict Prisons.

180, 189. 39. From time to time changes were made towards leniency by Standing Orders, which, according to Standing Order No. 94, produced no disadvantage. The same Order stated that as the result of experience "discipline is not better maintained by "resorting commonly to severe punishment, which should be reserved for use when "milder means have been tried unsuccessfully, and when it is necessary to apply "them on particular occasions."

This opinion of the Commissioners carries much weight, and it strengthens our belief that the main fault of our prison system is that it treats prisoners too much as 1521, 1871. irreclaimable criminals, instead of as reclaimable men and women.

3073, 9638–42. 40. Some competent witnesses attribute a number of offences to the nature of prison life, and this view was supported by the evidence of Mr. E. It is impossible 10,331, 8997. to conceive any system of prison discipline adequately coercive which should reduce or lead to absolute submissiveness a class of men whose previous lives have conclusively shown that when not under restraint they are unable to observe the laws and regulations of social life. Bearing this in mind and given the fact that prison life necessarily means continuous and severe discipline, it is evident that the number of prisoners who receive no punishment during their service is a remarkable tribute both to the character of the discipline maintained, and to the tact and forbearance of the prison staff. The evidence of governors, chaplains, and medical officers generally was favourable to the present practice. Recommendations have been made to us in favour of the increase of workshop labour, the abolition of the crank and treadwheel, the abolition of the rules of dark cells in convict prisons, the prevention of crowding in 3096. chapel, the improvement of prison food, and the instruction of prison officers. We shall deal hereafter with penal labour; and other suggestions are dealt with more 1458, 1518, 2129, 5837. or less in our general recommendations. We think that the No. 1 diet punishment should be inflicted with great care, especially in the case of women. Undoubtedly, 1963. it tends to lower the system, and this in itself is most undesirable. Mr. Walker, the Governor of the Liverpool Prison, objected to dietary punishment altogether for women. We should be glad to recommend at any rate its partial abolition if we could see our way clearly to any definite substitute for it. We are disposed to think, and more particularly if our recommendations are accepted, that the best solution 5091. would be a more frequent infliction of loss of privileges such as those mentioned under prison occupation.

10,419, 10,426. Under the present rules while a governor cannot inflict more than three days bread and water diet in succession, after which must come an interval of 24 hours, the visiting committee can for a single offence sentence a prisoner to 14 days in a punishment cell with No. 1 bread and water diet, alternating every three days with No. 2 or 3 diets. We think that according to the intention of the Act of 1877, a prisoner should only be committed to a punishment cell on penal diet for 14 days; and an interval of at least three days should elapse before any additional period is imposed in respect of a fresh offence, or an offence distinct from that for which the punishment was inflicted, and this second period should only be inflicted with the sanction of the medical officer. We further think that in the case of a prisoner committed by the Visiting Committee to a punishment cell who expresses contrition, and whose contumacy the governor considers to be ended, means should be adopted in concert with the Visiting Committee to cancel or suspend the remainder of the sentence without unnecessary delay.

41. We have made special inquiries as to whether offences are committed in consequence of the petty tyranny or harshness of warders. It is only in human nature that there should be instances of unfair and unwise treatment of prisoners by warders in their constant daily personal relations with them. Every governor testifies as to the varying qualities of his warders. We deal later on with the general question of their fitness, but it is only a matter of justice to them to say that, so far as we have been able to find out, as a body they discharge their most difficult and responsible duties with forbearance and kindness. On special inquiry, for example, at Dartmoor and Portland, we find that the following number of complaints were made by prisoners against warders:—

NUMBER of COMPLAINTS made against OFFICERS by CONVICTS now at DARTMOOR and PORTLAND CONVICT PRISONS respectively during the year 1894.

Nature of Complaint.	Dartmoor.	Portland.
For violence	5	2
For abusive language	5	2
For unjust reports { for talking	—	7
For unjust reports { other offences	3	19
Total number of complaints	13	30
Total number of convicts in custody	1,028	1,066

No doubt, as Mr. Davitt pointed out there may be many individual cases of hardship in which the prisoners, for obviously possible reasons, are afraid or unwilling to complain. But we consider this return under the circumstances to be very satisfactory, bearing in mind that several times in every day of the year the warders were brought into personal relation with a total number of 2,094 convicts.

It is the rule in convict prisons, and in local prisons in respect to convicts, for every convict who comes under report to have his name placed in a report sheet, on which is entered a statement of the investigations made and the punishment awarded. At the end of the week these sheets, containing the records of every report and how it has been dealt with, are sent up to the Home Office for the review of the Directors. According to the evidence this is a better system than that which is adopted in the case of local prisoners, and is well calculated to ensure that the punishments inflicted by the governors are legal and proper. We think that it should be adopted generally in the local prisons. 11,747.

The Case of the Prisoner J. E.

42. In the course of his evidence Mr. Morrison stated that certain prisoners had been sent from Wormwood Scrubs to Wandsworth, whose record of punishment was "something awful." In particular he instanced the case of J. E., who had, in his opinion, received inhuman punishment, though doubtless inflicted with the best of motives. We thought it our duty to inquire into J. E.'s case, as the punishment which he had received appeared unusual, severe, and excessive. It is impossible for us to express an opinion as to the nature and amount of punishment which the case required. The actual punishment was most severe, but Mr. Morrison's impression about the condition of this man when he arrived at Wandsworth was not confirmed by 3080. 3086. 3082.

Hard Labour as a Punishment.

The question of hard labour as a punishment we deal with under the general head of prison labour.

Mark System.

1884, passim. Royal Commission, Irish Prisons, 1885, Report, par. 130. 2591. 43. We think that the mark system works well. We were given to understand that it is the practice to restore marks forfeited by inadvertence or some trivial offence subsequently compensated for by diligence and good conduct. We think that great care should be taken to observe this practice. We also are of the opinion that prisoners should not forfeit marks by reason of physical or mental weakness or illness. The Royal Commission of 1885 on Irish prisons laid great emphasis on this, and quoted at length a passage from the report of the Penal Servitude Acts Commission of 1879, which strongly adopts a similar view.

212 sq., 235, 9811, 10,385. 44. We considered whether the power to earn remission of sentence should be extended from convict to local prisons. It is difficult to see the logic or the advantage of allowing a three year convict to earn a remission of one-fourth of his sentence, and of forbidding a local prisoner sentenced for 18 months or two years to earn any remission. We suggest that the remission system might be extended to local prisoners sentenced to the longer periods, but this recommendation should be considered in connection with the general question of the amalgamation of the local and convict prison systems which we deal with later.

Prison Labour.

45. It has been necessary to go at length into this branch of the subject, both because of its great intrinsic importance and because in previous inquiries it has been passed over with but little notice. It resolves itself into two main parts—

I. Unproductive labour, cellular or associated;

II. Productive labour;

(a.) Cellular.

(b.) Associated.

Convict Prisons.

46. In the first instance it will be convenient to deal with the case of convict prisons so far as labour therein presents any special features. For the first nine months of their sentence, convicts, whether confined in local or convict prisons, are kept in isolated confinement. For the first month they are kept at first class hard labour, and are subsequently engaged at oakum picking, matmaking, tailoring, or any suitable work which it is found possible to give them. After nine months all prisoners, unless physically disabled, or found specially qualified for other work, are put to associated labour in public works, quarrying, farming, land reclaiming, and so forth. The special difficulties encountered in local prisons, do not as a rule arise, owing to the prisons being situated in open country or in close proximity to large public works, and to the fact that the longer sentences enable prisoners to be trained in productive industries. Scarcity of labour does occasionally occur, but difficulty of this kind is only to be met by activity in forethought and organization in the conduct of the prison industries. It should be noticed that female convicts are not employed upon the public works, and the work found for them is much the same as that which is given them in local prisons. We have no recommendations to make affecting convicts only, and pass on therefore to local prisons.

Local Prisons.

47. Unproductive Labour.—In the consideration of this question we start from the principle that prison treatment should have as its primary and concurrent objects, deterrence, and reformation. It follows, therefore, that it is desirable to provide labour which in conjunction with the general prison discipline does not impair the one, and which does include the other. Applying this general conclusion it necessarily follows that unproductive labour, and under this term we include all purely mechanical work on cranks or treadwheels, and, in the case of women, oakum-picking, except as a punishment, should be entirely abolished wherever possible. We are compelled however to admit that no satisfactory alternative has yet been suggested. The Prison Act, 1865, provided that every prisoner of 16 years of age and upwards who is sentenced to hard labour, shall during the whole of his sentence where it does not exceed three months, and during the first three months of his sentence when it exceeds three months, be kept at hard labour of the first class for such number of hours, not more than ten or less than six (exclusive of meals) as may be prescribed by the Visiting Committee, and during the remainder of his sentence shall be kept in like manner at hard labour of the 1st class, except where the Commissioners substitute hard labour of the 2nd class. This was subject to the medical report in each case. The Act of 1877 relaxed this law by enabling the Secretary of State to substitute for the last two months in either case hard labour of the 2nd class. First class hard labour is defined by the Prison Act, 1865, section 19, as the treadwheel, shot drill, crank, capstan, stonebreaking, or such other hard bodily labour as might be determined by the justices with the approval of the Secretary of State. As a rule, therefore, prisoners sentenced to hard labour are put to labour of the 1st class for one month. If, however, they subsequently refuse to earn remission by industry at hard labour of the 2nd class, they may for the whole term of their imprisonment be kept to 1st class hard labour.

Prisons Act, 1865, Sch. I. Reg. 34.

These figures show the number of prisoners sentenced to hard labour during 1893 :—

	Total.
	Males and Females.	Males.	Females.
Hard labour	109,044	85,034	24,010
Without hard labour	41,454	24,785	16,669

48. First class hard labour as at present carried on involves a mechanical and unvarying exertion for six hours a day for a month. While there was some difference of opinion, the tendency of the evidence was to the effect that the fact of the labour being unproductive or apparently so, causes the prisoners to look upon it with dislike and resentment. All classes of witnesses agreed that as an occupation it is most undesirable. Colonel Garsia concisely summed up its disadvantages: "I object to the "treadwheel and I will tell you why. First, I do not think it is a deterrent punish- "ment, and it carries with it the association of short sentence prisoners during their "first month. I do not think it is a deterrent punishment at all, and I am supported "in that by replies to many inquiries I have made. It is in the Act, but I do not "believe in the treadwheel at all. I do not think it elevates the prisoners morally. "It does no good physically. I think it brings into association the first offender "with the older offenders. It leads to association and talking, and I object to it." And Sir E. Du Cane thus writes of it: ". . . . . the punishment of hard, dull, useless, "uninteresting, monotonous labour. It is necessary to resort to this for its penal effect. "There is, nevertheless, a limit to the time during which a prisoner can be advan- "tageously subjected to it, for it is decidedly brutalising in its effect. To men of any "intelligence it is irritating, depressing, and debasing to the mental faculties; to "those already of a low type of intelligence it is too conformable to the state of mind "out of which it is most desirable that they should be raised." We have no doubt that as a general rule this is the case. But the strongest argument against this kind of labour is the fact that it keeps the prisoners in a state of mental vacuity, and this we regard as a most undesirable and mischievous result. The question is what can be substituted for it?

Punishment and prevention of crime, p. 175.

49. The large local prisons are for the most part situated in the heart of large towns, and labour has to be found within the prison walls. If the crank and treadwheel are abandoned, hard labour of the 1st class will be difficult and usually impossible to provide, unless arrangements are made for sending the hard labour men to prisons specially chosen in the country where they can be set to work on the land or at reclamation. This would involve considerable expense. Later on we make suggestions with regard to classification, which if adopted would remove from the large towns a considerable number of the younger prisoners while pari passu habitual offenders would be collected together and detained for long periods in prisons specially adapted for them. If this were effected, a considerable proportion of the hard labour prisoners would be concentrated, and the difficulty would to that extent be got rid of. For the present we recommend that every effort should be made to find work for prisoners which would be a fitting equivalent to hard labour of the 1st class as now defined, and that the mechanical labour should be discontinued wherever practicable. At Wormwood Scrubs the experiment has been successfully tried of giving women rough cloth to cut into squares for hearth-rugs. The work is much preferred by the matrons to oakum-picking.

Productive Labour.

289–334. 50. This falls under two heads—cellular and associated. There is much difference of opinion upon their respective merits. On the one side it is maintained that better discipline and a better moral tone are secured by keeping prisoners in isolation; on the other that associated work is a more natural state; that it is more interesting, and helps to keep the prisoners from morbid depression. Before pursuing the question of industrial labour it is necessary here to examine the arguments for and against association.

51, The fear of contamination has largely influenced the direction of prison management in foreign countries, as well as in England, for the last 50 years. When prisoners of all kinds were collected together, undoubtedly it was very great and led to much evil. We observe that in previous inquiries it has been generally assumed that the chief risk lay in the corruption of young by old offenders. We are of the opinion that there is at least as much danger of contamination among the younger prisoners. They are of the age when curiosity stimulates the inherited or acquired depravity which is so often found in young criminals. On this point the witnesses were in absolute agreement. However this may be we agree that great care is necessary with respect to all classes of prisoners, in order to prevent mischief arising from anything like free intercourse. On the other hand, the policy of isolation has its own special danger over and above those which relate to the moral and mental condition of the prisoners. It is not possible to prevent all communication between prisoners, and the effect of strict regulations is to lead to constant effort to escape the vigilance of warders. The worst minded men can to some extent succeed in communicating with other prisoners, and the evil is aggravated by the mischief arising from successful accomplishment of breaches of discipline.

311, 478, 2715, 3147, 3625, 6862, 9746, 10,838. 52. We do not agree with the view that separate confinement is desirable on the ground that it enables the prisoner to meditate on his misdeeds. We are, however, disposed to agree that the separate system as a general principle is the right policy. The separate system rests on two considerations only. It is a deterrent; and it is a necessary safeguard against contamination. But we are not of the opinion that association for industrial labour under proper conditions, is productive of harm. On the contrary we believe that the advantages largely outweigh the disadvantages. We agree, however, that careful supervision is essential to all forms of prison association. 6423. Subject to this condition and to a proper system of classification, Colonel Garsia, a prison official of great experience, stated in his evidence that there was no danger whatever in associated work. Dangerous, disorderly, and depraved prisoners should be kept at all times, so far as is possible, apart from others. The fears expressed by some witnesses that freer association might lead to combinations and risings, would under such precautions be groundless.

303, 1904–10, 2157, 2617, 2966 sq., 3147–50, 4424–5, 4590–3, 53. The association we suggest is all in the direction of making it the prisoners interest to maintain order, and we have before us the fact that association for work on a large scale has always been the practice at the convict prisons, without being productive of dangerous outbreaks by prisoners, as a class, more desperate than those in local prisons, we do not consider the suggested danger to be of practical importance. We think that this limited form of association is desirable for several reasons. (1.) It is a welcome relief to most prisoners from the dull and wearying monotory of the constant isolation which forces men back on themselves, and in many cases leads to moral and physical deterioration. (2.) It can be made in the nature of a privilege liable to suspension, and would be therefore a satisfactory addition to the best kind of available punishment. (3.) It materially lessens the difficulty of providing and organising industrial labour in prisons. Prisoners can be taught trades in classes, and they can then work in association under proper and economical supervision in regular workshops or halls provided for the purpose. (4.) It is more healthy. It is desirable that cells should be untenanted for some hours in the day, and in any case it is better that work which produces dust should not be carried on in the cells. 6423, 7135, 7260, 7421, 7952, 8507, 8518, 9252, 9815.

54. As against the expense of providing necessary rooms there would be probably increased profits from labour. We inspected the admirable workshops at Wandsworth, of which a plan is given in Appendix IV. We recommend that they should be provided in other prisons, and whenever possible on an extented scale. According to the evidence of Captain Helby and Captain Schuyler, and the Rev. W. D. Morrison, these workshops are of great assistance in the management of the prison, and no difficulty has arisen from association. 4594, 8507–12. 305, 316, 2966, 3146, 4101, 4586.

55. In recommending a wider adoption of associated work, we must admit that several competent witnesses expressed disapproval of the principle. Sir E. Du Cane laid great stress on the argument that the experience of every country has led up to the cellular treatment as the best form of punishment and imprisonment. But upon cross-examination it did not appear that they could sustain their objection to associated labour properly supervised, and they seemed to us to have formed their opinions rather because separation has been the accepted rule of the prison system than on any experience of failure of the association system. For these reasons we have no hesitation in recommending that the practice of association for industrial work should with due caution be extended gradually throughout the prisons. Satisfactory results must largely depend on the discretion of the prison authorities in making selections of prisoners for associated work; and in any case they would be materially assisted by a careful classification, such as hereafter we shall proceed to recommend. 823–45, 1428, 1757, 4197, 6865, 7076–82, 7261, 7415, 10,840.

Nature and Extent of Prison Industries.

56. According to the evidence, difficulty of a greater or less extent is experienced almost in every prison in getting a sufficiency of suitable work for the male prisoners. A chief reason for this is the shortness of the great majority of sentences. It is impossible to train short-sentence men in any skilled trade; and in many of the localities where the prisons are situated there may be little or no demand for the rougher products such as mats, sacks, &c., which can be turned out by the unskilled men.

This difficulty has been largely added to by outside agitation against competition of prisoners with free labour. In consequence of the agitation, and of proceedings in the House of Commons, some suitable industries and in particular mat-making have been to a large extent given up. From the prison point of view every witness without exception who was questioned on the subject agreed that this is a great misfortune.

57. We communicated with Mr. S. Woods, the general secretary of the Parliamentary Committee of Trades Union Congress, and by his suggestion we examined Mr. J. J. Rudge and Mr. J. H. Walker as representing the views of the majority of trades unions. These gentlemen gave very fair and impartial evidence. They admitted that industrial labour was morally and physically beneficial to the prisoners, and agreed that it ought to be found. They urged that direct competition with outside labour should not be allowed at "cutting" prices. Taking their evidence as a whole we gather that they approve of industrial training of prisoners; and bearing in mind that the products of prison labour go to reduce the costs of prisons, they have no objection to the sale of prison goods provided that (a) they are not sold below the market price for the district or the standard price elsewhere; (b) every consideration is shown to the special circumstances of particular industries outside to avoid all undue interference with the wages and employment of free labour. With these general views we agree. The witnesses admitted that the value of prison labour, which is estimated at from 111,000*l.* to 120,000*l.* per annum, including the domestic services of the prisons, is an infinitesimal proportion of the money earned by free labour throughout the country. Mr. Duncan, the store accountant in the Prison Department at the Home Office, to whom we are indebted for much clear and valuable evidence, stated that, taking the industries now practised in prison, and regarding a prisoner as equally 11,030–11,102. 11,053–56. 11,063. 11,071. 4336, 11,048, 11,049.

efficient with a free workman, which, of course, he is not, the abolition of unproductive labour and the employment of all now so engaged upon productive labour would only increase the interference of prison with outside labour in the proportion of 4484. 1 to 2,500. Broadly speaking, and taking into view the great importance of industrial training, this is a per-centage which the industrial workers of the country, we are persuaded, would be glad to ignore. We recognise, however, that appreciable competition may arise with respect to certain industries, as, for instance, mat-making, which appears usually to have produced the agitation against prison labour. The extent of competition in a particular trade depends obviously upon its relative proportion within the prisons and outside. Mat-making cannot be called one of the large industries of the country; but at the same time up to 1890 it was one of the chief employments in the prisons. In 1877–78 the number of prison mat-makers actually exceeded those outside by 23·87 per cent. In a case like this we think that the industry on account of its special value as a prison occupation ought not to be given up, but at the same time great care should be taken to avoid as far as possible any direct or material interference with the local markets of the home manufacture.

Passim. 58. Every witness bore emphatic testimony to the advantages of mat-making labour in prisons, and expressed the strongest regret at its withdrawal. It can be learnt in a few days even by unskilled men; it is specially adapted for cellular work and for the weak-minded and epileptic class of prisoners. Sir E. Du Cane in an interesting memorandum (Appendix IV.) traces the history of the industry, and shows that prison labour did not interfere with its general establishment in the country. Foreign competition arose, and it was under the stress of this that the attack, which in our opinion was made without reasonable consideration of the circumstances of the case, was made, and we regret that this most useful prison industry was reduced to its present condition.

59. In Appendix IV. are given full particulars of the nature and extent of the labour now performed in prisons, and the amount which is apportioned to prisoners according to their sentence, class, or stage. The most casual observer must see at a glance what exceedingly complicated difficulties are involved. Free untrammelled production to meet given demands is impossible. The capacities of prisoners range from a high standard to the very lowest to be found anywhere in an almost endless variety. These capacities or incapacities are again radically affected by the length and nature of each particular sentence. Further, the prisons are not located or constructed, neither is the staff trained or paid, for industrial purposes. Excepting the convict prisons, no single prison population presents any homogeneity or permanence. It is of a low order of physical and mental development; it is constantly changing, and in short it presents no favourable feature whatever for the development of industrial work. While we believe that a great deal can be done to extend prison industries and to improve their organisation, we should do a great injustice to prison officials if we did not emphatically recognise the zeal and energy with which under the most adverse conditions they have striven to make the best of the situation. After searching inquiry and personal investigation during the past year we are impressed with the extreme complexity of this particular subject upon which no one can be qualified to speak with any weight who has not given systematic and prolonged attention to it.

60. Prison industrial labour may be divided under three heads comprising that which is done (a) for the prisons and their population; (b) for other Government Departments; (c) for the outside public. We are not able to give the exact ratio but it might be approximately stated as three, two, and one.

Female Prisoners' Work.

61. The staple occupation of the female prisoners is laundry and other domestic work in the prisons for which they are well qualified. The prison washing is generally done by them, and sometimes outside work as well, the profit at Strangeways 5137. amounting to 1,000*l.* per annum. Knitting and needlework of all kinds give employment of the most convenient kind for isolated confinement, and it does not appear that there is much difficulty in providing the necessary amount of industrial labour. The laundry work is necessarily done in association, although the opportunities for communication are rightly much restricted both by close supervision and frequently by structural arrangements; and, so far as we have been able to ascertain, no inconvenience or evil has arisen therefrom. The evidence goes to show that this kind of work is often of the most beneficial kind, and we consider that this experience is a practical proof of the advantages of associated labour.

When the work is of the high class description taught in the Strangeways laundry or in the tailoring room at Woking it enables the prisoners to earn a living on discharge. But mere unskilled washing, cooking, or needle-work for prison use gives the prisoner no chance of suitable employment. Rough laundry work leads them into undesirable surroundings, and knitting and hand needlework cannot command a living wage. It is to be regretted that skilled instruction in the use of knitting machines is not supplied in all the local prisons containing many female prisoners.

It appears that female prisoners are frequently employed in cooking the food of the female staff. We think that this puts before them an undue temptation and that the practice should be discouraged. There are also obvious objections to employing prisoners on household work in warders' quarters. 534, 5341, 5868, 10,084.

Male Prisoners' Work.

62. It is noteworthy that prisoners after discharge do not as a rule follow a trade which they have learnt in prison. The main reasons for this, over and above ordinary falling back into bad habits, are no doubt the fact that prison taught labour is of a lower standard than outside labour, and the feeling that the employment is associated with prison life and that if they pursued it their fellow workmen would probably ascertain where they had learnt it. But we think that the training in orderly and industrial habits is of higher value than the teaching of a special trade. Mr. Duncan, who speaks with great knowledge of the industrial side of prisons, said: "I have a "great belief in the reformatory influence of productive labour. I hold with the "late Frederick Hill that it is the very life of a good prison, and I will advocate its "extension wherever possible." This view was held by the witnesses generally. Because we attach so much value to training we think that oakum-picking should be discontinued as much as possible except for penal purposes. It is disliked by most prisoners and is of the mechanical nature which involves no thought or mental activity, and it cannot be said to discipline prisoners into orderly and systematic habits of labour. An old offender will get through his oakum task rapidly and then do nothing. A new hand finds it difficult and probably looks upon it as degrading and irritating as well. 6548–65, 8320, 8332. 7945. 4423. 7134, 7256, 7805, 7930, 8514, 9670. 4428, 5367, 5811, 6298, 6965, 7425, 8519, 9673.

Quality of Prison Work.

63. The quality of prison work varies considerably, and success in turning out good articles depends upon the number of workmen in prison who possess, or through serving an adequately long sentence, can acquire the necessary degree of skill. It may be said generally that such articles as baskets, mats, sacks, pouches, belts, &c., are well and strongly made. The degree of efficiency attainable by long-sentence men can be seen in the account given by Colonel Garsia of the building of Wormwood Scrubs Prison, which is the greatest achievement of convict labour. A striking proof is here given of what can be done through efficient concentration and organisation combined with skilled instruction. 6419 sq.

Extension of Prison Industries.

64. We regret very much that there is not more opportunity for work in gardens or on the land. It is agreed by all medical experts and prison officials that no kind of employment is more useful. It is healthy, productive, varied, and of a more or less interesting character. Plain hard digging may under suitable conditions be found a valuable and wholesome substitute for hard labour, while the lighter forms of field and garden work would be adapted for other cases. 959, 1055, 2108, 2507, 2844, 4633, 6339, 8374, 8894, 8990, 10,250.

65. We recommend that the 160 acres* within the prison walls, as shown by Appendix IV., should be used as far as possible for gardening purposes as is already done at Wandsworth and other prisons, and we see no reason why prison yards, especially the portions set aside for women, should not be made less ugly by the cultivation of flowers and shrubs as is now done at Woking. Light gardening, moreover, would be a very advantageous form of employment and exercise for female prisoners. We notice that in prisons situated in agricultural districts there is a special difficulty in securing orders for industrial work. It would be desirable whenever possible to acquire 6035. 3981.

land adjoining such prisons for the purpose of labour. Under "classification" we make recommendations which bear on this point.

11,103–84. 11,420–75. 66. We are clearly of the opinion that very considerable additions may be made to the orders now given to prisons by Government Departments. We call attention to the evidence given by Mr. Collett, Colonel Barrington, Mr. Algernon Turnor, Mr. Primrose, and Mr. Bailey, on behalf of the Admiralty, War Office, Post Office, and Office of Works. Colonel Barrington gives a long list of articles which, judging by the work now actually done, he considers to be well within the capacities of the prisoners.

11,145. Mr. Primrose points out that a large amount of washing now done for Government in London might be made over to female prisoners or the inmates of rescue homes to the extent of from 3,000*l.* to 4,000*l.* per annum. Printing was an industry which was successfully carried on before 1877 at Gloucester; and in France the prisoners do a good deal of this work for the Government. It might be considered whether this work, which is now carried on at Parkhurst alone, and other occupations requiring training and skill, could not be developed in the convict prisons, so that other work suitable for men under shorter sentences might be set free.

To rescue homes carried on with the approval and under the inspection of the Department, Government work might with advantage be given more than it is at present.

67. The following figures, based on the numbers in local prisons on 6th March 1894, show per-centages which illustrate the difficulty arising from constant change:—

Remand or awaiting Trial.	Under One Month.	Under Six Months.	Under 12 Months.	Over 12 Months.	Total.
Males - - 10	22	41	17	10	100
Females - - 9	43	35	8	5	100
Both male and female 10	25	40	15	10	100

This difficulty would be considerably decreased if the classification we recommend is adopted.

Organisation of Prison Industries.

10,326, 10,549, 10,554. 68. The Prison Department and governors generally have striven hard to get orders and develop suitable prison industries. We cannot, however, but think that in this respect the organisation of the Department is defective. The responsibility rests generally with the Board; the supervision of the routine work, the issue and receipt of stores, the checking of accounts, and the formation of estimates, rests with the Store Accountant in the Prison Department of the Home Office. Mr. Duncan, who fills that office, gave us much interesting and valuable information. The duties of his office have been discharged with exceptional ability, and the system of accounts which Mr. Duncan has drawn up is adopted throughout the prison services of Scotland and Ireland as well as of England and Wales. We think that the official entrusted with the duty of supervising the industrial work both of convict and local prisons should have a higher degree of authority and responsibility. After consultation with governors he would have to distribute work according to local requirements and the capacities of prisoners, and would make contracts with the Government Departments, and be responsible for punctual delivery and an adequate standard of work.

4126, 4440–47, 4597, 6762, 4825, 7433. 69. If prison labour is to be developed it will be necessary to make better provision for the supply of skilled warders as teachers, and for the direct superintendence of industries in each prison. There are but a handful of artizan warders now in the service who draw pay as such, and warders who supervise or teach a trade have to pick it up themselves as best they can, and no extra pay is allowed them. To secure skilled teachers we think that a higher inducement should be offered than the ordinary pay of a warder, and we also think that warders who acquire sufficient knowledge to supervise anything in the nature of skilled work should receive an extra allowance. We think that the better training of prisoners in industrial work would go far to recoup the increased charge.

70. We do not think that a governor of an important prison can satisfactorily discharge his duties and, at the same time, be responsible for the organisation and supply of prison work. Some official should hold a position similar to that of "manufacturer" previous to 1878, with a more recognised position as director of the industries than is held now by the chief instructors. It might be considered whether the storekeepers might not be made use of for this purpose, if not in the larger prisons at any rate in the smaller ones. And in this connexion it might be considered whether it is not advisable to make a distinction between industrial instructors and warders. Mr. Hall, the acting storekeeper at Lewes, spoke strongly of the friction which now arises because of the clashing between the combination of disciplinary and industrial functions now imposed on warders. We think there is much force in his contention, and it might be well for the Prison Commissioners to consider whether an alteration of duties as between warders, instructors, and storekeepers might not be advisable and economical. We wish to draw attention to this, as it is a question of administration which could be best considered and treated in the usual way by the Prisons Department of the Home Office. 4784–88.

71. It is a question whether the gratuities which prisoners can now earn should be increased. We are not disposed to recommend that any material increase should at once be made; but we suggest that if the industrial work of prisons is extended and improved that the question should be carefully considered by the Prisons Department. For the present we think that the limitation in local prisons to 10*s.* is too restricted. A man can earn the money in six months, after which he has no special incentive to industry. We think he should be enabled to earn something continuously during his sentence, provided that the money is not all given to him on discharge, but subsequently through a prisoners' aid society, or in such way as the prisoners' aid society or the visiting justices may determine. These recommendations apply equally to female prisoners. 4658, 6760, 7410, 10,042.

Prison Occupation generally.

72. We think that there should be a larger supply of books, and that reading should not be restricted to one book a week if the prisoner cares to read more. All the witnesses agreed that it is desirable so far as is practicable to allow the prisoners to improve their minds by reading, and the only difficulty raised was one of distribution. This, however, is comparatively a trifling one, and can be readily overcome. The principle which we laid down as governing visits and communications also applies to the general occupation of prisoners other than that devoted to labour, meals, chapel, and other necessary prison duties. Everything should be encouraged which tends to elevate the mind so far as it is consistent with regulations necessary for the general order and discipline. So much depends upon the kind of population in a prison, and the individuals who compose the prison staff, that it is not possible to go into the matter in detail. These are really questions which should always be before the responsible authority in every prison, and no rules or regulations should be of that hard, unbending character which prevents the changes being made according to special circumstances which careful consideration shows to be beneficial for the prisoners. The monotony of chaplains' work in prisons is apt to produce a mechanical performance of duty, and we think that it would be advisable more often to bring in selected preachers from the outside, to remedy what not unfrequently must be a drawback both to chaplains and their congregations. It has frequently been brought to our notice that the chapels are overcrowded at the services. This is obviously undesirable, and we suggest that where it is possible the number of services which the prisoners have to attend should be reduced. This would enable the prisoners to be divided, each half going to chapel on alternate week days. Where there is a large male and female population we think that the services for women should be distinct from those held for men. 343, 1546, 1928, 2962, 3297, 3327, and passim. 10,028. 5770, 6508, 6897, 8524, 9536, 9864, 10,028, 11,209, 11,267. 1081–84, 2977–83, 6534, 9534, 9864.

Talking.

73. We inquired carefully into the rules which regulate talking in convict prisons. Except for the purposes of labour, male prisoners are not allowed to speak to each other throughout the whole of the time they have to serve. Female convicts are allowed to talk for at least an hour a day under proper supervision, and so far as we can learn no harm has resulted from it. We think that the privilege of talking might be given after a certain period as a reward for good conduct on certain days for a limited time, and under reasonable supervision, to all long-sentence prisoners, local as well as convict, who have conducted themselves well, and who are not deemed unsuitable for the privilege. The present practice of imposing silence except for the purposes of labour and during the visits of officials and authorised persons, for a period it may be of 2972, 4884–87, 5022–28, 9656–58, 9752, 9773.

15 or 20 years, seems to us unnatural. We recognise that careful supervision would be necessary if this privilege is allowed, but we do not think that the disadvantages which might, perhaps, from time to time occur would be at all equal to the good likely to result from a partial and judicious removal of this very unnatural restriction.

Education.

74. With regard to education, we think that better results would be obtained by establishing a practice of teaching in classes, and by extending tuition to the prisoners generally, who, it might be considered, would be the better for it. The present rule, by which only prisoners with a sentence of over four months are taught, excludes the vast majority of prisoners from the benefits of the system. In the Report of the Royal Commission on Irish Prisons the Commissioners express themselves very strongly on this point. They considered the cellular system "utterly useless and very defective." They recommended the adoption of some system for the instruction in classes of such prisoners as from their age, length of sentence, and conduct are likely to receive benefit thereby. With this opinion we entirely concur. We think that prison schoolmasters and schoolmistresses should not wear a uniform. Indeed we are inclined to think that they should not be discipline officers at all, and that sufficient attention has not been paid to their position and to the excellent influence which they might exercise over the prisoners were their authority and position extended. The teachers can sometimes succeed where the chaplain fails; at least they should be enabled to act in conjunction with and as auxiliaries to the chaplain.

75. The present practice does not admit of prisoners having exercise on Sundays. According to the evidence this is to allow a Sunday "off" to the warders. In other words the staff is not sufficiently strong to carry out Sunday exercise without an undue strain on the warders. We think that provision should certainly be made to overcome this difficulty. We suggest also that the simpler forms of gymnastic exercises on approved modern methods should be introduced into the prisons. Physically, prisoners are below the average in weight, stature, and strength. These exercises could take the place to a considerable extent of the monotonous walking, and would be a relief rather than otherwise to the warders. The beneficial effect of these exercises on all classes of prisoners, except the old and infirm, would be very great.

Nine Months' separate Confinement of Convicts.

76. In the consideration of several matters contained in the reference we had to touch upon the practice of confining convicts for nine months' solitary imprisonment either in local or convict prisons. Objection was taken by some witnesses to the presence of these men in local prisons, though others testified that no special difficulty was thereby caused. As, however, the practice establishes in certain local prisons, which are the collecting centres for convicts, a class of men who have to be kept distinct from other prisoners, and who require special individual treatment, we felt it necessary to investigate the reasons for the practice. The history of it is interesting and suggestive. It was originated in 1842 by Sir James Graham, then Home Secretary, and we have printed in Appendix IX. a letter written to the Commissioners of Pentonville Prison, in which he fully explains the purpose of the experiment he was initiating. We shall show how complete a change in the apparent object of the practice has since occurred.

Pentonville Prison Act, 1842.

77. Pentonville Prison was designed on new and approved ideas for the reception of convicts sentenced to transportation, and was to be restricted generally to those who were convicted of their first offence and whose age was between 18 and 35. What Parkhurst was for juvenile offenders Pentonville was to be for adults, a prison of instruction and probation rather than a gaol of oppressive punishment. It was the portal to the penal colony. The convict was to undergo 18 months' solitary imprisonment, but he was to be freely visited by chaplain and prison officials; he was to be trained in a productive industry; he was to be subjected to a progressive system of education on the class system; lectures were to be given to him in the prison chapel; he was to be kept in a state of cheerfulness; hope, energy, resolution, and virtue were to be imparted to him, and he was to be trained to be fully competent to earn his own way and become a respectable member in the penal settlements. If during the 18 months he behaved well he would at once receive a ticket of leave on arriving in Van Dieman's Land.

The whole letter is well worth reading, and it shows that whatever may be said of the faults of the prison system from time to time the then Home Secretary was as keenly anxious to devise the best methods of treatment in the interest of prisoners themselves as the most ardent prison reformer of the present day. Sir James Graham's plan was worked apparently with great success, so far as home treatment was concerned. We cannot follow out its permanent effect on the convicts in the penal settlements. In the Report of the Commissioners for Pentonville in 1844 the arrangements are thus described :—

"The size, arrangements, and ventilation of the cell in which the prisoner is placed, are favourable to the introduction of useful branches of labour, and such as greatly contribute to the maintenance of the prisoner's health and cheerfulness. He is, at all times, supplied with the means of employment; and when not required to be at work he has sources of improvement in the books, slate, and materials for writing, with which the cell is furnished. He is allowed daily exercise in the open air; he attends chapel daily, and the school classes in chapel on alternate days; and he can, at any hour of the day or night, by means of a bell, obtain in a few minutes the attendance of an officer.

"The effects produced on the minds and conduct of the prisoners by this system of separate confinement have been highly satisfactory. The prisoner, on entering his cell, has been strongly impressed with a due sense of his penal condition, especially during the first few months of his imprisonment; but the deterring effects are controlled and alleviated by the other parts of the system which we have already described; and more especially by constant labour, the frequent visits of the prison officers and trade instructors; the consciousness that he can, at any time, insure the attendance of an officer; daily exercise in the open air; attendance at chapel and school, and the means of instruction and relaxation placed within his reach."

Three classes were organised according to good, indifferent, or bad behaviour.

"A strong desire is evinced by the prisoners to be placed in the first class, and it has been deemed desirable that the best conducted of them should, at stated periods, receive some assurance that they are likely to attain this class. For this purpose at the end of six months of good conduct a red stripe is placed on the sleeve of the prisoner's jacket, and a second stripe is added at the end of a twelvemonth, if his conduct has continued to be satisfactory.

"It is a gratifying proof of their improvement, that of 425 prisoners who have been six months or upwards in confinement, there are but seven who have not received this creditable distinction."

The general results were thus described :—

"Most satisfactory proofs of these beneficial impressions have been manifested in the great improvement which has taken place in the moral condition and conduct of the prisoners within a short period of their reception. In the course of our visits to the cells we have had the gratification of witnessing, to a great extent, their just appreciation of, and the deep interest which they take in, the moral and religious instruction which is imparted to them; the removal of the debasing effects produced on their minds by their former criminal pursuits; their progress in self-improvement; their cheerful obedience to the prison rules; their acquirements in the trades which have been allotted to them; and their gratitude for the treatment they have received under a discipline which combines instruction and reform."

78. In 1848 it was determined that, 18 months being too long a period for isolated confinement, a system should be introduced based on a period of separate confinement, followed by a term of associated labour, with a maximum of 12 months. This was reduced by Lord Palmerston in 1853 to nine months. The original intention of Sir J. Graham, which was that this period should be primarily of a reformatory character, appears 15 years later to have been lost sight of. The isolated imprisonment was approved of by the Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1856, but without reference to its reformatory character, and they recommended that it should be applied to every sentence of penal servitude. Transportation was abandoned, and the convict prison at Gibraltar given up, and every convict since 1875 has had to serve his time at home. Under the Penal Servitude Acts from 1857 all convicts have to undergo the preliminary isolated imprisonment of nine months. Pentonville originally was the only prison for their reception; but subsequently Milbank, Wakefield, and Leicester were used for the same purpose, and at the present time the following prisons are used: Wormwood Scrubs, Chelmsford, Dorchester, Durham, Exeter, Wakefield, Leicester, Lewes, Reading, Winchester, Knutsford, and Leeds.

Penal Servitude Acts Commission, 1863, 259.

79. It would appear from Sir J. Jebb's evidence in 1863 that the main object of the separate confinement had come to be deterrence. "An educated prisoner," he said, "would much prefer separate confinement instead of being driven to associate with "people of bad character and difference in social position. With burglars and "reckless bad characters I think that separate confinement is dreaded more than "any other kind of discipline." It was given in evidence that owing to the demand for labour on public works, the nine months had fallen to an average of little more than seven. The Commissioners insisted on the necessity for enforcing the full nine months, and they proceed to say:—"We think, too, that though separate "confinement, even under the present system, is as has been said extremely "distasteful to convicts, this wholesome effect on their minds might be increased. "It has been already mentioned that in Ireland the diet is lower during the first four "months, and that no work is given to the prisoners for the first three months, except "such as is of a simple and monotonous character, in which they require little or no "instruction. This practice has been adopted because it has been found that by far "the greater number of convicts have no knowledge of any trade, and when first "taught one must necessarily be constantly visited by their instructor, whose visits "tend to mitigate the irksomeness of separate confinement. There appears to us to "be much force in the reasons which induced the directors of the Irish convict prisons "to adopt these means for rendering separate imprisonment more formidable, and we "therefore recommend that attempts should be made, with due caution, to give a more "deterrent character to separate imprisonment in the English prisons." This passage from their Report shows that Sir J. Graham's intention and scheme had perished, and that the period of imprisonment originally designed to train and improve prisoners for a good and useful life was now looked upon and intended to be the most formidable and coercive part of the punishment of penal servitude.

80. In effect this is the purpose which it must be regarded as now designed to serve. It must, however, be admitted that the evidence seems to show that the Commissioners and the officials of the prisons have not either a complete knowledge of the history of the matter or a very clear idea of its working and effect. It is certainly a practical convenience in the sense that the expense of sending convicts immediately after sentence to convict prisons, either singly or in small detachments, is curtailed by the system of gathering prisons. This consideration alone is not sufficient to justify the practice. The argument that it is a necessary discipline for penal servitude, if true, is no argument for sending the convicts to local prisons. We do not regard the system with favour. We see no objection to short periods of detention in local prisons for the purpose of collecting parties for transfer to the convict prisons, but if the system is a good one at all, we think it ought so far as possible to be worked out in the convict prisons from first to last. We think that it cannot be denied that cases occur in which a nervous condition, agitated by remorse and by a long continuance of the separate system, may be injuriously affected by it. From the evidence before us we have no reason to believe that such cases are of other than of exceptional occurrence. We think it is worth considering whether the severity of the system might not be mitigated by a substantial reduction in the period of separation and by the wise and carefully guarded introduction of such reformatory influences as were brought to bear on convicts at Pentonville when first established, and of such philanthropic agencies as appear to be engaged in behalf of separated convicts in the Belgian prisons.

81. Section 25 of the Prisons Act, 1877, provides that the Secretary of State may from time to time by any general or special rule appropriate, either wholly or partially, particular prisons within his jurisdiction to particular classes of convicted criminal prisoners. This power has been very sparingly used. First offenders are usually kept as far as possible apart from habituals; and juveniles under 16 are similarly treated, and, further, are not allowed to associate either in chapel or at work with the other prisoners. We lay the greatest stress on the fact that no adequate attempt has yet been made to secure a sound system of classification in local prisons.

82. Juveniles.—In the prison service a juvenile is a boy under 16 for whom special treatment is provided by the Prison Act, 1865. Several witnesses were in favour of the total discontinuance of committing this class of offenders to prison. We do not think this is practicable or desirable. For inquiry or on arrest children have to be detained. We strongly hold that it is most undesirable to commit them either to police cells or to workhouses. In many cases prisons are the only available places of detention. Further, we think that in the case of grave offences for which reformatories are not available, that imprisonment is necessary. At the same time children should be subjected to special treatment, and in every way be kept absolutely apart from other prisoners. But for the fact that the number of them is so small, the total number on March 31, 1894, being exactly 100, it would be desirable to keep them in parts of prisons specially reserved. It might be possible to do this in one of the London prisons. We think that the ordinary prison discipline and regulations should not be applied to juveniles, but that governors and the visiting committees should be made responsible for their treatment subject to general instructions which should be issued by the Secretary of State. The principle of these instructions should be that each child should be treated according to its own peculiarities of temperament; that the fact of imprisonment should be the main deterrent; and that treatment should be altogether of a reformatory character. We think that the age of 16, above referred to, should be raised to 17.

Prison Act, 1865, Sched., ss. 34, 35.

Sir G. Lushington brought to our notice a Bill brought in by the Government in 1891, in which were provisions placing liability for juvenile offences in certain cases upon the parents. A Court of Summary Jurisdiction was enabled (a) to fine a parent up to 1*l.*; (b) order the parent to pay compensation up to 5*l.*; (c) give security for the child's good behaviour. We think it most desirable that the Court should have those powers.

Summary Jurisdiction (Youthful Offenders) Bill, 1891.

83. First Offenders.—This term is open to much misconception. Presumably it is intended to mean those persons whose offence is the first known to be proved against them. While it is desirable to devote special treatment to them as a class, it should be recognised that many "first offenders" have probably been convicted more than once, and that several of those who are convicted for the first time have been to a greater or less extent engaged in criminal practices. We do not therefore think it desirable to lay down a hard and fast rule under which all "first offenders," as we believe the term is understood, should have the privilege of any special treatment. A certain discretion should be allowed to the prison authorities when the evidence is sufficient to distinguish between the bonâ fide first offender and the more dangerous criminals who technically rank in the same class. The "star class" of first offenders was instituted in the convict prisons in 1880, and has worked very well. We prefer, however, to deal with the larger and more important section of the class under the next head.

84. Young Prisoners.—Taking prisoners generally in local prisons, on March 31, 1894, there were 2,226 prisoners all told between the ages of 16 and 20; and there were 4,880 between 21 and 29 inclusive. We have expressed the opinion that, with few exceptions, no prisoners are absolutely irreclaimable. After 30 a very distinct decrease in the number of prisoners proportionately to the population of the same age sets in. Doubtless this decrease is due to various causes, but the fact that it occurs suggests that this tendency towards the abandonment of criminal practices may be strengthened by developing the reformatory side of prison life.

Judicial Statistics for 1893. Introduction.

In considering the comparative numbers of criminals at different ages it must be remembered that there is a strong tendency towards short sentences in the case of young offenders. The proportion of criminals convicted under 21 years of age is no less than 41 per cent. According to the Report of the Prison Commissioners the number of prisoners under 21 amounted only to 17 per cent.

Mr. Merrick and others hold that the younger prisoners are quite as difficult to deal with as the older; but assuming that this is so, the importance of saving them from a life of crime is not diminished, and it is all the more necessary to make the most strenuous efforts to reclaim them. As we have already said, the years 17, 18, and 19 appear to be the most fatal in the formation of lasting criminal habits. This fact itself denotes a degree of plasticity which might be made use of in the right direction. Even a moderate per-centage of success would justify much effort and expense devoted to an improvement of the system. The evidence of Mr. Trevarthen with regard to the Redhill Reformatory strongly supports the belief that a reformatory system, properly applied, would meet with success in the case of many young prisoners who are not deterred from crime by the present system.

We therefore recommend that the following steps should be taken:—

(a.) The age of admission to reformatories should be raised from 16 to 18, and of detention to 21. We make this recommendation on an assumption. We are not in a position to say whether or no reformatory schools are in a satisfactory state, and we respectfully venture to suggest that their condition should be looked into. But they have undoubtedly done good work. We assume that before the age was raised the satisfactory condition of the schools would be ascertained. And with regard to the raising of the age limit, the proposal would have to be looked at from the point of view of reformatory managers, as we only profess to recommend it on general evidence and from the prison point of view. It would in any case be absolutely essential that a careful and definite system of classification should be made, not only according to age but also according to individual character and physical development. Such a classification could be readily provided for, as is now the case at Redhill, where there are five separate houses. Or it could be arranged that certain reformatories should be set aside for lads and girls according to age and character, and supervised accordingly.

Under the present system reformatory managers are not obliged to take in lads or girls whom they think objectionable. And we believe that there have been instances of the lapse of sentences to reformatory schools for that reason. This is a weak point which requires to be dealt with.

(b.) We are of opinion that the experiment of establishing a penal reformatory under Government management should be tried. It should be begun on a moderate scale, but on a design which would allow of large expansion if the results were proved to be satisfactory. The Court should have power to commit to these establishments offenders under the age of 23, for periods of not less than one year and up to three years, with a system of licenses graduated according to sentence, which should be freely exercised. In the event of any inmate of a reformatory being contumacious and beyond the power of the managers to control, power should be given to a court of summary jurisdiction, on cause being shown by the managers, to transfer him or her to a penal reformatory for a period not exceeding the unexpired portion of the term which was to be served in the reformatory. And power should also be vested with the Secretary of State similarly to transfer prisoners under 23 from prisons to the penal reformatory, if satisfied that the treatment there would be more suitable to the particular case.

The penal reformatory should be a half-way house between the prison and the reformatory. It should be situated in the country with ample space for agricultural and land reclamation work. It would have penal and coercive sides which could be applied according to the merits of particular cases. But it should be amply provided with a staff capable of giving sound education, training the inmates in various kinds of industrial work, and qualified generally to exercise the best and healthiest kind of moral influence. We were unable to elicit from any witnesses a serious objection to the scheme. It is almost impossible to ascertain to what extent the Parkhurst Government Reformatory was a success. It died a natural death after the passing of the Reformatory Acts. It has been objected that Government was not qualified to take up work of such a philanthropic tendency. We do not agree with this in view of the higher degree of efficiency which reformatory schools have obtained under Government inspection and, to a considerable extent, control. Sir E. Du Cane thought the proposal to establish a reformatory of this kind for the older and the bad lads "a good idea." The initial cost of this experiment would not be great; it might lead to the closing of one or two prisons occupying valuable sites in large towns, an effect desirable in itself; and we do not hesitate to believe that it would draw upon the main source of habitual criminality to a very considerable extent. Special arrangements ought to be made for receiving and helping the inmates on discharge. It would be necessary to adopt a careful system of classification, which should limit the number of inmates in each building, as at the Redhill Reformatory, in order to insure proper individual treatment.

We look upon this plan, in conjunction with the raising of the age for admission to reformatories, as the best proposal that is open to us for the rescue of young offenders. Under the present system numbers of them come out of prison in a condition as bad or worse than that in which they came. They go out with the prison taint on them. The available prison staff and the rigid system of prison discipline, without any fault on the part of the officials, preclude the possibility of bringing to bear on the prison population the moral suasion and the healthy practical advice which we think could be exercised by a trained and selected staff in the penal reformatory. The inmates upon discharge would be provided for and looked after much as in the case of the lads and girls who leave reformatories, and if they relapsed into crime it would be of their own deliberate choice, in spite of every effort to save them, and they would subsequently be exposed to the far sterner penalties of prison life.

85. Habitual Criminals.—We recommend that this class of prisoners should be kept as a class apart from others. We think that they are a most undesirable element in a mixed prison population, and that they require and deserve special treatment. It is clear from the evidence that while the habitual prisoner is orderly and easily managed, the prison regime has little or no deterrent effect upon him unless he is subjected to long periods of imprisonment and penal servitude, which, however, frequently make him desperate and determined when again at large not to be taken alive. But there is evidently a large class of habitual criminals not of the desperate order, who live by robbery and thieving and petty larceny, who run the risk of comparatively short sentences with comparative indifference. They make money rapidly by crime, they enjoy life after their fashion, and then on detection and conviction they serve their time quietly with the full determination to revert to crime when they come out. We are inclined to believe that the bulk of the habitual criminals at large are composed of men of this class. The return given in paragraph 28 shows that when an offender has been convicted a fourth time or more, he or she is pretty sure to have taken to crime as a profession, and sooner or later to return to prison for the fifth time or more. The figures show that of all local prisoners in 1892–3, 50·9 per cent. were committed for the second time or more. The evidence of Mr. Troup shows that but for the failure in identification this per-centage would probably be considerably higher, and it also tends to show, as is to be expected, that the proportion of re-committals is much higher among prisoners sentenced for indictable offences. Upon the evidence given to us we are strongly of the opinion that further corrective measures are desirable for these persons. When under sentence they complicate prison management, when at large they are responsible for the commission of the greater part of undetected crime; they are a nuisance to the community.

To punish them for the particular offence in which they are detected is almost useless; witnesses were almost unanimous in approving of some kind of cumulative sentence; the real offence is the wilful persistence in the deliberately acquired habit of crime. We venture to offer the opinion formed during this inquiry that a new form of sentence should be placed at the disposal of the judges by which these offenders might be segregated for long periods of detention during which they would not be treated with the severity of first-class hard labour or penal servitude, but would be forced to work under less onerous conditions. As loss of liberty would to them prove eventually the chief deterrent, so by their being removed from the opportunity of doing wrong the community would gain. With regard to the locality of such institutions, we suggest that sites on estuaries or other places where there is ample scope for land reclamation, would be most suitable for consideration.

We have not attempted a definition of "habitual criminal." This is a question which necessarily must be taken in conjunction with our suggestion that a new form of sentence should be set up. To lay it down that a prisoner should be regarded as an habitual criminal does not meet the case. Coiners, receivers, and other criminals by profession, frequently escape detection for long periods, and it would be necessary to bring this class into the category of habitual criminals. For this purpose it probably would be necessary to give a certain amount of discretion to the Court.

86. Habitual Drunkards.—Under this head should be included most prisoners sentenced primarily for drunkenness. They are not criminals in the ordinary sense and should stand by themselves in a special category. Our inquiry entirely confirms the recommendation of the Departmental Committee on Inebriates, that magistrates should have power to commit for lengthened periods habitual drunkards coming before them. The physical craving for drink is a disease which requires medical treatment not provided by the present prison system. Apart from any places of detention which may be constituted by legislation consequent on the Report, we think that persons committed to prison for this offence should be collected in separate prisons, if possible, or otherwise in parts of prisons reserved for them. Special medical treatment should be applied to them, and they should be dealt with as patients rather than criminals.

87. Female Prisoners with Infants.—Special consideration is needed in the treatment of female prisoners who are admitted into prison with infants, or who are confined after entering prison. At present they are excluded from associated work. The infants should be in a crêche in charge of a warder, the mothers being admitted at fixed times, and otherwise employed like other prisoners. If ill-health makes it necessary for the mother to stay with the baby, they should be in a hospital cell. Their presence in the ordinary prison destroys discipline, as they will talk; they cannot be punished, and in every way they are exceptional cases. The present system of locking up the woman in a cell is unnatural, and has bad effects—physical and moral. Wide discretion should be allowed to the matron and doctor as to the removal of the child at nine months of age. In cases where the mother is not satisfied that the child will be cared for, it should either be retained in the prison, or the mother should be released with it.

88. Unconvicted Prisoners.—At present these persons are given rather better diet than convicted prisoners, and their friends are permitted to send them food in the prisons. We see no objection to this, provided that reasonable control is used to prevent any excesss, and that the general order of the prison is undisturbed.

The following figures show that a per-centage of 6·9 of persons received in local prisons are subsequently acquitted:—

The Royal Commission of 1884 on Irish Prisons went into this subject and made the following recommendations:—

"84. It has been stated to us that there seems to be no reason why untried prisoners, particularly prisoners who have been in prison for a long time, should be prevented from communicating with one another, provided they do so in the presence and hearing of the warders. We think that the existing powers of the visiting justices to sanction the exercise of untried prisoners together with other properly selected untried prisoners—if the arrangements and construction of the prison permit it—are sufficient to meet the complaint.

"85. We think that the Board might make some modification of their order under which the cell lights are put out at 8 o'clock, so that an untried prisoner, if he gave any satisfactory reason for wishing to do so, might continue to read or write until the final locking up of the prison.

"86. It has been alleged that untried prisoners are often not aware that they are entitled to have books from the prison library, and that books are not offered to them; and we think that care should always be taken to inform an untried prisoner, on his admission, that a library book will be supplied to him should he desire it."

We concur generally with these views. The 39th section of the Prison Act, 1877, is very distinct on this point. It declares that these prisoners "are confined for "safe custody only"; special rules are to be made "regulating their confinement in "such manner as to make it as little as possible oppressive, due regard only being had "to their safe custody." We cannot think that this provision has been adequately carried out, and in addition to the suggestions quoted above from the Report of the Royal Commission on Irish Prisons we think that the diet of unconvicted prisoners should be improved.

We are strongly of the opinion that suitable occupation should be provided for juvenile unconvicted prisoners.

89. Debtors.—This class is a very unsatisfactory one according to the evidence. They are kept separate from other prisoners, they are wholly idle, and there seems to be no sufficient reason why they should be more favourably treated than other prisoners. In any case they should be made to work to a reasonable if not penal extent. These points should also be considered in reference to surety prisoners. 6831, 9845, 10,397.

90. It will be observed that if our recommendations are carried out a comprehensive re-arrangement of the general prison population will have to be made. But we think very great improvement will accrue from the classification and consequent redistribution of prisoners. The special classes will be kept together, and it will be easier to apply to them the necessary special treatment. There will be less confusion, because, in the case of the young offenders in the penal reformatories, the habitual criminals and drunkards, those who undergo considerable periods of detention will be grouped together, and greater facility afforded of teaching them a skilled trade. Most prisons are, unfortunately, situated in large towns and populous places, and not unfrequently in the low-lying and less healthy localities. Such prisons are, no doubt, frequently placed as, in the case of Strangeways, in convenient proximity to the assize courts. It would, however, be an advantage if some of these as opportunity offered could be closed and the population transferred to prisons in country districts.

Intermediate Prisons.

91. The considerable success which is achieved through the practice of receiving female convicts in homes before their sentence has expired suggests the desirability of establishing somewhat similar institutions for the male prisoners who have served long sentences and for female prisoners leaving local prisons. These men frequently find it difficult to get work, and, before they find an opening, through meeting old associates they are apt to drift back into crime. The Royal Commission of Inquiry into Irish Prisons in 1885, although the evidence on the subject was conflicting, could not recommend the continuation of the Irish intermediate prison in its then condition. But they reported that the female refuge at Golden Bridge "had been carried on with "so great success that they saw no reason why the same principle should not be "applied in dealing with male convicts such as hitherto had been sent to Lusk." Of our witnesses Sir E. Du Cane and Mr. Ruggles-Brise were opposed to the plan; on the other hand, Colonel Plummer, the Governor of Borstal Prison, and Captain Wilson, one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Prisons, were favourable to it. We think that this is one of those questions which should be carefully considered departmentally. The intention of it is excellent, but on the evidence before us we do not feel justified in making a positive recommendation on the subject. We think, however, that if a small local prison with land attached was available for the purpose, it would be quite worth while to make an experimental trial of the system, which in the event of failure could readily be abandoned. It is in experiments of this nature that we think the present system has been deficient. The good results which might be achieved are well worth the trouble and the slight expense which would be involved in making them. Irish Prisons Commission Report, par. 119. 9033, 9618, 9869, 10,037, 11,027.

Health.

92. It has frequently been alleged that not only is the ratio of insanity far higher in prisons than among the general population, but that prison life itself is a potent cause in its development. It is indisputable that the ratio is higher. It is inevitable that it should be so. The average prisoner in height, weight, strength, and mental condition is markedly below the average of the outside population. It has also been pointed out that the per-centage of insanity has increased of late in the prisons more rapidly than in the case of the general population. In connexion with this fact, the Medical Inspector of the Prison Board states in his annual reports that the practice of sending insane persons to prison has largely increased. Upon these points, Dr. Bridges has been good enough to write a memorandum, which we append to this Report. As a Committee we do not feel that we are competent to form a judgment either on the comparative extent of insanity in prisons, or on the best specific methods of treating those whose mental condition is doubtful or who are obviously weak-minded. We have, however, arrived at certain general conclusions.

We think that an early opportunity should be taken of appointing an additional member of the Prisons Board, who should be a medical man, which new office should take the place of the present medical inspectorship. Detection of disease in its earliest stages taxes the skill of the practitioner to it fullest extent. In mental diseases this is especially the case. Here medical men of great skill and experience, but without any special training in this department of their art, are undoubtedly at a disadvantage. It appears to us that it might with advantage be made a condition of medical appointments in prisons that the candidate should produce evidence of having given special attention to the subject of lunacy. We are informed that in Belgium the services of physicians specially conversant with mental disorders are retained for the purpose of detecting cases of incipient insanity which might have escaped a less practised eye. Some step of this kind might perhaps be taken, especially with a view of inspecting convicts during their period of isolation.

In some of the larger prisons it appears to us that the work incumbent on the medical staff is such as to render it very difficult for them to give the detailed and prolonged attention to individual cases, which alone can secure the sifting out of such as require special treatment. This is most obviously the case at Holloway, where the number of cases requiring special attention is unusually large. Indeed, in a prison so circumstanced, it appears to us that the medical staff should be assimilated to that of a lunatic asylum.

On the curative and preventive effects of out-door exercise and labour all our medical witnesses were practically unanimous. There are undoubted obstacles to this in the limited space which surrounds most prisons, and in the fact that the supervision of prisoners in the open air necessitates some increase in the staff of warders. Nevertheless, we regard the object in view as so important as to justify great efforts and some expense, with the view of effecting it so far as may be practicable.

Lewis, 9109. Shaw, 6027–28. Nicolson, 9305.

93. There remains the case of weak-minded prisoners, a class whose treatment has always been found to present peculiar difficulties, and which supplies about 2 per cent. of the prison population. Sentenced for the most part for very short terms of imprisonment, they are discharged only to return a few days afterwards; or in other cases they spend their lives in circulating between the prison, the asylum, and the workhouse. We agree with Dr. Nicolson and other witnesses that it is desirable that a special institution should be established for this class. To carry this out is a matter of considerable difficulty. The prisoners under consideration are to be found in small numbers in almost every prison, and a large proportion of them are under very short sentences. But it is most desirable that provision should be made for the concentration of these persons in a separate prison if possible, otherwise in portions of prisons where they could be under special observation and treatment. It is indeed a question whether the epileptic and obviously weak-minded class should be sent to prison at all. They cannot be said to be fully responsible for their actions, and when they take to crime it would be better for them and for the community that they should be sent to some special institution in the nature of an asylum, where they might do light work under detention, the period of which might vary according to their physical and mental condition.

94. In paragraph 94 of their 17th Report, the Prison Commissioners record a previous recommendation that "with the calendars of prisoners for trial furnished at "assizes and quarter sessions a report should be furnished in each case in which it is "desirable that anything particular in the health of the prisoner should be known to "the judge or magistrates, and if due effect is given to the above circular,* "magistrates exercising summary jurisdiction as well as the higher criminal courts

" will have before them information necessary to them in exercising their judgment " as to the disposal of a prisoner brought before them."

We think that effect should be given to this recommendation.

Dietary.

95. With regard to the various classes of prison dietary as fixed in 1877–8, the only one which appears to us to call for remark is No. 1, which consists of one pound of bread and a pint and a half of stirabout daily; the stirabout containing 3 ozs. of Indian meal and 3 ozs. of oatmeal. This diet is given to prisoners sentenced for seven days and under, and also for the first week in the case of sentences of more than a week and not exceeding one month.

The stirabout appears to be so distasteful to a large proportion of prisoners that very much of it is rejected. We found on our visit to Pentonville Prison that this was the case, and many other witnesses from other prisons confirmed this experience. A short period of low diet followed after a few days by a long continuance of one that was more substantial would not be likely to be prejudicial. But as a considerable number of prisoners are sentenced for a week or less, and after discharge are re-admitted repeatedly at short intervals, this very low and distasteful dietary becomes in their case practically continuous. And as it is among such prisoners that cases of mental instability and unsoundness are most commonly found, we feel inclined to endorse the view expressed by the medical officer of Holloway Prison that this part of the dietary should be reconsidered.

Small Cells in certain Convict Prisons.

96. We understand that the small cells in Portland and Dartmoor Prisons have already been condemned. We consider them unsuitable in every way, and trust that they will soon be replaced by cells which are larger, better ventilated, and more solidly constructed. 1251–62, 8759, 9645.

Administration.

97. Deputy Governors.—At present the rule is that a deputy governor should be appointed in prisons where the male population exceeds 700. In considering the principle on which deputy governors should be appointed, the main question is as to what is expected of a governor. Efficient governors can easily manage the largest prisons if they are not expected to have personal knowledge of the majority of prisoners under their care. As, however, we consider that a governor or his deputy should be brought into close personal relations with prisoners, and as this is the aim of all governors who take an interest in their work, we think that a deputy governor should be appointed in all prisons with a population of 600, whether male or female. 83, 715, 750, 1135, 1808, 2654, 2955, 4177, 5102, 7478, 9883 sq., 10,341 sq.

98. Chief Warders in Charge.—We found some difference of opinion on the present practice of appointing chief warders in charge in prisons with a population of less than 100. We see no objection to the promotion of competent chief warders or prison clerks to these posts, provided they show exceptional qualifications, but we think that they should rank as governors or assistant governors. There are already four classes of governors, and a fifth might be added. We do not think, however, that this class should be necessarily selected from the warder and clerical ranks. 770, 771, 1826–31, 2043, 7993, 9217, 9387, 9852–55, 10,474, 10,804.

General Prison Staff.

99. As we have already said we are not specifically directed to consider the question of prison staff, but the proper treatment of prisoners is so closely bound up with it that we think it necessary to state our views generally on its strength and quality. Penal Servitude Acts Commission, 1879, Report, 146–8.

If our recommendations are adopted considerable changes will have to be made in the prison system. We are not prepared to say what, under new conditions, would be the adequacy of a staff. That would have to be ascertained upon the practical working of the new system subject to the main principles upon which these changes would be based. 178.

100. It has been frequently alleged that the military or naval service, antecedent to prison appointment of many of the higher officials and of warders, while conducive to the maintenance of rigid order and discipline, does not give the qualities of tact and forbearance which are necessary to secure a moral influence over prisoners. 798, 1889, 2601, 4646, 6955–58, 7465, 8130, 8230,

We have inquired into this, and we do not consider that under the present system in regard to warders there is any appreciable difference in the merits of those who before entering the prison service were in the army or navy and of those who were civilians. As a matter of fact, excepting the convict prisons, the military element does not predominate. Of 143 governors and deputy governors, 52 have served in the army, navy, or marines. Of 1,269 subordinate officers, 556 have had military or naval service and 713 were civilians. On the other hand, in the convict prisons the civilian officers number 259 as against 431 ex-naval or military men.

While the civilians predominate among the whole body of governors and deputy-governors, we notice that since 1877 the number of military and naval officers appointed largely exceeds the number of civilians. Military and naval training undoubtedly develops capacities for organisation and the maintenance of discipline, but we do not consider it to be by any means essential to the qualifications of a prison governor.

101. We have inquired into the allegations of brutal or harsh treatment by warders. Whatever care may be taken in the selection of any considerable body of men, mistakes must be occasionally made. We are satisfied that the cases of gross ill-treatment by warders which have occurred are very few in number, and that the harshness which is frequently imputed to the warders ought to be attributed rather to the compulsory enforcement of minute regulations than to any want of humanity on the part of the men themselves. Mr. Tallack, who presented to us the views of the Howard Society, made what appeared to be a serious charge against some of these officers. He was, however, unable to show that there was any ground for the charge other than the general à priori argument that in a large body of men there must be some black sheep. In App. IX. will be found the Report of the Commissioners on specific allegations made by Mr. E., whose evidence was characterised by clearness and intelligence. Our finding on this point is supported by the views expressed by ex-prisoner Mr. D. and Mr. Michael Davitt.

102. We think that the members of the general prison staff have discharged their duties consistently and well, and that since 1877 a more uniform standard of efficiency has been maintained. Having regard, however, to the delicacy and difficulty of prison work, it is most essential that that efficiency should be raised as high as is practicable. We do not think that the period of three months' probation is a sufficient test of a warder's qualifications; nor do we think it desirable that deputy governors should be appointed to very responsible posts without any training in the prison service. The practice in other countries of training prison officials should be followed. For example, in France nominations for the superior staff are given after examination. For the inferior staff there are a school in Paris and elementary schools in various establishments. In Germany warders have to pass through a probationary service of six months. In Austria the higher officials, after three months' service, have to appear before the Procurator-General for an oral examination, presenting at the same time a full report of their probationary work from the governor or manager of the prison in which they served. Warders have to undergo at least one year's probation, at the end of which they have to undergo an oral examination. In Belgium prison governors, as a general rule, are selected from the administrative staff after a minimum service of 10 years. They are examined in the theory of prison treatment, and in all subjects the knowledge of which is necessary to prison management. They have then to undergo at least a year's probation either as assistant director in a central prison or as director in a prison of less importance before their nomination is finally confirmed. The discipline officers serve six months as probationers. If they show the necessary qualifications they are subsequently appointed as third-class warders, but the appointment is not confirmed until after a further period of six months. In Sweden the warders are selected with great care, and preference is given to those who have learned a trade or show skill likely to be of use in directing the prison industries. The maximum age is 30 years. It has not been deemed necessary or even advisable to establish any special training school for warders. Experience has proved that efficiency in the management of prisoners is best acquired in the prisons themselves. But in order to raise the moral and intellectual standard of the men who are already in the service, lectures and classes have been instituted in the central prisons. These are held by the chaplain and the schoolmasters, and the subjects, taught or treated in lectures, are such as may be of an educational or practical value to the warders in the discharge of their important duties. The central penal establishments have special libraries for the warders, and every year a great number of suitable and valuable books on religious subjects, temperance, history, biography, &c. are sent out to those libraries, as well as to those intended for the use of prisoners.

103. We think that two or more prisons should be selected to serve as training schools for all ranks of the prison staff. These prisons should be under the control of the most experienced officers in the service, and those in training under them should go through a course of systematic and scientific instruction. Lectures should be given by experts in criminal anthropology, and every man who enters the service should have a clear knowledge of what can and ought to be done in his personal dealings with prisoners over and above the formal discharge of his routine duties. Deputy governors, including all prison officials nominated for promotion to the rank of governor, should also pass through a probationary period in these training prisons, and should have to prove competent knowledge of prison management both in theory and practice. The giving effect to this scheme would necessitate the engagement of men younger than most of those who are now appointed; and they would, as a rule, be unmarried when they enter the service. As Sir E. Du Cane pointed out, married men with families would not be expected to move to and from their training schools. Female warders being unmarried, this difficulty would not arise in their case. We recommend that these establishments should at once be organised; that all candidates for the prison service should be passed through them; and that so far as is possible present members of the staff should undergo a certain amount of training in them. A more convenient way of extending the benefits of these training prisons to the existing staff would be by organising a regular series of addresses to the staff on prison treatment in all the larger prisons, and in the offering of prizes for the best papers by the officers on various branches of prison management. These centres could also be used for training members of the discipline staff in various branches of industry to the extent necessary to enable them to direct and supervise particular industries in the prisons. If these centres were established in large towns there would be no difficulty in securing experienced artizans as practical teachers. There is no doubt that under such a system a class of prison warders would be produced of considerably higher qualifications than are now possessed by the prison staff, and an increased scale of pay would be necessary. Candidates for the prison service while serving their time as probationers ought not to be reckoned as belonging to the prison staff.

Strength of present Staff.

104. Limiting our view to prison work as now carried on, we think the whole staff is somewhat under-manned. This remark only applies to certain prisons. In many local prisons there is not enough work for the officials to do, owing to the small number of prisoners. On the other hand, in many large prisons the conveying of prisoners and attendance at police courts and assizes often impose a severe strain on the staff. And when for one reason or another at the same time there comes an unusual influx of prisoners, the undesirable practice of getting in outside temporary assistance has to be resorted to. In recent years the number of officers temporarily employed has been much diminished (see App. VIII). The general testimony of such witnesses as came before us was to the effect that the hours of duty were not too long. But as the specific question of hours of work was excluded from our reference we were unable to take the evidence of warders themselves on this point. Our inquiry here was limited to the consideration whether the temperament and conduct of the staff were unfavourably affected by undue strain and reasonable dissatisfaction with their conditions of work. No evidence of a conclusive kind was given showing that this was so, with, perhaps, the exception of Holloway. But we feel bound to express the opinion that the hours of duty of warders generally amount to the maximum which could reasonably be imposed, and further that if a warder is expected to make a constant mental effort to deal kindly and wisely by all the prisoners under his charge it is too much to expect him to maintain this effort throughout the time which he has now to work. This matter, however, would have to be fully considered in the event of our recommendations being adopted. We think under the present system a larger reserve margin should be maintained to meet exceptional pressure, and also that sleeping in prison, with the liability at any time to be summoned to the cells, should reckon for pay.

10,352. 804, 1469, 1768, 1895, 2602, 2463, 3057, 3927, 4259, 5399, 5827, 6953, 5872, 6328, 6476, 6842, 7447, 7964, 8126, 8199, 8906, 9008, 10,085, 10,129, 10,765.

105. These considerations apply with equal or greater force to the women warders. Women prisoners require more careful attention than men, and we think that the proportion of the warder staff should be raised from 5 per cent. to 7 per cent. in the prisons with a large female population, and where there is a rapid change of prisoners, as at Holloway, Manchester, and Liverpool. In the male prisons night watchmen are appointed whose duty it is to answer the prisoners' bells. This practice is also in force in the female side of Wormwood Scrubs prison, and it should be made general. In many small prisons two or three female warders are often retained when the average number of female prisoners is hardly higher. Colonel Garsia showed the difficulty of avoiding this condition of things, but we think a freer system of drafting female prisoners to certain centres would be more economical and would scarcely be objected to. We considered carefully the positions of the prison matrons. It would seem only right that they should rank as governor in their own prison side. But it is represented to us by them that the governor or acting governor, who may be the chief warder, must hold the ultimate responsibility for the discipline of the entire prison, and that on emergencies the matron has to look to him and to the male staff for support. Under these circumstances it is thought best to leave the relations between the heads of the male and female sides of prisons as they are. No friction has arisen; the matron is indisputedly the managing and responsible chief of the female side; this all governors and acting governors are expected to recognise and do recognise; and we have every reason to believe that they treat the matrons with the courtesy and consideration due to them. In all prisons where there are a large number of women provision should be made for a deputy matron to take charge in the matron's absence. We think it is quite unnecessary that prison matrons should wear a uniform dress. They should also be named in the printed returns relating to prisons.

106. Care should always be taken to provide the members of the prison staff with reading rooms and means of recreation not inconsistent with discipline. We attach the greatest importance to the consideration of the physical and mental condition of the warders. To overwork them by long hours and undue strain; to tempt them thereby to a machine-like and perfunctory discharge of their duties; to impair their cheerfulness and depress their spirits must produce much unfavourable and far-reaching results on the prisoners under their control and on the general prison system.

107. We now enter upon one of the most important and difficult matters which we have had to deal with, namely, the higher administration of the prison system by the Commissioners, the Visiting Committee, and the inspectors of prisons.

Visiting Committees.

108. The framers of the Prisons Act of 1877 did not limit the right of entry into prisons to the Visiting Committee. Before taking into consideration the duties of Visiting Committees we think it advisable to quote section 15 of the Act—

> "Any justice of the peace, having jurisdiction in the place in which a prison is situate, or having jurisdiction in the place where the offence in respect of which any prisoner may be confined in prison was committed, may, when he thinks fit, enter into and examine the condition of such prison, and of the prisoners therein, and he may enter any observations he may think fit to make in reference to the condition of the prison or abuses therein in the visitors book to be kept by the gaoler; and it shall be the duty of the gaoler to draw the attention of the Visiting Committee, at their next visit to the prison, to any entries made in the said book; but he shall not be entitled, in pursuance of this section, to visit any prisoner under sentence of death, or to communicate with any prisoner, except in reference to the treatment in prison of such prisoner, or to some complaint that such prisoner may make as to such treatment."

109. Passing on to the constitution of Visiting Committees, we desire to carry into full effect the intention of the Act of 1877, and in some particulars to go beyond it. We think it most important that local interest should be revived in prisons, and that through this fuller interest the central authority should obtain the co-operation of a large number of persons not only qualified to take a practical part in the supervision of prisons but who might be willing, as they certainly would be able, to give valuable advice and assistance to discharged prisoners, acting through or with the various aid societies. How satisfactorily to achieve this is a very difficult problem. In 1879 the Home Secretary wrote a letter to the Visiting Committee of Strangeways Prison, which was intended to stimulate the committees all over the country, of which this is a summary :—

"It was there pointed out that it was absolutely necessary that there should be the most entire feeling of co-operation between the Visiting Committee and the Prison Commissioners, and the most frank and cordial relations between the Visiting Committee and the Secretary of State. That it was quite impossible in carrying out the efficient working of any institution that there could be anything like duality of government, and that the actual government of all prisons had, by the Act of 1877, passed into the hands of the Prison Commissioners, subject to the control of the Secretary of State, but that the duties of the Visiting Committee were nevertheless most important, and of essential service. In the first place might be mentioned the special function assigned by the statute to the Visiting Committee, of adjudicating on all serious prison offences and awarding the necessary punishment. It was needless to point out how the firm and judicious exercise of this function, from the very fact that it proceeded from independent persons, would constitute at once a powerful support of prison officers in the maintenance of discipline, and would be equally a check on any officer liable to err in provoking or magnifying offences. One other great object to be attained in carrying out the law was of course to see that the administration of prison discipline by the prison officials should not work with undue severity in the case of any individual prisoner, either through temper or caprice of any officer, or through any physical infirmity in the prisoner himself. That although every care might be taken in the selection of officers and the instructions given to them, and although they were subject to the superintendence of the several Inspectors, still it was evident that the more frequent visits of members of the Visiting Committee would give more ample opportunity to the prisoner to make any complaint of undue severity of treatment, and would necessarily tend to make the several officials more careful and watchful in their conduct. In such cases the Visiting Committee would either enter their views in their own Minute Book (which the Inspectors had the most stringent orders to examine carefully), or, if they thought it advisable, they would report to the Prison Commissioners, who would immediately investigate the case, and, should there be any difference of opinion, the Secretary of State would of course be at once appealed to and give his directions. In some special cases of emergency the Visiting Committee had already the power to act, reporting their action at once to the Commissioners. Another object to be attained was to see that the discipline and general rules themselves were not in any respect more severe than was absolutely necessary for duly carrying out the punishment awarded. In this respect the observations of the several Visiting Committees, as advisers, would of course be of the greatest value to the Commissioners themselves. In such cases the matter would be at once taken into consideration, other Visiting Committees consulted, and the question would be thoroughly investigated, and brought especially to the notice of the Secretary of State himself at once. The Visiting Committees should by rota appoint one or more of their own body to go to the prison from time to time, and personally visit some of the cells, and any prisoner who might specially wish to see them, and a notice should be placed in each cell that any prisoner wishing to see a member of the Visiting Committee at his next visit should be allowed to do so. It was most desirable, on the one hand, that any bonâ fide cause of complaint should be at once removed, and that every reasonable facility should be given to prisoners for making their complaints known. On the other hand, it was of almost equal importance that complaints, such as were often made by a prisoner against prison officers, should, after a prompt but careful inquiry on the spot, if frivolous, be pronounced frivolous by independent persons accustomed to the administration of justice. Every book in the prison should be entirely open to their inspection, and the prison officials should have instructions to show every respect and attention to the members of the Visiting Committee, and to give them every information which they may require. The Visiting Committee should, as a matter of courtesy, have official intimation of the appointment of any of the superior officers of the gaol, and any rule or order affecting the general discipline of prisons should also be officially communicated to the several Committees. It was of course essential that the Prison Commissioners and the Inspector should often visit the prison without notice of any kind, but should any of the Visiting Committee happen to be in the prison at the time of such visit, they should be informed, and any request of the Visiting Committee for an interview with the Inspector, at any time, should be specially attended to, and an interview arranged."

That letter produced little or no result. In 1884 the Royal Commission on Irish Prisons expressed this opinion :—

"Knowing that public confidence in the administration of prisons may be greatly strengthened by a regular and thorough inspection of them by independent persons, we were anxious to ascertain whether this advantage had been secured by the action of the visiting committees of justices. It caused us therefore much regret to be made aware of a widespread impression in Ireland that the visiting committees are indifferent to their duties, and that as a security for the proper treatment of prisoners they are of little value. In some cases no doubt the functions of the visiting committees are discharged with conscientious fidelity and with manifest gain to the public service; but we fear that there are too many instances in which the apparent indifference of visiting committees to their trust has unhappily tended to create the popular belief that as a body they contribute little or nothing to the satisfactory working of the prison administration. It was stated to us as an explanation of the want of interest in their work, exhibited by so many justices, that they regard themselves as divested of all important functions by the General Prisons Act; but this is a pure misconception, and as its consequences are serious every effort should be made to remove it."

110. We adopt this view as accurately representing the state of the case now in England and Wales. We are not sanguine, therefore, of effecting a change for the better without some strong action on the part of the central authority.

The power which abrogated the authority of the justices can alone set it up again, but it must be remembered that the majority of the visiting justices who held office prior to 1877, and who might have given valuable guidance, have either retired from active work or are no longer living. We think that while much may be done by improving the machinery by which Visiting Committees are to work, even more might be done by pointing out that the position of a justice of the peace, and, a fortiori, a justice of the peace delegated to perform executive functions, entails as a matter of duty to the State the discharge of official duties.

In the first instance it would be necessary to determine to what extent new functions should be added to those already possessed by Visiting Committees, and we offer these suggestions for consideration.

It is desirable and necessary that the Visiting Committees should (as is now frequently done) meet once a month at least. The governor or his representative should always be present at the Board meetings, and this Board should have power to make any representations to the Commissioners as to prison needs and requirements which they think fit. The Commissioners and the inspectors should be directed to invite the co-operation of the Visiting Committee, or any member of that body who might be specially appointed, to meet them in giving effect to this inspection. As a general rule the Visiting Committee should always have sufficient notice of intended visits, but at times it might be necessary or desirable to make special visits without such notice.

111. Some official on the prison clerical staff should be designated by the governor to act as clerk of the meetings of the Visiting Committee, and should keep the minutes of proceedings. Communications to the Commissioners should be made through the governor as a general rule, but the Visiting Committee should continue to have the right to communicate direct if and when they thought fit.

Their powers and functions should be added to over and above those contained by the Rules of the Secretary of State issued on February 19th, 1878, as follows :—

After each monthly meeting they should report to the Commissioners through the governor on the following matters :—

(1.) Any repairs or additions required in the prison. This is now done by the governor alone.

(2.) Any modifications of prison arrangements which they desire to make or have made provisionally.

(3.) The condition and requirements of prison labour.

(4.) The fitness of new officers. This would not apply to the training prisons.

(5.) Any deficiency in the prison staff.

(6.) Prisoners in their opinion wrongly classified, whose cases deserve special consideration or treatment.

(7.) The general discipline of the prison.

(8.) The operation of the prisoners' aid society or societies attached to the prison.
(9.) Any applications for the post of warder.
(10.) Variation of diet for special cases or classes.

The committee should have power (1) to require the attendance of any prison official whose presence they may think necessary; (2) to nominate the prison chaplain subject to the approval of the Secretary of State; (3) to put prisoners to such hard labour of the first class as they may think suitable; provided that the Commissioners approve of the kind of labour as suitable; (4) to determine the kind of labour to which prisoners generally shall be put, subject to the authority of the Commissioners; (5) to relax the regulations as to visits and communications within certain limits to be determined by the Commissioners; (6) to arrange for the organisation of prison industries under such conditions as may be laid down by the Commissioners; (7) to exercise a general discretion with regard to organising lectures and addresses in the prison and authorising occupation for prisoners; provided that this shall not interfere with the necessary deterrence of prison discipline, and shall be directed to the physical and mental improvement of the prisoners; (8) to arrange for the prison treatment of juveniles subject to the general regulations which may be made by the Secretary of State; (9) to sanction special treatment of unconvicted prisoners (supra, para. 88).

112. As soon as the Secretary of State has decided the general form which the new scheme should take, a circular might be sent by him to all governors and visiting committees, quoting the substance of the Home Secretary's letter of 1879, and announcing that it is his desire to associate more closely the visiting committees with the control, management, and discipline of the prisons than has hitherto been the case.

113. A summary should be given of existing powers, and of the extended functions which the Secretary of State desired to place upon the committees. This should be followed by a request that all visiting committees should send a representative to a conference to be held in London for the purpose of considering the best methods for carrying out with efficiency and uniformity their extended duties. It might be desirable that the Secretary of State or his representative should preside over this conference.

114. The visiting committee as now constituted by law might be strengthened and rendered more permanent by power being given to the Secretary of State to add, if he should so think fit, other justices than those nominated by the Quarter Sessions, and for the purposes of dealing with the female part alone of the prison, one or more ladies to sit with the visiting committee.

Prison Inspectors.

115. Assuming that the interest and efficiency of visiting committees are sufficiently increased, we think the present system of inspection might with advantage be modified. While the inspection has been carried out with a zeal and success testified to by many witnesses, it has necessarily assumed a somewhat formal and routine character. We think that the work of seeing that the requirements of the Prison Acts and the Regulations of the Secretary of State and Commissioners are satisfactorily carried out could be performed by one inspector appointed by the Secretary of State, but further supervision for other purposes would be necessary. If our recommendations are adopted it will be necessary that the Commissioners should send officials to the prisons for the purpose of seeing whether the prisoners were properly classified, whether prison labour and the work of the prisoners' aid societies are being properly attended to, and generally whether the spirit of the treatment which we recommend is being properly observed. This work should be performed by officials permanently attached to the Prisons Department of the Home Office, and they should be sent where and when required for any inquiries and reports which may be thought necessary. 49–55. 10,272, 10,356, 10,613.

116. We put forward for consideration the question whether the inspector or inspectors, as the case may be, should report direct to the Secretary of State. At present the Inspectors report to the Commissioners. The intention of the Act of 1877 appears to have been that these officials appointed by the Secretary of State should be independent altogether of the Commissioners, and act directly on behalf of the Secretary of State. This, however, seems to have fallen into desuetude, and the inspectors by practice have come to be looked upon as representing the Commissioners. We also suggest for consideration that the Inspector's Annual Report might be laid before Parliament.

10,632. 117. We think it desirable that a special arrangement should be made for the inspection of prisons, or those parts of prisons assigned to women. A lady inspector appointed for this purpose alone would not be sufficiently employed; but we think that a lady superintendent might be appointed who could not only do the ordinary work of inspection but who could also be responsible for the general supervision of female prison industry, and for such other duties as the Secretary of State might consider it desirable to assign to her.

Prisons Board.

118. We have already expressed our general opinion upon the character of the prisons administration. Theoretically, the arrangement is an excellent one. Locally, the prisons are managed by the governor, the chaplain, the medical officer, and the general staff. There are the visiting committees of practical men, independent of the Commissioners and the Secretary of State alike, to see that the prisoners are properly treated, and to award any punishment that may be necessary after a judicial examination There are the prisoners' aid societies to look after discharged prisoners. The inspectors, who are appointed by the Secretary of State, pay frequent visits and report regularly to the Prison Commissioners. Above all is the Secretary of State, the supreme authority over the Commissioners, who is directly responsible to Parliament. The system is elaborately designed to ensure the proper treatment of prisoners, the maintenance of discipline, the order and cleanliness of all prisons.

We have found, however, that in practice some of the different branches of the organisation only fulfil their duties imperfectly. The visiting committees not unfrequently do little, for reasons already noticed. The prisoners' aid societies are isolated bodies, some excellent, some satisfactory, some almost useless, some practically non-existent. The Secretary of State has great powers; but it is obviously impossible for him to follow the details of prison management without neglecting other duties of equal or greater responsibility. Necessarily he can only deal with those matters which are specially referred to him by the Commissioners or which are brought to his notice in some other way. The government of prisons has therefore been practically in the hands of the Commissioners. It has been frequently said, and we have found that the conduct of prison affairs has in many respects been too unbending, and has run in grooves too narrow for the application of higher forms of discipline and treatment which we think are required. But it is difficult to see how this could have been 11,388. altogether avoided. The Prison Act of 1865 and the Penal Servitude Acts lay down hard and fast regulations which only Parliament can unloose. These Acts the Commissioners have had to administer, and by them they have been bound. Experience shows that in almost every society or organisation the most effective changes come from outside influences. Those who have to administer a system year after year are inclined to stereotype practices which they know have produced good results, and to assume for that reason that they must permanently form the basis of management. Nevertheless it must be remembered that the Commissioners have initiated and carried out many excellent reforms of which the public has no practical knowledge.

119. In considering the position of the Board in relation to prison management we recognise that Sir E. Du Cane has held throughout his career an exceptional, and it may be said, a commanding position. With great experience as Director of Convict and Inspector General of Military Prisons he was appointed Chairman of the Prisons Commission in 1878, and since that date his weight and influence as the chief executive prison authority have steadily increased. We do not think it necessary or within 20–3, 542, 6396, 6433, 6577, 8859, 9018, 10,554–10,582, 10,960. our duties to enter upon the question of the distribution of work and influence among the members of the Board further than to remark that Board meetings seem to have been held chiefly for the purpose of considering prison appointments. But having regard to future management we proceed to state the principles on which we think that it should be conducted.

Amalgamation of Convict and Local Prisons.

10,816. 120. We see no reason for preserving the statutory distinction between Directors and Commissioners, Convict and Local Prisons. Sir E. Du Cane stated that the amalgamation has been for long the great object of the Commissioners, and that the welding process is gradually going on. The distinction should be, as in France, between long and short sentences. Convict prisons were established in place of or in connexion with transportation. There is no argument for their maintenance as separate organisations; on the other hand, general administration would be much simplified by the fusion of the two systems.

At present the prison authorities issue one set of reports as Directors, and another as Commissioners. Statistics and information relating to convict prisons are carefully separated from that which relates to local prisons. This is an anachronism. It is probably true that an average convict is a more formidable criminal than a local prisoner. But from the point of view of prison administration there is no distinction between the two other than that created by variation in the length of sentences. It would be unquestionably a great advantage if general information and statistics relating to all prisons could be published in one volume as a single report. Again, much inconvenience is caused by the character and number of operative Prison Acts. A consolidated Act containing a complete prison code is much needed, and the amalgamation of the convict and local prison systems would afford a good opportunity for carrying this into effect. The Secretary to the Prisons Board expressed himself strongly in favour of the fusion, and saw no difficulty in giving effect to it. We recommend that this work should be taken in hand as soon as possible.

Duties of Commissioners.

121. Assuming this amalgamation to be effected, the Directors would be finally merged in the Commissioners, and by the change might be relieved of a considerable part of their routine work. Under the present arrangement each Director has two convict prisons allotted to him, which he visits once a month. He hears the charges against prisoners and awards punishment. From him there is no appeal except to the Secretary of State, and should there be a complaint or an appeal from his judgment he is an intermediary authority in his own case. There are considerable objections to this procedure, and the routine work in connexion with convict prisons alone absorbs a large portion of the Commissioners' time. We think it desirable, to set up a different tribunal, and we suggest that an arrangement might be made for regular visits by a judicial functionary for the purpose of investigating ordinary complaints and imposing punishment. If some such plan were adopted, the Commissioners would be able to give more attention to the study of the general prison system, industrial developments, statistics, the working of new methods, and to the organisation of the prisoners' aid societies and other auxiliary bodies. We think they should meet frequently as a board for the consideration of all important prison questions, and that while it might be found necessary to divide the country into districts for the purpose of visits and inspections, special responsibilities should be placed upon individual members of the board in respect to general questions affecting all prisons, such as labour, recidivism, prisoners' aid work, and classification. The Medical Commissioner, whose appointment we have already recommended, would, of course, have the superintendence of all questions affecting the health and the mental condition of prisoners. We think that standing orders issued by the Prisons' Board, and circular letters embodying general regulations, should be printed in the annual report of the Prisons' Board and laid before Parliament.

Annual Conferences.

122. In France a superior council consisting of members of Parliament and capable officials of high standing is entrusted by the law with the duties of following in two annual sessions the application of the law relating to solitary confinement and of giving advice on questions referred to it by the Minister of the Interior. No doubt such an arrangement has much to recommend it, but taking into view the fact that the Secretary of State can at any time appoint departmental Committees to consider specific matters and to advise him thereon, we think that its functions might be supplied by a different and better method. Appendix.

123. Sir Godfrey Lushington dwelt on the great importance which attaches to frequent visits to prisons by the Commissioners. One visit from a Commissioner he considers to be worth three or four from an inspector. The Commissioners for the most part sit at Whitehall, "their control is a paper control, sufficient, however (quite "sufficient, I admit) to keep the machinery rolling regularly round, and to prevent 11,417.

" the improper and wasteful expenditure of money, but not calculated to give them " very full personal influence over the governors." We agree with this opinion, and we think that through this centralisation the Commissioners themselves cannot be 11,397. sufficiently in touch with the prison staff individually. We again quote from Sir G. Lushington's evidence. Referring to the administration of the Mines Acts, he says: " The inspectors, and for that matter the Secretary of State, are not left to find out " for themselves improvements that are necessary with regard to the mines. A " thousand and one suggestions are constantly streaming in from mining owners, " mining agents, mining institutes, trades unionists, &c.; in fact, from all persons " interested in mines, giving the Home Office the benefit of their experience in mines; " pointing out how the Acts work, and where they fail, and how they think they " can be amended. The Prisons Commissioners have none of those advantages. " From prisoners, of course, they learn nothing; prisoners cannot view the prison as a " whole, or even its larger features, and any remarks which they may please to make " are not likely to carry much weight. From the warders, who are mere subordinates, " who have strictly to obey all orders, they can learn little more. The warders, in fact, " as a class, are incompetent to advise on this subject. Superior officers, of course, have " greater knowledge, and might make useful recommendations; but I am sure they " would think twice and three times before they ventured to volunteer to a strong- " minded and strong-willed executive suggestions of a large character which would " involve an important alteration of machinery or serious addition to the expense. " Again, whereas in the administration of mines the reforms come chiefly from special " experience of mines, in the case of prisons it is otherwise." Sir Godfrey goes on to point out that suggestions must usually come from philanthropists, who have excellent motives, but no knowledge of the full working of the prison machinery which they propose to amend.

124. It does not appear to us that the relations between the Commissioners and the prison officials are sufficiently close, or that the visiting committees and the representatives of the prisoners' aid societies have adequate opportunities for stating and pressing forward any opinions which they may have formed on practical prison experience. Moreover, it is difficult to see how the Secretary of State himself can be conversant with current prison affairs. Special questions are referred to him for decision; but the Commissioners, speaking generally, are the sole medium for his communication with the prison service. In the administration of the Mines or Factories and Workshops Acts the case is quite different. The Secretary of State does not rely solely on the permanent staff for information and guidance. He is accessible through Parliament and the constituencies to employers and employed alike. There is the freest exchange of ideas, and general experience is brought to bear on all the different phases of mining and industrial concerns. But that is not all. The mines inspectors meet annually for the discussion of all important questions which may have arisen within the field of their duties. The factory inspectors meet in the same way. The Secretary of State is kept fully informed of what is taking place in the industrial world. A similar practice is followed in the Education Department. We think that it is most essential that similar conferences should be held in London on matters connected with prisons. Prison officials, managers of reformatories, officers of prisoners' aid societies, and representatives of visiting committees should assemble annually, either collectively or in such sections as might be found most convenient in order to compare experiences and to discuss the working of methods of treatment which to some extent might be experimental. In this way the Commissioners would be brought into beneficial contact with all classes of officials directly concerned in prison affairs; the Secretary of State would be kept informed of the general currents of thought on prison treatment as well as of the practical working of the prison administration; and thus the high responsible authorities would be in a far better position than at present to arrive at decisions, and to take any action which they might think desirable. No prison system can be satisfactory which cannot be adjusted without difficulty to meet any alterations which experience may show are desirable.

125. We put forward these recommendations in no over sanguine spirit. We have suggested many changes, but it is not to be expected that marked improvement in the criminal records of the country will at once be shown. But we believe that the adoption of an improved system of general administration and the careful and progressive application to prison government of the reformatory methods which already in varying degree have been tested by experience, will be rewarded by an increasing measure of success.

126. In conclusion we give a summary of our principal recommendations. They are as follows :—

I. That there should be a larger margin of separate cell accommodation in the London and certain of the provincial prisons, and a speedier method of transfer adopted, and that prisoners should never be associated on reception or during confinement except for medical reasons, and on the express order of the medical officer. (Para. 31.) — Accommodation and association.

II. That in applying the regulations dealing with visits to and communications with prisoners a larger discretion should be entrusted to Visiting Committees. (Para. 32.) — Visits and communications.

III. That a detailed report should be obtained on the nature and working of the prisoners' aid societies, upon which a scheme might be drawn up for better organisation and supervision. This scheme should give greater facilities to the representatives of the societies for seeing prisoners before discharge. The number of skilled teachers of industries in the prison service to be increased, and extra allowances to be granted to warders who qualify themselves for the supervision of work requiring a certain amount of skill. (Para. 69.)

In each prison an official to hold a position somewhat similar to that of "manufacturer" prior to 1878, for the purpose of directing the prison industries. (Para. 70.)

Habitual criminals. (4.) Habitual criminals to be kept as a class apart from the other prisoners. Memorandum on Insanity in Prisons.

Strong statements have been made that the existing prison system promotes insanity, and that the number of cases of insanity occurring among prisoners is greater now than it was 20 years ago, when prison administration was less centralized.

One of those statements will be found in the "Fortnightly Review" for April 1894. It is as follows:—

"Annual ratio of insanity arising in the general population for the three years 1890–2	8 per 10,000
"Annual ratio in local prisons, 1875–7	113 per 10,000
"Annual ratio in local prisons, 1890–2	226 per 10,000

"Thus," says the writer of the article, "we have the fact that the ratio of insanity "in local prisons has exactly doubled since the introduction of a central system of "administration. . . . Our present principles of prison discipline are debilitating "a much larger number of the prison population than used to be the case."

When carefully examined, the inferences drawn by this writer seem to me not to be justified.

It has been repeatedly pointed out by the Medical Inspector of the Prisons Board in his annual reports to the Commissioners that the practice of sending insane persons to prison has largely increased during recent years. The Commissioners of Lunacy, in their 43rd Report, remark that there "can be little doubt that during the last few "years many medical men have, owing to fear of litigation, refused to certify to the "insanity of persons requiring care and treatment; and that this circumstance has "tended to prevent many insane persons being legally dealt with and treated." Many of these persons, Dr. Gover surmises with much probability, "are not dealt with as "lunatics till they have committed some offence, and have found their way into 6086–9. prison." This view is supported by Dr. Shaw's evidence.

In the year 1889, 93 sentenced prisoners were found to be insane on reception into prison. "In London," says Dr. Gover, "the sending of insane persons to prison under "sentence is in a great measure prevented by making use of Holloway Prison as a "place in which accused persons of doubtful sanity can be observed and tested. "During the year ending March 31, 1889, as many as 401 prisoners were remanded "to Holloway Prison for observation and report to magistrates as to their state of "mind; of these 215 were reported to be sane, 107 were reported to be of weak or "impaired intellect, and 85 were reported to be insane."

It has been the practice of the Commissioners for several years to supply in the Appendix to their Annual Reports particulars of each case of insanity in local prisons. This table, among other details, gives the state of each prisoner on reception into prison, and the date at which symptoms of insanity first appeared.

Of the 354 cases of insanity recorded in local prisons for the year ending 31st March 1894 there appeared to be only 60 cases in which insanity showed itself for the first time a month or more than a month after admission into prison. Special reports were obtained by the Committee in these cases, and an abstract of these reports will be found in Appendix VII. But on examination it will be found that at least 18 must be deducted from this number, as being judged to be insane on their trial, or as presenting obvious signs of mental unsoundness at the time when their imprisonment began.

There remain 42 who being sane at the time of their admission became insane more than a month afterwards. Assuming the prison population to be about 14,000, this would give an insanity rate of 30 per 10,000, a ratio less than one-seventh the amount stated by the writer of the article as prevailing in 1890–2.

It is nevertheless true that an annual ratio of 30 cases of insanity per 10,000 of population is considerably in excess of that which the Reports of the Lunacy Commission show to prevail among the general population. The 48th Report published in 1894, shows the annual average ratio for 1888–92 among the population as a whole to be 5·5 per 10,000. If we exclude the juvenile part of the population the ratio is higher, being for the ages—

Between	25–34	8·5 per 10,000
	35–44	10·8 „

We have thus to accept the fact that among the prison population the ratio of insanity arising among persons apparently sane on admission is not less than three times as great as that amongst the general population of corresponding ages.

It will be observed that the three medical witnesses called as experts on the ground of their special experience of the connection between lunacy and crime, while taking different views as to the speculative question of responsibility, agree as to the fact that such connection is undoubted. "The habitual criminal," says Dr. Lewis, "I regard "simply as a degenerate offspring of a very degenerate stock. Insanity and crime are "simply morbid branches of the same stock." Dr. Nicolson, who emphatically repudiates the notion that the majority of crimes are connected with insanity, admits at the same time that there are cases on the border-line between them.

Nicolson, 9280, 9281.

On the existence of a class of prisoners who are neither sufficiently insane to be sent to asylums, nor sufficiently sane to be subjected to the ordinary prison discipline, there is practical unanimity among the medical authorities examined by the Committee. Dr. Nicolson estimates this class as being from two to three per cent. of the prison population.

Nicolson, 9316.

Taking into account the varied and serious difficulties that surround the medical aspects of prison administration, I can hardly think that a mere increase in the number of medical officers, or even the rule that a certain amount of experience in lunacy should be a condition of their appointment, would of themselves suffice to meet the requirements of the case. In addition to such measures, I would suggest that one member of the Prison Board should be a physician of qualifications and standing in his profession not inferior to those of the medical members of the Lunacy Commission.

TAKEN BEFORE THE

DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

PRISONS.

Home Office, Whitehall, S.W.

FIRST DAY.

Tuesday, 3rd July 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HON. HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P., CHAIRMAN.

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.	RICHD. BURDON HALDANE, Esq., Q.C., M.P.
Sir JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.	ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., (one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis); and
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.	Miss ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Captain STOPFORD called and examined.

Captain Stopford.

3 July 1894.

1. (Chairman.) You are Director of Convict Prisons and a Commissioner of Prisons?—Yes.

2. How long have you held those posts?—31 years. I was appointed in 1863 as Deputy Governor of Chatham, and I was appointed a Director in 1870.

3. May we take it that you represent the Commissioners?—Yes, certainly; I am answering for Sir Edmund du Cane to-day.

4. We may take it then that your evidence represents generally the views of the Commissioners?—Yes.

5. We hope, of course, to have Sir Edmund's evidence as soon as his health is sufficiently recovered.

6. But do you know at all whether any of the other Commissioners would like to give evidence before us?—I think they are quite prepared to do so. I have not asked them, but I can do so.

7. Of course we shall be very glad to hear them?—Then perhaps you will allow me to ask them later on.

8. Yes, if you will be so good. Will you first briefly indicate to the Committee the nature of the general inquiries by the Government into the present system during the past 30 years?—Beginning from 1850, which is about the date that I have drafted, for local prisons, there was a House of Commons Committee in 1850 on the Discipline and Management, and a House of Lords Committee in 1863 on Discipline and Management. On the recommendation of this Committee the Prisons Act of 1865 was framed. There was a Departmental Committee on Borough Prisons as to Debtors in 1864; a House of Commons Committee in 1870 on the Prisons' Ministers Acts; a Departmental Committee on Capital Sentences in 1888; a Departmental Committee on the Rules as to Wearing of Prison Dress in 1889; and a Departmental Committee on the Hours of Duty, Leave, and Pay of Subordinate Officers in 1890. That is for the local prisons. I must go on now to the convicts. As to the convict prisons, there was a Royal Commission on the Penal Servitude Acts in 1863. That was called Lord Grey's Commission. There was a Departmental Committee on Convicts in 1864; a Departmental Committee on the Treatment of Felony Convicts in 1869 and 1870; a Royal Commission on the Penal Servitude Acts in 1879: that was called Lord Kimberley's Committee. There was a Departmental Committee on Convict Labour in 1872: that was Sir Edmund du Cane's Committee. There was an Inquiry as to visitors to treason felony prisoners in Chatham Prison in 1890; and a Departmental Committee on Hours of Duty, Leave, and Pay of Officers in 1890 by Lord de Ramsey.

9. I think there was an additional Royal Commission of Inquiry into Irish Prisons. That, of course, is separate from your Department, but it covered to a large extent the same ground?—Yes, I think so. I forget exactly what the date of it was.

10. I think it was in 1885?—I am not quite sure.

3 July 1894.

11. The work of your Department practically rests upon the Acts of 1865 and 1877?—Yes.

12. Will you state to the Committee the number of the staff in the Prisons Department?—Including the clerks, do you mean?

13. The whole staff?—The staff consists of one surveyor-general of prisons and a chairman of commissioners and directors all in one, three commissioners and directors, one secretary, who is also an inspector, five inspectors, including a medical inspector, one surveyor, an assistant surveyor, a clerk in charge of accounts, a store accountant, nine first-class clerks, 17 second-class, three clerks on the prison clerks' scale additional, one clerk, a draughtsman, one agent for discharged convicts, one temporary clerk, one clerk of works, and six abstracters.

14. Do the Directors and Commissioners meet together as such, or do they meet in their different capacities?—We meet as such on all questions affecting the general administration of prisons.

15. So really there is no distinction, so far as your meeting is concerned, between your position as Directors of Convict Prisons and as Commissioners?—Not now; there are only three of us, and we are all Directors and Commissioners.

16. Three of you in addition to what?—No, there are only three of us, and we are Directors and Commissioners of Prisons.

17. In addition to the chairman?—Yes.

18. Then apparently you meet together as a board?—For the discussion of all general questions of administration on either side.

19. But you would not all meet together every day?—Not necessarily as a Board.

20. How often would you meet?—The chairman generally calls a meeting whenever he has got any question standing over affecting the general management of prisons, and if we have any questions we can ask apply for a board to discuss it amongst ourselves.

21. Then you each have your own department, I suppose?—We each have our own districts.

22. And each is responsible for that district?—Yes.

23. You do not divide up the general prison business, and each take one particular branch?—No; we each take the business of the district.

24. Then you have a great deal of paper and routine work, I suppose?—Yes.

25. And reports coming in every day?—Yes.

26. That is the largest part of the business?—Yes, it is, besides the visiting.

27. How often do you visit?—We visit the convict prisons every month as Directors.

28. All of you?—Yes.

29. You all go to each?—I have two convict prisons, and my other colleagues have each two. We each visit those two prisons once a month.

30. With regard to local prisons?—They are visited once a month by the inspectors. We visit them, if we can, once a year.

31. I suppose occasionally you have to make special visits?—Sometimes.

32. Do you get many complaints from prisoners?—In convict prisons we ourselves hear the complaints. There are always a certain number of them.

33. What is the process; how do you treat those complaints?—The prisoner, if he wants to complain, puts his name down to see the governor, and if he wishes to see the Directors it is put down upon a list expressly for them. A Director, when he comes down, sees all the prisoners whose names are on this list; he hears their complaint, inquires into it, and writes the answer opposite on his papers.

34. Then do not complaints come in writing direct to you from the prisoners?—No, they do not.

35. You go down personally and investigate them?—Yes, we go down personally and investigate them.

36. Each complaint?—Yes, every month.

37. Then with regard to these complaints, the ordinary ones are dealt with forthwith, but I suppose there is a certain proportion which would demand further investigation. Do you refer those to your colleagues?—If a prisoner is not satisfied, he is always allowed to petition the Secretary of State after the Director's decision.

38. And then that complaint goes forward to the Secretary of State?—Yes.

39. Now, in regard to punishment, what is the procedure where punishment is awarded by the Directors or the Commissioners?—The cases for the Director's adjudication are generally serious cases and cases that cannot be decided by the governors. They are sent up in the report from the governor to London, and we go down and hear the case, swear the witnesses, and dispose of it.

40. Then you hear the evidence of the prisoner himself?—Yes, his defence and the evidence against him.

41. Is the prisoner allowed to call witnesses from the other prisoners?—He can call them in his defence.

42. But supposing he wishes to make a charge against any official, he is not allowed to summon evidence from the other prisoners?—No, not from other prisoners.

43. Then the Commissioners or Directors, whichever they are—it might be convenient to call them either the one or the other—investigate it?—But the two systems are different. If you are talking of convict prisons, it is different from local prisons. I should understand you better if you would deal with the convict prisons first.

44. If you have reason to think that there is some justice in the complaint of a prisoner, and that other prisoners can give evidence, or are in a position to give evidence, would you examine them?—Certainly.

45. And take their evidence for what it is worth?—Yes.

46. Then you award the punishment if you find a prisoner guilty of an offence?—Yes.

47. Would two Directors decide upon the punishment?—No, one Director is quite sufficient.

48. There are two or one, as the case may be?—One does it always. We visit singly.

49. With regard to the inspectors of prisons, will you state briefly their duties and functions?—The duties of inspectors are to make monthly inspections of all the prisoners in their districts.

50. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) This is local prisons?—Yes; they have nothing to do with convict prisons.

51. (Chairman.) Monthly inspections of the whole of the prisons?—All the prisons in their district. There are four districts, and there are four inspectors to visit them.

52. What do their inspections consist of?—They see all the prisoners; they hear all complaints; they examine the rations; they see that the rules are strictly carried out according to the Act of Parliament; they report specially on everything that is carried out or on anything that is not carried out.

53. They report to the Commissioners?—Yes.

54. Not to the Secretary of State?—No, to the Commissioners.

55. And they have no power beyond reporting?—No, none whatever.

56. I think you have a copy of the reference to the Committee?—I have.

57. With regard to "(a)" in the reference, have you got a copy of the section there referred to?—Yes.

58. Will you explain to the Committtee what separate cells are? Would they include punishment cells?—Certainly.

59. And cells for separate confinement of prisoners under section 18?—Yes.

60. And those would be all certified, I suppose?—Yes.

61. There are no uncertified cells at all?—No, they are all certified.

62. With regard to sub-section (1), are there a sufficient number of cells to contain the number of prisoners specified in that sub-section?—Yes, I think there are.

63. You, of course, know of the return which was moved for by Mr. Morton?—Yes, I have seen it.

64. There seems to be some slight difference between the numbers given in that return and the figures of the judicial statistics?—Yes, there are. The discrepancy arises in the case of Wandsworth by the inclusion of eleven punishment cells, two padded cells, and three itch cells. In the ordinary cells they were all included in Mr. Morton's return. That is in the case of Wandsworth gaol. At Wormwood Scrubs there were eleven punishment cells and two padded cells included, which would be shown separately. The punishment cells would be shown separately in the judicial statistics, and the padded cells in the judicial statistics would not be shown at all.

65. From figures which have been supplied to me, the separate cell accommodation, according to Mr. Morton's return, amounts to 3,850, but the average of the greatest number of male prisoners from 1889 to 1893 was 4,015; that would seem to show that there was not sufficient separate cell accommodation. I rather imagine the difference is to be accounted for by the inclusion of convicts?—Yes, and more than that, there were 300 convicts in Wormwood Scrubs, and there are 100 cells at Pentonville occupied by Essex prisoners, and I should think quite 100 cells in Wandsworth occupied by Kent prisoners under the Act of 1877, which enables us to take prisoners from adjoining counties.

66. The taking in of convicts has been subsequent to the Act of 1877?—Yes.

67. When where they first taken into local prisons?—I think about two or three years ago.

68. That therefore disturbs the calculations, perhaps, upon which this sub-section in the Act of 1865 was passed?—I forget really when the convicts were taken into Wormwood Scrubs.

69. Have you any reason to think that there is anything like serious overcrowding?—No, I am sure there is not.

70. At times, I suppose, it would be necessary to put prisoners in association to meet special occasions when circumstances flooded the prisons?—At Pentonville once seven or eight men were put into an associated room in the doctor's department, but that was to meet a supposed case of overcrowding which never occurred. That is the only occasion in which they were ever put into association that I know of.

71. You would agree that it would be better to have rather too much accommodation than too small accommodation?—Yes.

72. And as the population of London is growing so rapidly it becomes of more and more importance to have ample accommodation in the London prisons?—Yes, at the present moment we have about 500 vacancies in the London prisons.

73. Brixton prison is vacant now, is it not?—It is in the hands of the War Department.

74. It has passed out of your hands?—Yes.

75. Then you have now no vacant prison?—No, but I believe we could get Brixton if we wanted it.

76. What accommodation is there there?—If I were to guess I should think it has about 250 cells.

77. Is it one of the older prisons?—Yes, it was a convict prison.

78. Turning to Regulation 26 of the Act of 1865, which is included in reference (a), I should like to know what your interpretation is of "under special circumstances." Is that phrase governed by the last portion of the rule, or do you understand that it leaves a certain discretion to the medical officer?—It is governed by the latter part of the rule, and the prisoners are put under medical observation, under sentence of death, in a cell calculated to hold three. Those are what they call "observation cells"; they have been placed there by the order of the medical officer, and really are always by his direction.

79. Then prisoners never would be placed in association, except, perhaps, on very special emergencies, such as you alluded to at Holloway?—Never; not at night.

80. Except when they are epileptic or suffering from some disease which, in the opinion of the medical officer, makes it necessary to go into association?—Yes. I may say we have associated wards in the hospital.

81. Quite so, but so far as your experience goes there has been no abuse of this section?—No.

82. And no harmful effects have followed from its operation?—No, none at all that I am aware of.

83. Now will you turn to (f). "The arrangement "by which the appointment of a deputy-governor is "limited to prisons with more than 700 prisoners, "and a warder in charge acts as governor in prisons "with not more than 100 prisoners." Have you any information to give upon the working of this system as it is?—The deputy-governors were appointed by a Treasury Order for prisons having 700 prisoners; and I do not know that there was any particular reason for adopting that number, but we have never employed the deputy-governors for any others. With regard to chief warders in charge for smaller prisons, when the rates of pay were drawn up, which is now some time ago, and almost at the beginning of the present Commission, and submitted to the Treasury for approval, the lowest rate was for a prison with a population of 100, and at that time there were only eight or nine prisons of that number, and it was thought that it would be very desirable to keep those prisons for the chief warders, who are a very deserving class of men, as some sort of encouragement for them to work up to. The rule, then, was adopted, and chief warders were appointed to prisons of this class; but since then—which we did not foresee at the time—the prisons population has gone down a great deal, and the number of smaller prisons has consequently increased, so that we have 20 or 21 prisons of this size, to which, according to the regulations of the Treasury, we have had to appoint chief warders.

84. Would you hand in a copy of the Treasury Order?—Yes.

85. You say you do not quite know why the number 700 was fixed?—No. I think it was because prisons with that number of prisoners required Deputy Governors.

86. But in the case of a prison with more than 700 prisoners, would the governor and the deputy-governor divide up the duties among them, or would they both cover the whole of the ground?—No, the deputy-governor is intended to be a relief to the governor.

87. That is to say he could take his place?—Yes; he has certain other duties, such as going round the prison, inspecting prisoners, seeing the rations, and so forth, but he is really intended as a relief to the governor.

88. It might be convenient to ask you here, whether you think that a governor alone is able to become acquainted with 1,000 or 1,200 prisoners?—That depends a good deal upon the length of their sentences.

89. I am speaking now of local prisons, where the population shifts more rapidly. Is it possible for a governor to have any knowledge of all the prisoners?—It is not possible to know everybody.

90. Is there ever an arrangement made between the governor and deputy-governor that each should take so many prisoners?—No, I think not.

91. And each practically endeavours to know the whole of them?—I think there is no such an arrangement.

92. Then each endeavours really to know as many as he can?—The governor tries to get a knowledge of his prisoners if he can, but I do not think the deputy-governor is much help to him in that way. The deputy-governor's help is really more in looking after the general arrangements and management of the prison.

93. I think there are only six prisons with deputy-governors?—I think it is about that. I am not quite sure of the numbers.

Captain Stopford.

3 July 1894.

94. Have you any views upon the question of large and small prisons?—I do not think a prison ought to be for more than about 1,000, certainly.

95. You think it then becomes unwieldy?—Yes, I think so.

96. You have no special criticism to make of the order which applies to the prisons with 700 or more prisoners?—No.

97. Now with regard to the warders in charge. How are those warders in charge appointed?—By selection.

98 By whom?—By the Commissioners.

99. And they are not necessarily taken from the prison which is put under their charge?—No, not at all. We select the best men.

100. As a rule they would not be taken from the prison over which they are placed in charge?—I should explain that they are taken from one particular rank, that is the rank of chief warder. It is not any warder.

101. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) And the convict service and local prisons rank together. It is all one service; the chief warder in a convict prison is promoted to a local prison?—Yes.

102. (Chairman.) Do I understand a chief warder in a convict prison, may be appointed as a warder in charge in a smaller prison?—Certainly.

103. Have there been any complaints, as far as your knowledge goes, of those prisons not being adequately managed?—No, I do not think it is possible with the help we have from the visiting justices.

104. They have made comments?—They have.

105. Frequently?—No, not frequently; but we have heard them occasionally.

106. You have no reason to think that the warders in charge have shown incompetency?—No, I think it is easier to select qualified men for a small number of prisons, and I think it would be better perhaps to have fewer of them.

107. Then with regard to (d.): "The regulations "governing visits to and communications with "prisoners." Could you put in anything on that?—I could put in the Standing Orders 203 and 213, both of which bear on the question of visits and communications. (Standing Orders 203 and 213 were handed in. See question 226 for the former and Appendix V. for the latter).

108. Are these rules relaxed in the case of particular prisoners?—They can be relaxed at any time by the visiting justices in local prisons, or by the Directors in convict prisons.

109. And upon what would they found themselves in making that relaxation?—Generally in cases of sickness in the family, or the prisoner wishing to see his solicitor on matters of urgent business.

110. Then, of course, a good deal depends upon marks?—Yes, it is all regulated by marks.

111. But, apart from marks, for the cases you specify, relaxation is made sometimes?—Yes.

112. But relaxation would not be made because of the specially good character of the prisoner?—No; the relaxation is made generally according to the circumstances under which the application is made.

113. In your opinion, are the regulations with regard to visits too strict?—No, I do not think they are. The object is that visits regarded as privileges should be earned in the stage and marks system. It is considered that a prisoner by his good conduct should be able to earn his privileges.

114. Supposing that by relaxation of the rule, and the admission of visitors, you would produce a good and healthy effect on the mind of the prisoner, would you think that it was undesirable on the ground that it is too much of a modification of prison discipline?—I think that as the sentences lengthened they might be extended, and that after a prisoner has passed his third month, he might be allowed a visit or communication for every 224 marks, which represents a month.

115. I see Sir Edmund du Cane, in his book on the "Punishment and Prevention of Crime," lays stress on the work which is done by the prison in raising a man, and training him for a life after the prison, and for those reasons, I suppose, you would agree with the general principle that it is desirable to improve the prisoner's mind so far as you can?—Certainly.

116. You would also, perhaps, say, as following that, that if you improve the prisoner's mind, and raise his self-respect, and give him higher ideas about life, that such a process is not calculated to make prison discipline less penal to him, perhaps rather the contrary?—No, I do not think it is so calculated.

117. Now, in the course of a day, what visits would a prisoner get, beyond the visits, of course, of the warder?—The governor.

118. The governor would see him every day?—Yes, and the chaplain in small prisons.

119. Every day?—Yes.

120. Does the chaplain see all the prisoners every day?—He sees them in chapel, but no more than that.

121. But not in the cell?—Not in the larger prisons, unless there are special reasons for his doing so. In a large prison he could not see them every day. He sees only those who want to see him.

122. In the large prisons there are generally two chaplains; that is to say, two Church of England chaplains, and probably a Roman Catholic chaplain as well?—Yes.

123. So that there may be three chaplains in large prisons?—Yes. They are expected to visit the prisoners in hospital, those under punishment every day, and any others that want to see them.

124. Assume that there was one chaplain to a prison—I am speaking of a local prison—what would you say was the maximum number which he would deal with satisfactorily; how many would he be able to get to know?—I should think 300 prisoners.

125. Then how often does the doctor go his rounds?—Daily.

126. To all prisoners?—Not to all. He sees all that want to see him. They put their names down to see him.

127. He does not visit them unless they apply, or unless there is reason to think that he ought to see them?—No.

128. With regard to visits before discharge, would you tell the Committee what the practice is in regard to the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society?—Are you dealing now with convicts, or with local prisons?

129. With local prisons?—There is an Aid Society appointed to every prison, which is sanctioned and approved by the Secretary of State.

130. Then what happens? How is a prisoner put into communication with the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society?—There is a notice put up in each prisoner's cell informing him that he can avail himself of a Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, which I have here, and the prisoner then decides what society he will go to, and the agent of that society attends and sees him a short time before he goes out, and takes his views and wishes as to how he shall be employed.

131. This circular was only sent out recently, I understand?—No, that notice was published a year ago, I think.

132. When I was at Wandsworth the other day, the governor informed me that the Surrey magistrates had decided that it was best to do without this circular, and in consequence it was not distributed to them?—I did not know that.

133. That has not come under your notice?—No, the notice is put up in every cell to let a prisoner know he can avail himself of it if he wishes.

134. By whose authority does this come—from the Secretary of State direct?—No, the notice was issued by the Commissioners.

135. Then have the visiting justices the power to say that, in their opinion, this notice had better not be given to the prisoners?—Yes, I think they would have the power to express that to the governor, certainly. Some, I think, did object to it, but I did not know that Wandsworth was one of them.

136. Then let us assume, for the sake of argument, that this circular was drawn up by the direction of the Secretary of State?—It was not drawn up by the Commissioners.

137. I am not talking necessarily of this. I am only putting a hypothetical case. Supposing a question arises in the Home Office on this question of visiting before discharge, and it is brought before the notice of the Home Secretary, and by his direction the Prison Commissioners, as such, sent out a notice to regulate the practice, what I want to know is, have the visiting justices the authority to say that such notices shall, or shall not, be distributed?—I think not, but they can object.

138. If the visiting justices decide in any particular prison that this notice is not to be sent round to the prisoners, then I suppose that the whole arrangement as to Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies fall into their hands, and they make such arrangements as they shall think fit without the Commissioners knowing anything more about it?—I should imagine, under those circumstances, they would report to the Secretary of State; the visiting justices would not report to us. They always report direct to the Secretary of State.

139. Coming then to the contents of this circular, I observe it says, first of all, that certain benevolent societies have been established for the purpose of giving aid to discharged prisoners. Then, that a Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society has undertaken this office for prisoners on their discharge, and can communicate, if desirable, with certain other agencies which are willing to assist prisoners?—Yes.

140. That means that all prisoners desiring help from Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies, and from those societies really connected with local prisons under paragraph 18 of the Appendix to the Commissioners' Report, will have to make their application through the Discharged Prisoner's Aid Society?—Yes; the other societies are affiliated.

141. And therefore that leaves a greater amount of responsibility in the hands of the officers of a Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society?—It does.

142. It is possible they may have their own views as to the nature of other such societies?—Certainly.

143. They may be dominated by a belief in one denomination and have scruples about others?—Yes.

144. Do you think that this practice does not lay itself open to objections on that ground?—I think it might; whether it does or not I cannot say.

145. I notice in the Commissioners' Report that stress is laid upon the danger of allowing outside societies to compete for the care of prisoners?—Yes.

146. I imagined you would entirely agree with that, and I think the danger of it is obvious; but I want to know whether you think there is any possible danger in giving a prisoner a wider option of choice as between the agents of various societies?—No, I do not think there is.

147. Would there be any objection to sending a notice round to all prisoners a certain time before they are discharged to say that there are a considerable number of societies anxious to help prisoners, and, if a prisoner so desires it, a list of those societies can be given to him, and he can choose any representative of those societies that he would wish to see. Do you see any objection to that?—No, I see no objection.

148. Turning now to (e.) "Regulations governing prison offences." Can you hand in any statement?—I hand in the book of rules which govern prison offences. There is legislative authority on page 56. (See Appendix VI.)

149. Then we will extract the necessary part of it. These rules are based partly on the Act of 1865 and partly upon that of 1877?—Yes.

150. Have the prison rules drawn up under the Act of 1877 been very materially modified?—No.

151. Practically they are the same rules?—Yes.

152. And they have worked well on the whole?—Yes.

153. Is full notice given to prisoners with regard to prison rules?—The prison rules are always read to them.

154. Once?—Yes.

155. On reception?—Yes, on admission. There is an abstract of the rules always in their cells.

156. Is that abstract pretty full and complete?—Yes, it is an abstract from this book.

157. There are no complaints, as far as you are aware, from any prisoners of insufficient information?—I have never heard of any.

158. Can you indicate who the chief offenders against the prison rules are? Do they come from any special classes?—Chiefly from prisoners who are idle and will not work; the greater portion of prison offences are from idleness.

159. Would you draw any distinction between penal-servitude prisoners and short-sentence prisoners?—No, I think not. I do not think the habitual criminal is guilty of more offences than the others.

160. Would you go so far as to say that habitual criminals would be more amenable to prison rules; they get to know them better?—They are more amenable, from my experience.

161. With regard to male and female prisoners, is the average number of offences much the same, or do you find the women prisoners are different from the male prisoners?—The average of female prisoners is much less.

162. Is the practice of what they call "breaking out" as prevalent now as it used to be?—Confined to a certain class of women, I think it is.

163. But is that confined to women?—Yes.

164. It is not customary with men?—No, it is principally with women.

165. Do you happen to know whether it is a fact that it is a practice which is hardly known in continental prisons?—I do not.

166. It seems to be confined to English and Scotch prisoners?—I do not know it.

167. The dark cell system has been abolished?—Yes.

168. Speaking of local prisons, do you find considerable variation in the number of punishments for offences as between one prison and another?—They do vary.

169. Relatively, of course, in proportion to their numbers?—Yes.

170. But they do vary?—Yes, certainly, I think the prisoners in the agricultural districts are better behaved, as a rule, than those in the manufacturing districts.

171. Would you say the different parts of the country in England show different results?—I think they do, but a great deal depends on the governor.

172. Are London prisoners less amenable to discipline than they are elsewhere?—I think they go in with other manufacturing towns. They show more prison offences than the country.

173. Could you tell us the prison which shows the best record and the one which shows the worst?—No, I think not.

174. Caermarthen?—That is a very small prison.

(Mr. de Rutzen.) That has the smallest record and Brecon has the next.

175. (Chairman.) Norwich shows a good record?—Yes.

176. That is a fairly large prison?—Yes. I think Birmingham shows a rather high record.

177. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) A high record of punishment?—Yes, I think so.

178. (Chairman.) Have you ever had reason to think that the high record is due to the system of management—either to a different system of management or an unsatisfactory system?—I think it rests a great deal with the governor and with the visiting committee too.

179. Do you think that is the prime cause of variation?—I should not say it was a prime cause, but I think it is one of the causes.

Captain Stopford.

3 July 1894.

180. What is the limitation of the governor's power to punish?—It has been reduced now to 24 hours in a punishment cell, and three days' No. 1 dietary in his own cell.

181. I think it was limited after the Royal Commission of 1878?—It was limited by the Act of 1877, and by subsequent modifications of Standing Orders.

182. And other changes were made about that time to secure better order and discipline in prisons?—Yes.

183. According to Standing Order No. 94, it would appear that these changes have had a good effect?—Yes. I think a very good effect. In the longer sentences we rely upon the suspension of privileges more than we do upon the dietary punishment.

184. That Order stands in this way. "Experience "shows that discipline is not better maintained by "resorting commonly to severe punishment, which "should be reserved for use when milder means have "been tried unsuccessfully, and when it is necessary "to apply them on particular occasions." Do you entirely agree with that?—Yes.

185. Amongst the changes the Prison Act of 1877 diminished the powers of governors to punish refractory prisoners by confinement in a punishment cell?—Yes.

186. It goes on to say, "There does not appear "any reason to believe that any disadvantage resulted "from this diminution"?—No reason.

187. You quite agree with that?—Yes.

188. I think that one of the recommendations of the Royal Commission in 1878 was that there should be a further limitation of the governor's power and that the Irish rules should be applied, which forbid a governor to punish the same prisoner except at an interval of a month since his last punishment?—I was not aware of it.

189. That, I think, was one of the recommendations; but, anyhow, that recommendation has not been acted upon, so far as English prisons are concerned?—No.

190. Have you any reason to think that it would be desirable to adopt such a system?—I see no necessity for it.

191. With regard to the mark system, can all prisoners earn the maximum?—I do not exactly understand you.

192. There is a possible maximum which prisoners can earn; that is to say, supposing a man commits no offence no breach of discipline, and satisfactorily does his work, he can earn the highest possible number of marks?—Yes.

193. I want to know whether it is open to all classes of prisoners to earn that maximum?—You are still speaking of local prisons?

194. Yes?—Yes, certainly.

195. Supposing a man, from some cause or other, is unable to perform hard labour of any kind, either of the first class or of the second class, is it in the power of that man in a local prison to earn as many marks as might be earned by an able-bodied man?—Yes.

196. That is so?—Yes, the marks are given to him if he does his best.

197. I understand you to say that all classes of prisoners have the same chance in their power to earn the maximum number of marks?—Yes.

198. And have the visiting justices or the directors, as the case may be, the power to restore marks forfeited by some accidental or trivial breach?—Yes. Visiting justices to recommend and directors to restore.

199. So that really the prisoner is under no disadvantage at the present time through committing some slight offence, and which really he did not know anything about?—The Commissioners have the power, if necessary, and do exercise it, of remitting any marks that may be forfeited on the recommendation of the governor.

200. That practice of restoration is quite customary now, and is a common practice in the administration of prisons?—Yes.

Adjourned for a short time.

201. Perhaps you could give us figures showing the number of prisoners who earn the maximum number of marks, or some table showing the proportion of numbers of marks earned by the prisoners?—I think not. Every prisoner, as a matter of course, earns the marks before he gets his stage.

202. The full number of marks?—Yes, he must get the full number of marks before he gets his stage.

203. But there are a considerable number of prisoners who do not get their stages because they have not got the marks?—Or who are delayed.

204. There are some who have to serve out their sentences completely?—You are talking of convicts; the marks in local prisons do not affect their time at all. There is no remission in a local prison. The marks in a convict prison affect the remission.

205. Is not there any remission in a local prison?—No.

206. Then in local prisons they only earn certain advantages as to treatment?—Yes, there are different stages, and they work out their stages by industry and conduct.

207. But they cannot shorten their sentence, even if it is two years?—No, it cannot affect the sentence at all. In the convict prisons it is different. There are three rates of marks—six, seven and eight a day. If he only earns six marks a day, he has to work out the whole of his sentence. If he works out eight marks a day he works off a fourth; and if he gets seven marks a day he gets off an intermediate period.

208. In the case of the convict prisons, could you take one prison, for instance, and show us how often the maximum remission is earned?—Yes, I think so.

209. At any rate you will try and put some figures together, and give us information as to the comparative earnings of remission?—Will you be content with one convict prison?

210. I think that that would give us all the indication that is necessary. I suppose that a three years' penal-servitude man can earn remission?—Certainly.

211. Then do you consider that it is not a possible hardship that a man who is confined for two years' hard labour in a local prison should not have some power of earning a remission of sentence on the same system?—I think that the man who is sentenced to three years' penal servitude is the better off of the two.

212. Is that another way of saying that you think there is a possible grievance on the part of the man sentenced to two years?—Certainly. The man who is sentenced to three years' penal servitude can get remission of one-fourth of that time; a man who is sentenced to two years must do the whole of it.

213. Then how far would you carry it. Do you think it would be advisable to apply that system of remission to short term prisoners?—No, I think not.

214. What would be the limit, in your mind?—I should leave two-years' prisoners as they are.

215. I understood you to say that you thought there was a possible grievance in not giving the local prisoners the opportunity of earning remission?—What I meant was that the man who is sentenced to three years is, in many cases, better off than the man who is sentenced to two years' imprisonment, because, after he does nine months of his penal servitude, he gets the fuller treatment in the convict prison as regards diet.

216. Still he would have his first nine months in the local prison?—Yes.

217. He is on an equality to that extent?—Yes, and he would have two years and three months altogether.

218. Then he would have one and a-half years in the convict prison over and above his nine months?—Yes.

219. As against 15 months additional in a local prison where a man has been sentenced to two years?—Yes.

220. Then do I understand that you would not favour altering the present system?—I think it is better to leave it as it is.

221. Could you supply the Committee with a statement showing the working of the mark system in convict and local prisons?—I should have to give you individual cases.

222. What we really want is to have a statement which can be handed in showing the rules applying to the mark system?—They are in the standing order that I have already handed in, No. 205.

223. Standing Order 205 is only supplementary. This asks the governors to give their constant attention to the working of the system of marks?—203, I think, will give it to you.

224. Does this state fully the whole system of marks?—For the local prisons, certainly. I can give you a standing order for a convict prison also.

225. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) It will be convenient to incorporate that in the evidence, rather than to extract it from the standing order?—There will be no difficulty. I will give you the orders and regulations in the convict service as distinct from the local prisons.

226. (Chairman.) Would you read first the Local Prisons Standing Order?—Yes.

"STANDING ORDER 203 (LOCAL PRISONS).
13th July 1892.

"SYSTEM OF PROGRESSIVE STAGES.

"1. The following instructions will be observed with a view to give effect to Rule 24, for the general government of prisons made by the Secretary of State, 19th February 1878, as to the employment of male prisoners above 16 years of age sentenced to hard labour.

"2. A prisoner shall be able to earn each week day eight, seven, or six marks, according to the degree of his industry. On Sunday he shall be awarded marks according to the degree of his industry during the previous week.

"3. A prisoner who is not at work, whether by reason of his being under punishment, or in the infirmary, is not entitled to receive marks; but every prisoner actually at work may receive marks. A prisoner who has earned no marks during the week is not to receive marks on Sunday.

"4. A prisoner who is idle will be reported, and be liable to punishment.

"MARKS, REMISSION, AND CLASSIFICATION OF MALE CONVICTS.

"1. The following system of marks, remission, and classification for male convicts will in future be observed.

"Marks and Remission.

"2. The term of penal servitude to which each convict is sentenced will be represented by a certain number of marks, calculated at the rate of six marks for each day of his sentence.

"3. His industry will be recorded by marks, and when by his industry with good conduct he has gained the number of marks which represents his sentence he may be discharged on licence.

"4. Marks may be assigned to him at the rate of eight marks per day for steady hard labour and the full performance of his allotted task; seven marks per day for a less degree of industry; six marks per day for a fair but moderate day's work.

"5. A convict whose conduct is either indifferent or bad, may be fined a certain number of marks, according to the nature and degree of the offence, and will thus forfeit by misconduct some of the remission he may have earned by industry.

"6. A convict who by his industry earns eight marks every day and forfeits none for misconduct obtains therefore, in every three days, as many marks as represent four days of his sentence, and has gained the maximum remission of one-fourth thereof.

"7. If a convict while on licence is again sentenced to penal servitude, the term for which he was licensed will be added to the new sentence, and marks will be calculated as for a term equal to the combined periods.

"8. If a convict has to serve a term of penal servitude by reason of forfeiture of revocation of licence, whether accompanied or not by a sentence of imprisonment, such term will be represented by marks in like manner to a new sentence.

"9. A convict sentenced to penal servitude for life must not, unless special instructions are given to the contrary, entertain any expectations of release until he has completed 20 years. No specific number of marks can be stated as giving a claim to release in accordance with paragraph 3, but the number assigned daily to each convict for his industry will be recorded, as well as his forfeitures for misconduct. Each case will be considered in due course by the Secretary of State on its own merits.

"10. On Sunday a convict will be awarded marks according to the degree of his industry during the previous week.

"11. A convict who by his misconduct forfeits the whole of his remission will be liable to be kept in separate confinement during the last six months of his sentence.

"12. A convict in the light labour class will be credited only with six or seven marks per day, according to his industry.

"13. A list of all convicts who would be due for licence in the ensuing month if they had not lost marks through being on light labour, is to be submitted monthly to the director, who will decide whether the convicts are to be credited with any additional marks.

"The director's special attention is to be drawn to the case of any convict who in the opinion of the governor and of the medical officer, formed from personal observation, has lost marks from absolute inability, and not from unwillingness to perform hard labour.

"14. Any convict who is unable to perform hard labour on account of his having lost a limb, or who is is suffering under some other grave bodily infirmity, which, in the opinion of the medical officer, permanently unfits him for heavy labour, may be considered eligible for full marks without reference to the director.

15. "If the medical officer should give a special direction that any convict is not, for a specified period, to be employed on any but light labour, such convict will be eligible for full marks if his conduct and industry justify it.

"16. A convict in hospital will be credited only with six marks per day on week days, and seven on Sundays.

"No such convict is to be credited with more than seven marks per day, unless laid up from an accident on the works, when, under the authority of the director, he is eligible for eight marks per day.

"17. The case of any convict who suffers a long-continued loss of marks by reason of his being in hospital, should be brought before the director from time to time, with a report of the circumstances and of the total loss of marks involved.

"Classification.

"A convict during the term of his sentence will be required to pass through the following classes, or so much of them as his sentence will allow, viz.:—

"Probation class, one year, or until he has earned 2,920 marks;

"Third class, one year, or until he has earned 2,920 marks;

"Second class, one year, or until he has earned 2,920 marks; after which he will be eligible for promotion to the first class.

"19. A convict who commits any offence will be liable to reduction from a higher class to a lower class, or to detention in the class he is in, or to forfeiture of the privileges of any class, until he has earned a stated number of marks, which number of marks is not to be added to the number of marks he has to earn for remission, unless directions are given to the contrary. As soon as he has earned the stated number of marks he shall, unless he has in the meantime incurred further similar punishment, be restored to the class from which he was degraded.

"20. A convict in the probation class will—

"(a) be kept in separate confinement until he has earned 2,190 marks;

"(b) until he has earned 224 marks be employed 10 hours daily in strict separation on first-class labour, and sleep on a plank bed without a mattress;

"(c) after he has earned 224 marks and until he has 448 marks, be employed on hard labour of second class, sleep on a plank bed without a mattress two nights weekly, and have a mattress on the other nights;

"(d) after he has earned 448 marks, and until he has earned 672 marks, sleep on a plank bed without a mattress one night a week, and have a mattress on the other nights;

"(e) after he has earned 672 marks, sleep on a mattress every night;

"(f) be allowed to write one latter during the first week of his sentence and receive a reply, and also to receive one visit during that period, and after he has earned 1,440 marks may receive and write a letter and receive a visit of 20 minutes' duration;

"(g) after he has earned 2,190 marks be eligible for employment on public works;

"(h) on reception at a public works prison, be allowed to write and receive one letter, but no other while in this class.

"21. A convict, after completing a period of second probation in separate confinement, will pass through the classes in the same way as on completing his first probation in separate confinement.

"22. A convict, whilst wearing cross-irons, or the parti-coloured or distinctive dress, will be in the probation class, after which he will return to his original class, unless directions are given to the contrary.

"23. A convict in the third class will be allowed—

"(a) to receive one visit of 20 minutes' duration, and both to receive and write a letter, and after earning 1,440 marks, to receive another visit of 20 minutes' duration, and to receive and write another letter;

"(b) to receive a gratuity at the rate of 1*s.* for each 240 marks earned in this class, but not to exceed in the whole 12*s.* in this class;

"24. A convict in the second class will be allowed—

"(a) to receive a visit of 20 minutes' duration, and both to receive and write a letter, and afterwards, at the expiration of intervals, during each of which he must have earned 960 marks, he may again be accorded the same privileges;

"(b) the choice of tea and 2 ounces of additional bread instead of gruel;

"(c) to receive a gratuity at the rate of 1*s.* 6*d.* for each 240 marks earned in this class, but not to exceed in the whole 18*s.* in this class.

"25. No convict will be promoted to the first class until he can read and write, except in special cases, which must be approved by a director.

"26. A convict in the first class will be allowed—

"(a) to receive a visit of half an hour, and both to receive and write a letter, and afterwards, at the expiration of intervals, during each of which he must have earned 720 marks, he may again obtain the same privileges;

"(b) the choice of tea and 2 ounces of additional bread instead of gruel, and baked instead of boiled meat;

"(c) to receive a gratuity at the rate of 2*s.* 6*d.* for each 240 marks earned in this class, but not to exceed in the whole 30*s.* in this class, nor 3*l.* altogether.

"27. A convict who has earned 2,920 marks in the first class, and passed through that class with exemplary conduct, may be admitted into the special class when he is within 12 months of his release.

"28. A convict in the special class will be eligible—

"(a) to receive a visit of half an hour, and to receive and write a letter, and afterwards, at the expiration of intervals, during each of which he must have earned 480 marks, he may again obtain the same privileges;

"(b) for any special employment for which his services may be required;

"(c) to receive an extra gratuity of 3*l.* on discharge, provided he goes to a Prisoners' Aid Society;

"(d) to be recommended for an extra remission not exceeding one week.

"29. A convict in the special class may be accorded the extra remission and gratuity whether he passes the full 12 months in that class or not.

"30. A convict whose sentence does not admit of his attaining the special class may be recommended for an extra gratuity, provided he has not forfeited more than 720 marks for remission, and has passed nine months preceding his release with exemplary conduct and avails himself of a Prisoners' Aid Society on discharge. This extra gratuity will not exceed 10*s.* for a convict under sentence of three years, 1*l.* for a convict under sentence of four years, and 2*l.* for one under sentence of five years.

"31. A convict whose licence is forfeited or revoked will not be admitted into the special class nor be eligible for an extra gratuity as provided in paragraph 30.

"32. A convict whose licence is forfeited or revoked without receiving a fresh sentence of penal servitude, will not again be permitted to receive the gratuities referred to in the foregoing paragraphs. But he may, after he has earned 224 marks, be credited with a gratuity not exceeding 1*s.*, or at the rate of 1*d.* for every 20 marks earned; after he has earned 448 marks he may be credited with a gratuity not exceeding 1*s.* 6*d.*, or 1*d.* for every 12 marks earned; and after he has earned 672 marks he may be credited with a gratuity at the rate of 1*d.* for every 10 marks earned, provided that the whole of his gratuity, including what he may have earned under a preceding sentence of mprisonment, shall not in any case exceed 10*s.*

"33. Standing orders 52, 75, 76, 110, 145, 146, 181, 185, 222, 223, 236, 237, 248, 249, 252, 277, 287, 299, 316, 326, 328, 334, 371, 377, 397, 414, 427, and 473 (1) are hereby cancelled.

"(13.) A list of all convicts who would be due for licence in the ensuing month if they had not lost marks through being on light labour, is to be submitted monthly to the director, who will decide whether they are to be credited with any additional marks. "(17.) The case of any convict who suffers a long continual loss of marks by reason of her being in hospital, should be brought before the director from time to time with a report of the circumstances, and of the total loss of marks involved.

"Classification.

"(18.) A convict, during the term of her sentence, will be required to pass through the following classes, or so much of them as her sentence will allow, viz.:—

"Probation class, nine months, or until she has earned 1,620 marks.

"Third class, nine months, or until she has earned 1,620 marks.

"After which she will be eligible for promotion to the first class.

"(19.) A convict who commits any offence will be liable to reduction from a higher class to a lower class, or to detention in the class she is in, or to forfeiture of the privilege of any class, until she has earned a stated number of marks, which number of marks is not to be added to the number of marks she has to earn for remission, unless directions are given to the contrary. As soon as she has earned the stated number of marks she shall, unless she has in the meantime incurred further similar punishment, be restored to the class from which she was degraded.

"(20.) A convict in probation class will be kept in separate confinement until she has earned 1,620 marks. She will be allowed to write one letter during the first week of her sentence and receive a reply, and also to receive one visit during that period, and after she has earned 1,080 marks she may receive and write a letter, and receive a visit of 20 minutes' duration. If transferred to a convict prison while in this class she will be allowed to write and receive one letter, in addition to those above, but no other while in this class.

"(21.) A convict after completing a period of second probation in separate confinement will pass through the classes in the same way as on completing her first probation in separate confinement.

"(22.) A convict whilst wearing a distinctive dress will be in the probation class, after which she will return to her original class, unless directions are given to the contrary.

"(23.) A convict in the third class will be allowed—

"(a) to receive one visit of 20 minutes' duration, and both to receive and write a letter and after, earning 1,080 marks to receive another visit of 20 minutes' duration, and to receive and write another letter.

"(b) to receive a gratuity at the rate of 2*s.* for each 180 marks earned in this class, but not to exceed in the whole 18*s.* in this class.

"(24.) A convict in the second class will be allowed—

"(a) to receive a visit of 20 minutes' duration, and both to receive and write a letter, and afterwards, at the expiration of intervals, during each of which she must have earned 720 marks, she may again be accorded the same privileges.

"(b) the choice of tea and 2½oz. of additional bread instead of gruel.

"(c) to receive a gratuity at the rate of 2*s.* for each 180 marks earned in this class, but not to exceed in the whole 18*s.* in this class.

"(25.) No convict will be promoted to the first class until she can read and write, except in special cases, which must be approved by a director.

"(26.) A convict in the first class will be allowed—

"(a) to receive a visit of half an hour, and both to receive and write a letter, and afterwards, at the expiration of intervals, during each of which she must have earned 540 marks, she may again obtain the same privileges;

"(b) the choice of tea and 2½ oz. of additional bread instead of gruel, and baked instead of boiled meat;

"(c) to receive a gratuity at the rate of 4*s.* for each 180 marks earned in this class, but not to exceed in the whole 2*l.* 4*s.* in the first class, nor 4*l.* altogether.

"(27.) A convict who has earned 1,620 marks in the first class and passed through that class with exemplary conduct, may be admitted into the special class when she is within nine months of her release, if from any cause, without fault of her own, she is unable to go to a refuge as referred to in paragraph 33.

"28. A convict in the special class will be eligible—

"(a) to receive a visit of half an hour, and to receive and write a letter, and afterwards, at the expiration of intervals, during each of which she must have earned 360 marks, she may again obtain the same privileges.

"(b) for any special employment for which her services may be required.

"(c) to receive an extra gratuity of 2*l.* on discharge, provided she goes to a Prisoners' Aid Society.

"(d) to be recommended for an extra remission not exceeding one week.

"(29.) A convict in the special class may be accorded the extra remission and gratuity whether she passes the full nine months in that class or not.

"(30.) A convict whose sentence does not admit of her attaining the special class may be recommended for an extra gratuity, provided she has not forfeited more than 540 marks for remission, and has passed six months preceding her release with exemplary conduct, and avails herself of a Prisoners' Aid Society on discharge. This extra gratuity will not exceed 7*s.* 6*d.* for a convict under sentence of three years, 15*s.* for a convict under sentence of four years, and 1*l.* 10*s.* for one under sentence of five years.

"(31.) A convict whose licence is forfeited or revoked will not be admitted into the special class, nor be eligible for an extra gratuity as provided in paragraph 30.

"(32.) A convict whose licence is forfeited or revoked without receiving a fresh sentence of penal servitude, will not again earn the gratuities referred to in the foregoing paragraphs. But she may, after she has earned 168 marks, be credited with a gratuity not exceeding 9*d.*, or at the rate of 1*d.* for every 20 marks earned; after she has earned 336 marks she may be credited with a gratuity not exceeding 1*s.* 2*d.*, or 1*d.* for every 12 marks earned; and after she has earned 504 marks, she may be credited with a gratuity at the rate of 1*d.* for every 10 marks earned, provided that the whole of her gratuity, including what she may have earned under a preceding sentence of imprisonment, shall not in any case exceed 7*s.* 6*d.*

"(33.) A limited number of convicts whose conduct and industry have been good in prison, and who are qualified according to the rules in such case provided, may be sent on special conditional licence nine months before the period at which they would ordinarily be discharged from prison to refuges or kindred institutions, the managers of which may consent to receive them, and, if the conduct of the women while in them is good, they will interest themselves as far as they can in obtaining situations and employment for them on their discharge.

"(34.) A convict when so transferred will have an opportunity of earning some addition to the gratuity which she has earned in prison, and will not wear ordinary prison dress.

"(35.) It should, however, be clearly understood that the exact time of the transfer of any convict to any of these institutions must depend on the vacancies there may be in them, those convicts who have been best conducted throughout their imprisonment having the preference.

"(36.) The following qualifications are necessary to render a convict eligible for the privilege:—

"(a.) She must be in the first class, but if she fails to obtain the first class only from being unable to read and write, she may, on special leave by the directors, be promoted for the purpose of being eligible for a refuge.

"(b.) Her conduct and industry must have been good.

"(c.) She must not have been guilty of violent and insubordinate conduct within six months.

"(d.) Her health must be good, and she must be physically capable of earning a livelihood.

"(e.) She must not have more than nine months' time to serve before being due for discharge on licence or expiration of sentence.

"(f.) She must not have been sent to a refuge on discharge from a previous sentence.

"(37.) As the managers may object to receive any convict who was convicted for murder or violent assault, or whose crime or character is remarkable or notorious, attention must be called to any such case when reporting such convict as otherwise eligible, in order that a communication may be addressed to the managers to ascertain whether they object to her coming to them.

"(38.) The names, &c., of the refuges and other institutions authorised by the Secretary of State, will be notified from time to time, as occasion may arise.

"(39.) Standing Orders, 150, 265A, 255B, 362, and 430 are hereby cancelled.

"E. F. Du Cane."

228. (Sir Algernon West.) I want to ask you this: you said that in your opinion a three years' penal servitude man was better off than a two years' prisoner?—Yes.

229. And when the Chairman asked you if you thought that the two years' man should be able to work off some remission of his sentence, you said "No"?—Yes.

230. Would you, therefore, suggest that a three years' penal servitude man should be put in a worse position than he is now?—No, his position is secured by Act of Parliament.

231. What I mean to say is this. You acknowledge that the two years' man is not so well off as a three years' man?—He is not, in some respects.

232. And yet you say you would not alter the two years' man. Therefore, I presume you would alter the three years' man?—That would be difficult.

233. I only want your opinion?

234. (Chairman.) But it would be rather an awkward thing to alter the Penal Servitude Acts with reference to the three years' man's remission?—It would. What I meant was the three years' man has to do two years and three months; the two years' man only has to do two years, so that the three years' man gets three months longer; but he gets the advantage over the two years' man by being in a convict prison where the diet is better. It is not in point of time, but of treatment, and association on the works, that he is the gainer.

235. Supposing you wished to redress this inequality by which a man sentenced to three years' penal servitude is better off than a man sentenced to two years' hard labour, would not you rather prefer to level up the condition of the local prisoner than to level down the penal servitude prisoner?—Yes.

236. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Is there any such essential difference between the sentence to a local prison and to a convict prison as to forbid a remission being granted in the case of a local prison which is now given in respect of a convict prison?—Remissions are not granted at all.

237. This is a question only of opinion. Is there any such distinction between the nature of the sentence to the local prison as compared with the sentence to a convict prison as to forbid the same remission taking place in the one case that is now granted in the other?—No, I do not think there is.

238. Is there anything in the working of the mark system in a local prison with reference to the stages which would forbid its being extended in its application to the remission of sentences?—The mark system would have to be applied entirely differently if it were to affect their sentence by remission on the same principle as the convict prison.

239. You would have then to re-arrange the system of marks?—Yes, to introduce the system of remission.

240. In order to introduce the system of remission you would have to re-arrange the system of marks in local prisons?—Yes, certainly.

241. That would not be impracticable?—No.

242. Does any objection in principle suggest itself to you?—The difficulty would be that you could not apply the mark system to short sentences.

243. You could not apply it to a sentence of one month?—No.

244. Could you possibly apply it to sentences of over six months?—It is very difficult to draw the line, or to say where you could begin.

245. (Chairman.) If Sir John Dorington's proposal were carried out, would not this inequality be set up, that whereas in the local prisons a prisoner would have power by earning marks both to shorten his sentence and to improve his position, the convict prisoners would be left only with the power of earning remission of sentence, and not improvement of diet?—As they advance in their classes they improve in diet also in the convict prisons.

246. By marks?—Yes; all the classes are managed by marks. What I understand Sir John to mean is this, whether the mark system, as applied to convicts, can be applied under similar circumstances to local prisoners?

247. Yes?—But the difficulty is in dealing with short sentences, because you must have a certain length of sentence to work out existing mark system.

248. (Sir Algernon West.) You must, under existing Acts, you mean? You may say, for instance, that no man can work out his remission under six months?—You might have it six months, but then probably the man of five months or four months would think it a hardship.

249. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) At the present moment? But even now a strict line of demarcation is drawn between a sentence of penal servitude and a sentence of imprisonment?—Yes.

250. The one cannot exceed two years. All sentences of two years and under are sentences of imprisonment. All sentences of over two years are sentences of penal servitude?—Yes; there is not much difference between them.

251. Is there any practical difference between these sentences, except in point of time and in point of treatment. One is called imprisonment, and the other is called penal servitude?—No, there is not.

252. That being so, might not the rules and regulations with regard to the one, if found advantageous, be also applied to the other, adapting them as circumstances are changed?—It is a matter that would have to be very carefully thought out. It is a question I really could not answer, and a very large one.

253. It is one on which you are not prepared to pronounce an opinion?—No, I am not. It would have to be very carefully considered.

254. Would you be willing to admit that it is a subject worthy of consideration?—Certainly.

255. (Chairman.) Do you think that the conduct of prisoners is acted upon materially by the warders who happen to be in charge of them?—Certainly.

256. And that a bad warder will produce a refractory prisoner?—Certainly.

257. And therefore you think it is of the first importance to have a high class of men in the position of warders?—Certainly.

258. Have you in the course of your experience noticed any distinction between warders who have been in the army or navy and warders who have been taken from the civilian classes?—We show no preference. The applications come in much more from army and navy men than they do from civilians, but we take the best men, and we get very good men from both. As far as I know, they stand entirely equal chances with us. Speaking from my own experience, some of my best warders have been civilians, but by that I would not say a word in depreciation of the other class, for I have had good men from both classes.

259. You have heard officially no complaints which could be applied to the military training of warders?—No, I never have. We get very good men from the army and navy, and we get some very bad ones, and we get very good ones from the civilians, and occasionally bad ones, only the numbers are very much less; we get less applications from the civilian element than we do from the army and navy.

260. Are the warders changed very often in their wards and corridors?—No, we avoid it as much as possible.

261. They are kept with the same prisoners as much as as possible?—Yes, unless there are reasons for removing them, as there sometimes are.

262. I suppose it would be most undesirable that warders should be exposed to unduly long hours or any undue mental strain?—Yes.

263. As a general principle you will agree to that?—Yes.

264. Have you any reason to think that the hours are too long?—I do not think so. They are not, in my opinion, with the present alleviations they get. They get alternate Sundays off and a Saturday every month. That was fully gone into by Lord Ramsey's Committee in 1890 or 1891. I was one of the members of that Committee, and the opinion expressed was that the hours were not excessive.

265. The comparison, I think, was instituted between their functions and duties and the duties and functions of the London police, and it was held that their work was not of the same arduous description?—It was.

266. That would be, of course, to a large extent a matter of opinion?—Yes.

267. It is rather difficult to gauge the amount of mental strain?—Yes; I do not think myself they suffer very much strain.

268. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You do not think there is much dissatisfaction in the service?—I do not think there is.

269. (Chairman.) There are libraries and reading rooms for the warders, are there not?—In the large prisons, yes. There are libraries in all prisons, but there are reading rooms and recreation rooms in large prisons.

270. What is the period of probation for a warder?—Three months.

271. What proportion of warders fail to pass that probationary period?—A very small proportion.

272. And I suppose the number dismissed is very small?—Yes; a good many are dismissed in the course of a year.

273. Of warders?—Yes.

274. Do you say a considerable number?—I think there are.

275. Perhaps you would give us some figures about that?—Yes.

276. Will you do so, say for the last five years?—Would you like it both for convict and local prisons?

277. Yes. How do the warders apply in the first instance. Do they apply direct to the Commissioners?—Yes.

278. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Do you advertise vacancies?—No, we have a list of candidates. They apply and their names are put down; their characters are thoroughly inquired into and sifted; they are then sent down to the governor of the nearest prison, who sees that they are up to the height and physique required; and finally they go before the Civil Service Commissioners and are passed.

279. What is the age limit?—24 to 42.

280. (Sir Algernon West.) Do you mean you keep them on as late as 42?—Yes.

281. (Chairman.) And when are they superannuated?—At 60 they can go. They may be superannuated before if they break down in health.

282. (Sir Algernon West.) Do the same rules apply to the female warders?—Female ages are different.

283. Are they appointed in the same way?—They are appointed in the same way.

284. (Chairman.) What are the ages of the women warders?—Various ages.

285. What is the age limit, I mean?—From 23 to 40.

286. Is it found necessary to bring in outside assistance for disciplinary purposes?—Yes, at the sessions and at the assizes.

287. Where does that come from?—We generally get old pensioners, or pensioners in the prison service. Very often they are pensioners in the prison service who are glad to come in and help. They are very useful men.

288. Are they paid at the same rate as the others?—They are paid 25*s.* to 30*s.* a week.

289. Will you turn now to "(C.)" in the reference "Prison labour and occupation; with special reference to the moral and physical condition of the prisoners." Can you hand in a statement or Standing Order which shows the classes and gradations of labour in the convict and local prisons?—Yes, the last report of the Commissioners. This gives the return of the earnings for each prison, and the gradations of labour for each prison.

290. You had better give us the reference, so that it may be put on the notes?—I refer to the Sixteenth and Last Report of the Commissioners of Prisons, Part II.

291. There appear three descriptions, generally speaking, of prison labour,—isolated labour, associated labour, and non-productive labour. Now, in the case of isolated labour in local prisons, what class of prisoners have to perform isolated labour?—That is in separate cells.

292. Yes; but what class of prisoners have to perform isolated labour?—Prisoners sentenced to one, two, and three months—up to four months and even more.

293. Up to three months?—Yes, up to three months.

294. And also convicts undergoing their probationary period?—Yes.

295. They have to be altogether in separate cells?—Yes.

296. Then in the case of short sentences complete separation is practically enforced?—It is.

297. Up to three months a man has no power, excepting in chapel, or in the associated ward of a hospital, of making any communication with other prisoners and seeing them?—I can hardly say that. A man who is a tradesman might, after the first month. The first month is the time when he is kept in separate confinement; but if we had a good tailor, or a good artisan, he might be employed, in the second month of his imprisonment on productive labour, and he might be put into a shop. Absolute separate confinement is necessary for the first month, but a prisoner after the second month may be put into a workshop on productive labour.

298. If he is a good man it is probable he would be put to associated work?—He would.

299. Under any circumstances are convicts put to associated work in local prisons?—No.

300. They are absolutely isolated?—For nine months they are in separation; and they do all their association after the nine months.

301. To what extent is associated labour practised in local prisons; that is to say, taking local prisons generally, what per-centage of prisoners would be put to associated labour?—A small per-centage. I cannot tell you exactly what it is; cooks, bakers, cleaners, gardeners, laundry men, laundry women, blacksmiths, and carpenters would work in association.

302. Then is that limitation due to the principle of of management or to the difficulty of finding the associated labour in the local prisons?—It might be extended if we could get more labour.

303. It would be extended?—I see no objection to extending it, but it would require more officers, a much larger staff than there is at present.

304. And an extension of workshops?—An extension of workshops and a larger staff. The rule is 10 per cent. of officers for prisoners in association and 5 per cent. for prisoners in separate confinement, so that we should require double the number of officers for all prisoners in association.

305. But in going over Wandsworth Prison the other day I was struck by the excellent arrangements?—Yes, they are.

306. At the same time it appeared to me that very few men could be set to work in the different partitions or workshops?—Yes, that is so.

307. Would not it be possible to employ a considerably larger number of men by having large workshops, where, for instance, you could set a considerable number of tailors or shoemakers to work?—Yes, but the great difficulty in association is to prevent the prisoners from communicating with each other.

308. Is not that rather a question of size and space?—Yes; there must be size and space and considerable supervision; there must be a large staff of officers.

309. So far as associated labour and its effect on the mind and health of prisoners is concerned, you would be all in favour of extending it as far as possible?—In the longer sentences.

310. Over three months?—Yes; I should say rather more than that; I should say over six months.

311. Is it your opinion that isolated labour in cells is a good training for a prisoner in the future?—We must have it as a deterrent; the early stages should be a deterrent in my opinion, particularly with short sentences.

312. Of course isolated labour is to a certain extent unnatural; is not that so? I mean it puts a man in a somewhat unnatural position?—Yes, but you cannot do very well without it.

313. Does not it tend rather to make a worse man of him?—I do not think so.

314. Then does not one run some difficulty of confusing the different classes of prisoners. I can quite understand that with some men you ought to adopt this principle as a deterrent; but should it apply in the case of a juvenile offender or a first offender?—I think the question of juveniles is another question.

315. Then I will leave that out at present; but apart from juveniles, is not it possible that with a man who has from some possible cause been led to crime, and who probably will not commit another crime, the system works badly?—It may be said so; but it is very difficult to distinguish what a first offender really is. It very often happens that a first offender is quite as criminal as a man who has been convicted before.

316. However, you agree in the general statement that for long-sentence prisoners associated work, if it were found, would be desirable?—I think so.

317. What is you opinion of the system of non-productive labour?—Non-productive labour is not satisfactory.

318. It is purely penal?—It is purely penal; it affords no interest to the prisoner, which is undesirable.

319. Do the prisoners universally dislike it?—I cannot say.

320. Is there any prisoner who would prefer the non-productive labour to labour which is productive and which requires an equal amount of exertion?—I think a man would, as a rule, prefer productive labour, but there are a large class of idle men in prison who do not care much whether it is productive or whether it is not.

321. But still you personally do not look with favour upon the system of non-productive labour?—No, but I do not see how you can give anything else but non-productive labour to prisoners under short sentences.

322. You mean, if you gave him productive labour in a cell you would have to give him tools and put him under supervision?—Yes, there is not time to teach him; they are not in prison long enough for that, and in many cases they are incapable when they come in, and there is nothing left to us but the cell and first-class hard labour. I am far from saying it is a good thing, but it will be very difficult to find a substitute for it in short sentences.

323. In this connexion you are hampered by the restriction which followed the agitation as to prison competition against outside labour?—Yes, we are. If we could only get back the mat-making it would be something; it paid, and it was work that men could take up when they went out of prison. This has been taken from us, and we have nothing in its place.

324. I suppose that something like basket-making would do?—Basket-making is very good. We do a little of that now; we work for the Government Departments.

325. If that restriction were relaxed you would probably see your way to find substitutes for the non-productive labour which is used now?—I cannot say that, because you cannot teach a man in a short sentence to make a mat. There must be time to teach him.

326. Under the present system non-productive labour is a prevailing practice in the isolated labour department?—In the early stages, during the first month.

327. Would not it be possible to reverse the condition, and provide it only where necessary and where the prisoner was in such a state of health and mind that he could not work without it?—I do not think so.

328. Not in the first month?—No, I do not think so.

Captain Stopford.
3 July 1894.

329. Then do all first-month prisoners go to unproductive labour?—As a rule.

330. Practically, all of them do?—Yes.

331. Do you imagine that the hard labour of prisons is equal in its effect on the different classes of prisoners; I mean on the strong man and the weak man; on the young man and the old man, and so forth?—Weakly men are not put to hard labour if the doctor thinks they are unfit for it. Every man who goes into prison is examined in the reception ward by the doctor, who passes him for what labour he thinks he is fit for, either first class hard labour or second class hard labour, and his employment is regulated entirely by the doctor's certificate.

332. Do you think the prison rules and regulations tend satisfactorily to equalise the conditions of work and make the effect equal on all classes of prisoners?—Yes.

333. Would you say that sedentary work is not so satisfactory as work requiring active effort and out-of-door work?—Out-door work, of course, has its advantages, and, after a certain period, it may be used on the recommendation of the doctor.

334. Is it true that women prisoners who work at shirt-making or different classes of in-door work, generally show a larger proportion of refractory prisoners than those who are actually working in the laundry or in the kitchen?—I never heard it.

335. Now, do you consider that the present arrangement of supplying books to prisoners is satisfactory?—Yes, I think it is.

336. The control is practically with the chaplain?—Yes.

337. And the system is worked by the warder-schoolmasters?—Yes. There is a grant from the Government of about 1*s.* 3*d.* per head to provide books.

338. Does the chaplain choose the books?—There is a catalogue, and the chaplain can send the names of the books he wants to have put on the catalogue, and the Roman Catholic priest can do the same.

339. If the prisoners apply for any book which happens to be in the catalogue would he be given it because he asked for it?—Yes, if the prison had got it.

340. He is not shown the catalogue?—No; I think the practice generally is for the prisoner to ask the schoolmaster-warder or the schoolmaster whether they have such a book, and then he refers to the catalogue, and if he has it he gets it.

341. Would there be any objection to allowing the prisoner to see the catalogue, and choose for himself?—No. It is one of those details we should leave very much to the governor and schoolmaster.

342. But do you see any objection to allowing a prisoner to read pretty freely as he wishes?—He can do so now, so long as he is not at work.

343. I understood he was limited to one book a fortnight?—Yes, but there would be no difficulty about altering or changing the books oftener than is done now. Most prisoners read very slowly; but if a prisoner is an educated man, and a fast reader, there would be no objection to his having a change before the regular time for changing.

344. You do not hold that to preserve the deterrent effect of imprisonment it is necessary to punish a man by keeping him away from books?—No.

345. I do not know if you have seen an article by Mr. Morrison in the "Fortnightly Review"?—No.

346. Which deals with certain questions of alleged insanity?—I have not seen it.

347. His point is that the annual ratio of insanity in local prisons is rising, and he gives these figures: from 1875 to 1877 it was 113 per 10,000, and in 1890 to 1892 it had risen to 226?—Sir Edmund Du Cane has dealt with this entirely in a report to the Home Office. I hand you in a copy of his report which deals with the whole question.

348. (Dr. Bridges.) Has that been printed?—No.

349. Will you hand that in? (The report was handed in. See Appendix VII.)—Dr. Gover, medical inspector will, perhaps, be able to give you information upon it.

350. (Chairman.) Perhaps we had better reserve the question until we have read it, unless you have any particular information to give us?—No, I have not.

351. I should like to know how prisoners are treated who are suspected of insanity?—They are put under medical observation at once.

352. Are they isolated?—They are very often put in with two or three other prisoners in one of the large cells for medical observation. There are, perhaps, three together in a cell for observation; or in the hospital.

353. But a man whose sanity was suspected would not be put, for instance, to isolated labour?—No, he would not. He is brought under the doctor's attention at once.

354. I have no doubt that Dr. Gover in the case before us will have the full statistics as to prison life?—He will.

355. The questions of suicide, and so forth?—Yes. A Standing Order deals with the question of prisoners under medical observation; it might be of use to you.

356. Then it had better be put in?—It is Standing Order No. 134. (Standing Order No. 134 was put in. See Appendix VII.)

357. What is Dr. Gover's exact official position?—Medical inspector.

358. Does that mean that he is the superintending inspector or is he attached to the Commissioners?—He is attached to us.

359. And he visits various prisons?—Yes, he goes down to any prison where any question arises.

360. When was his office created?—I think about five years ago.

361. Then it was probably in consequence of the recommendation of the Royal Commission of 1878?—I think it was. It came out of that.

362. Practically he has that position?—Yes.

363. He visits prisoners, and medical officers consult him and so forth?—Yes, he may be required to go off at any time.

Adjourned to Thursday, the 5th July, at 12 o'clock.

SECOND DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Thursday, 5th July 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN).

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.
Sir JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq.; and
Miss ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Captain STOPFORD recalled and further examined.

Captain Stopford.
5 July 1894.

364. (Chairman.) I think you want to make a correction, Captain Stopford?—Yes, I should be glad to do so. In dealing with the question of overcrowding, I said in my evidence that Pentonville was the only case in which we had taken precautions against it, but occasions did arise at Holloway also. They are referred to in a memorandum by Sir Edmund Du Cane.

365. Just give us the date of it?—The 5th August.

366. Is there anything else you wish to correct?—With regard to the cell accommodation in Brixton Prison there are 493 separate cells. One other question you asked me with regard to what I considered was the proper number of prisoners for a chaplain; I said 350. I was under a misapprehension. I meant 600.

367. That is to say, that a chaplain could adequately get to know that number of prisoners under his charge?—Yes.

368. That is all you have to put in by way of correction?—Yes, that is all.

369. We come now to reference (b) "juvenile and "first offenders; and to what extent they should be "treated as classes apart"; could you give us the number of juveniles under 16 in prison?—I have called for a return.

370. I make it to be 114 under 16, and 2,393 between 16 and 21. That is in the Report of 1893 at page 23. That is in local prisons only?—Yes, adding the males and the females together.

371. Is there a table showing the numbers in the convict prisons?—Not in this return.

372. Will you turn to the Report of Directors for 1892 and 1893, page 35. There seems to be only one convict prisoner under 16?—That is right.

373. And 44 between 16 and 21?—That is right.

374. There are some interesting figures referred to in Sir Edmund Du Cane's book on "Crime" at page 199. Have you a copy of that book?—I have not.

375. Have you seen it?—Yes; it is with regard to Mr. Clay's figures, I think.

376. Yes. Mr. Clay makes out—and Sir Edmund Du Cane seems to quote these figures as worthy of note and does not dispute their accuracy—Mr. Clay makes out that 58 per cent. of prisoners first practised dishonesty when under 15, 14 per cent. between 15 and 16, 18 per cent. under 17, 18, or 19, and 20 per cent. under 20. That accounts, as far as I understand, for the whole of the prisoners?—That was in 1853, many years ago.

377. Perhaps you can explain that point; these figures account for the whole of the prisoners, and there must have been some prisoners who first commenced crime when they were over 20?—Sir Edmund Du Cane can explain it better than I can.

378. Can you give us any figures with regard to the proportion of boys and girls who after leaving reformatories and industrial schools continue to commit crimes?—No, the better way to get it will be from the inspector of reformatories, who would be able, perhaps, to give it you.

379. I do not know whether you are prepared to give the Committee any figures from the Commissioners with regard to the effect of recent changes in the law, and administration of the law, which have had a considerable effect upon the prison statistics, I mean the more general system of fines in lieu of imprisonment and the operation of the First Offenders' Act and the Summary Jurisdiction Act?—The general effect of the system of fines has no doubt been to reduce the prison population.

380. Have you any figures on the subject which you can give the Committee?—I have not, but they might be obtained. With regard to the First Offenders' Act, there is no doubt there has been a decrease. In 1890 there were 823 committals of males less, and 90 females.

381. Are you quoting from the returns?—Yes; from the 14th Report of the Commissioners. In 1890 there was a sudden drop, the First Offenders Act was passed in 1887, allowing time for it to operate, it is probable the decrease was owing to that Act.

382. According to the last return relating to the First Offenders Act, all over the country, there seems to be an increasing tendency to put it into operation. I see that the number of cases dealt with under this Act, were, in 1888, 614; in 1889, 924; and in 1890, 992?—Yes.

383. That naturally would have an immediate effect upon the prison statistics?—Yes, no doubt it would.

384. With regard to the Summary Jurisdiction Act, I understand that a return is being prepared to give us some information as to the operation of that Act. In your opinion is imprisonment as a punishment equally operative on old and young offenders?—I think not. I think it has not the same effect upon a boy's mind that it has upon an adult's. Boys do not take the same view of it, I think, as an adult does.

385. It is a new experience, and they have no sense of shame?—Yes, I think so.

386. Or less sense of shame?—Yes.

387. And therefore they do not look upon it as a deterrent?—Not in the same way as an older person would.

388. Would you say it worked equally between men and women. Do women have a greater or less dread of imprisonment than men?—I think women have a greater dread of it.

389. At the same time the proportion of habitual women offenders is larger than that of habitual men offenders?—I do not know that it is.

390. Is not it a fact that, in proportion to the number imprisoned (and of course less women are imprisoned than men) the number of habitual prisoners amongst women is considerably larger than it is among men?—I do not know it; but it may be so.

391. Could you give us any information as to the number of prisoners under 21 who might be called practically habitual offenders?—No; probably the information could be obtained.

Captain Stopford.

5 July 1894.

392. What is your interpretation of an "habitual criminal?"—It is not defined, but all cases of theft, stealing, and crimes of violence and forgery, to a certain extent, constitute one.

393. But surely one would be inclined to define an habitual criminal rather by the life that he is known to lead outside the prison than by the number of his convictions?—And by the number of his convictions.

394. That is to say, if a prisoner, whether old or young, made it his business when at liberty to live by plunder or by crime, you might say that he was an habitual criminal, even if but one conviction was recorded against him?—I regard an habitual criminal as a man who is repeatedly convicted for some offence, as before described.

395. But it may be there are a great many habitual criminals who never have been in prison?—Would you mind referring to page 4 of the 15th Report of the Commissioners of Prisons, it would give you some idea of its definition.

396. Will you read it?—"Yes. "The diagrams "(Appendices Nos. 8 to 11) indicating the fluc- "tuations of the different classes of offences show "that the indictable offences of Class I. ('Offences "'against the person, including assaults') have fluc- "tuated very much, and have, on the whole, risen "during recent years, but that the summary offences "of the same class have fallen very much during the "last 16 years. Class II. ('Offences against property "'with violence') fell in a most remarkable manner "between 1867 and 1876."

397. These figures have reference to the general state of crime, and not to the particular question I was on at the moment?—The quotation goes on to say that the crimes enumerated in those three classes are such as are committed by habitual criminals, and then deals with various other classes.

398. But there is no classification under ages of these special classes of criminals, I think?—No, I think not.

399. I think you said you would draw up something in the way of a return to show the number of young prisoners in prison who may be called habitual offenders?—I will try to do so.

400. Have you got a circular, dated December 1893, which has reference to contamination? Have you formed any opinion as to whether, at the present time, there is what is generally called contamination as between old offenders and young prisoners?—There would be if precautions were not taken against it.

401. You think that sufficient precautions are taken?—Yes, we take every precaution.

402. You think contamination is not possible now?—I think not.

403. I have got before me a circular issued by the Prison Department of the Home Office, which is dated the 5th of December 1893. It runs as follows: "The Commissioners desire to impress on Governors "the desirability of guarding juvenile offenders in "prison from communication with adult prisoners. To "that end they should be located in cells where they "will be least likely to come in contact with the latter. "They should also exercise, receive school instruc- "tion, and be seated in chapel, apart from adult "prisoners. The Commissioners are aware that "these precautions have always been observed in "most prisons, but as there are some prisons in which "they have not been fully attended to, they call the "special attention of Governors to the need for "keeping them carefully in view." Now in chapel are these young prisoners kept right apart?—Yes, they are kept together.

404. But quite separate?—Yes.

405. What would be the distance between them?—They are generally kept behind the others.

406. But how near would they be?—There would probably be one seat between them. That is what we should expect the Governor to arrange. There should be at least one seat between them.

407. Have you reason to think that that distance is always kept?—Yes, I believe so.

408. Does that refer to prisoners under 16?—Yes.

409. But not to prisoners over 16?—That is left a great deal to the Governors. They know the boys and use their own discretion. They have got their instructions on the subject.

410. There is no standing order upon it?—I believe the instructions go up to 17.

411. Then a young prisoner who comes in for the first time at 17 would be placed with the ordinary prisoners?—No, he would be put with the juvenile class.

412. Up to 17 inclusive?—Yes.

413. Then a young prisoner of 18 would be a new offender?—Yes; but the Governor would be perfectly justified in putting apart any boy if he thought it desirable.

414. Still that is a matter which is left to the absolute discretion of the Governor, and there is no standing order or circular as to prisoners over 17?—No.

415. Then with regard to exercising. Are the younger prisoners up to 17 kept quite apart?—Yes, quite apart.

416. Would they be on the same exercising path?—No, they are generally exercised out of the ring. They have a separate ring to themselves, so that they cannot communicate with the older prisoners at all.

417. Are the exercising yards in all the prisons on pretty well the same system?—They vary in size. In some prisons they are much larger than others. It depends on the space we have available.

418. In some there are better opportunities than in others of communication?—Yes; in the larger yards we can keep them further apart.

419. But as far as your official information goes, you have no reason to think that there is any special evil at the present time?—I think not. It is one of those matters we are most particular about.

420. I think additional precautions were taken in 1879 and 1880. I think that has been considered in Sir Edmund Du Cane's book?—Yes, in 1879 and 1880 there were.

421. I rather gather from what you have said that the present system of equality of treatment does not in its effect work out equally on all classes of prisoners?—It falls less severely upon the habituals, an old hand takes it more calmly and does not think so much about it as a person who is in for the first time.

422. Then having regard to the purpose and object of imprisonment there is a certain failure, because of the unequal operation of the deterrent effects of imprisonment upon different classes of prisoners?—I do not know that it can be called a failure. A man who has been in prison often before feels it less than a man who is in for the first time and a good deal depends upon his previous class of life. A man who has never been previously convicted naturally feels it more.

423. Take the case of the young offenders. You, I think, said that the younger prisoners did not feel the same sense of shame as the older prisoners. They do not feel their position and do not feel the effects of the punishment in the same way as the older prisoners?—Yes, I think so.

424. You have that feeling on the one side, but on the other we know that the effect of imprisonment on a young person is infinitely more serious than he himself has probably any idea of?—Yes.

425. And that the real punishment to him is not the punishment which is being inflicted by the fact of his being in prison, but because of the after effects and the prison contamination which is put upon him for life. You will agree with that?—Yes.

426. Then is not it rather clear that having regard to the purpose for which imprisonment exists there is something like a failure with regard to the younger class of offenders in the sense that the actual punishment inflicted qua imprisonment does not adequately punish, perhaps for the offence committed, but the fact of their having being in prison is altogether far too severe a penalty to impose upon them having regard to the offence which they probably have committed ?—Yes, for that reason I think boys ought not to be sent to prison at all. I think prisons are not places for boys under 16.

427. I do not know whether you have personally seen the resolution which was forwarded to the Secretary of State by the Society of Chairmen and Deputy Chairmen of Quarter Sessions?—I do not think I have.

428. That is dated Tuesday the 10th April 1894. I will just read it to you. It runs as follows:—"That "the word reformatory seems to be mis-applied as "regards adult habitual criminals. That in the case "of habitual criminals for a number of small crimes "the name penal servitude carries with it in the mind "of the public a more severe punishment than is "required to meet the necessity of the case, and the "question arises whether it might not be well that the "Secretary of State should be asked to make inquiry "whether for habitual criminal for small offences "some other term than penal servitude might not be "desired, and also some other treatment, so as to "separate this class of persons, whom it may be "advisable to detain for a lengthened period from "penal servitude prisoner." You agree, I think, that a special treatment might be arranged for young prisoners?—Yes.

429. This is rather the other side of the question ?—It might be more desirable if incorrigible prisoners were treated in a separate prison, if possible, and kept together .

430. Either keep them in the existing prisons and move the young offenders elsewhere, or else keep the younger prisoners in the existing prisons and move the habituals elsewhere?—We could deal with the young offenders and keep them separate in prison, there are only a few of them, and put the habituals in another prison altogether under a severer system of discipline.

431. Do you agree with the view that the habitual prisoner who is constantly in prison for small offences and who is constantly suffering small terms of imprisonment is one of the most dangerous classes of offenders?—He is dangerous in his influence upon others.

432. But I understand this resolution to separate this particular class of habitual offenders from the more dangerous criminals, such as housebreakers, who are none the less habitual criminals, but who commit crimes which subjects them to long sentences of imprisonment?—Yes, if they are not habituals.

433. Do you agree generally that it is right to make the distinction between those two classes?—They might be treated together.

434. Then you are of opinion, as I understand it, that young offenders should be treated as a separate class from others?—Yes, up to 17.

435. Is not it the fact that after a boy or girl leaves a reformatory there is a time of great risk, and a proportion of that class falls into crime, and then there is nothing for them but to go to prison. Do you think that that particular danger might be met by the establishment of some kind of penal reformatory ? Yes.

436. Differing from the existing reformatories?—Yes.

437. And differing also from the existing prisons ?—Yes.

438. Then up to what age would you be disposed to treat young offenders differently to the older ones ?—I think it might be extended to 17, but the Statute limits it to 16.

439. Then taking the case of a lad of 18 who has been in a reformatory school and comes out, and who falls under bad influences and commits a crime, and is committed to prison, do you think that it is well to associate him with older criminals?—No, I think not. It depends a great deal upon the boy, whether he has been convicted before and the nature of his offence, I would leave a wide discretion to the Governors, they get to know the boys and their characters and habits, and if they thought it desirable that the boys should be separated they should be able to do it.

440. Would not it possibly be better to lay it down that there should be a certain class of young offenders, say, up to the age of 20 or 21, and that they should be kept as a class apart; but that the Governor should have a discretion if any of them were incurably bad and of such hopelessly depraved character that there was any danger of contamination as between those young prisoners and others, of sending them to the adult prisons?—I think the age of 21 is too advanced. Some of the worst characters are from 18 to 21; and the most troublesome. I would rather limit it to 18.

441. When you speak of the most troublesome prisoners of 21, do you mean that these possibly would be first offenders?—Not necessarily, many of them are not first offenders.

442. They would be rather those who were be coming habitual offenders?—Yes.

443. Who had probably been in a reformatory, and who probably had been in a gaol before?—Yes their proficiency in crime should be considered.

444. Look at it in another way. Supposing we take the age as suggested by you of 17 or 18, and that a lad of 17 commits a serious crime, and is committed to prison for two years or for three years penal servitude, would you suggest that when he reaches a certain age he should be transferred to the adult prison, or do you think if he has behaved himself in prison he should serve his time out in the prison for younger persons?—If he behaved himself well, I think he might serve that portion of his time in the juvenile class, if he is really well behaved. The more the well behaved ones are kept together the better.

445. Then with regard to this class we are talking about, you agree that it is desirable to make some change in the classification. Do you carry that further and say it would be also desirable to make a change in the treatment which you would apply to these young offenders?—I think not, I should leave the treatment as it is.

446. But we have already arrived at the conclusion, have not we, that prison, as such, operates very differently as between the younger offenders and the older?—It might be a question whether they should be put to first-class hard labour.

447. But I mean dealing with this particular class of young offenders it is most desirable to get a moral hold of them, to raise them up to a better idea of the duties of life, and so far as possible, to humanise and train them?—Yes.

448. Is not it possibly desirable to apply a somewhat different system of treatment to them as a class apart from that which you would apply to the hardened and habitual criminal in an adult prison?—The principle is worthy of consideration, but it would have to be carefully thought out.

449. Now with regard to first offenders mentioned in the reference, would you consider that the question of first offenders can be adequately dealt with by the First Offenders Act?—Yes, I think so.

450. Of course, to a large extent, it would be covered by any change which you made with regard to young offenders?—Yes, quite so.

451. Because first offenders as a rule are young offenders?—Yes.

452. With regard to a first offender of a somewhat advanced age would you propose any differential treatment so far as he is concerned?—This class might be located together.

453. You think that a man who has lived 40 or 50 years ought to have a higher sense of responsibility, and therefore, his first offence at that age is so grave that he deserves to be classed with the ordinary prisoners?—In the ordinary prison, but he could be kept entirely separate.

Captain Stopford.

5 July 1894.

454. Supposing a man at 40 or 50 or, say, 60 or 70 is convicted of forgery or conspiracy to defraud of a very serious kind producing lamentable consequences on a large number of people, how would you propose to deal with that class of first offenders?—In the convict prisons we keep this class, if not previously convicted entirely separate, they work together and are kept distinct from the other prisoners.

455. And in the local prisons?—They are not so classed but the same principle might be tried.

456. In the local prisons, supposing a man was sentenced to 18 months' hard labour, he would be just put into the ordinary prison population?—Yes, there would be a difficulty in employing him separately in association.

457. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I have just one question to ask you with reference to the visits. Of course, it is looked upon by the prisoners as a very great privilege to have their friends visit them?—Yes.

458. You are well acquainted, I suppose, with the places where these visits are paid?—Yes.

459. They are only granted within a short time of the day. They have all to be done within a short time?—Yes, as regards Holloway they have.

460. Have you ever been present at a time when a visit has been paid?—I have.

461. Do you think that considering the noise which exists at the time it is satisfactorily done?—I cannot say it is; but it is the best arrangement we can make under the circumstances.

462. At times it is difficult, and almost impossible, to hear your own voice?—It is very difficult, owing to the number of visits going on at the same time. It is a difficult thing to arrange for them in any other way.

463. And considering the distance that there is between the visitor and the prisoner it is almost impossible for some people to hear what is said?—It is difficult.

464. And in many instances that would render the visit almost useless?—It is a thing that requires improvement if it can be improved, but there are great difficulties.

465. And the greater the number of prisoners, and, of course, the longer the row of cells or boxes in which they are placed, the more difficult it becomes?—Yes.

466. Now with reference to the Visiting Committee. That is one of the things that was saved (if I may use the expression) from the Act of 1865, and continued in the Act of 1867, when the administration was taken from the local authorities and handed over to the Government?—Yes.

467. Now I notice in the rules that there are very extensive powers given to the Visiting Committee, and that they may draw the attention of the Commissioners from time to time to any abuse which they may think exists, or they can appeal directly to the Home Secretary?—Yes.

468. As a matter of fact, do they make their reports to the Home Secretary in the same way that Visiting Justices used to make their reports to the Quarter Sessions?—They report to the Secretary of State direct; they do not report to us at all.

469. Are they called upon to report to the Secretary of State by any rule? It does not come under the Act; but under the rules they have very great powers given to them?—I believe they are instructed to send their reports in to the Home Secretary direct.

470. To make their reports yearly or quarterly?—Annually, I believe.

471. And when the Commissioners or the inspectors go down to inspect the prisons, I suppose they let the Governor know when they are going?—No, they are not supposed to do so.

472. Do they ever let the Visiting Committee know when they are going?—No; I cannot say they never do, they might occasionally have to meet the justices, but they do not do it as a rule.

473. Then the Commissioners and inspectors do not come into contact with the Visiting Committee?—No, not necessarily; they may.

474. Then every alteration of any abuse, if they find anything, does not filter through the Commissioners or the inspectors, but goes straight to the Home Office?—Yes.

475. Any complaint or abuse, if any, which the Visiting Committee have to find go straight to the Board, I mean?—Yes, it might, but generally direct to Secretary of State.

476. And the Commissioners do not come into contact at all with the Visiting Committee?—No, not necessarily.

477. And if they should suggest anything I believe you, as Commissioner, would receive some notice of it from the Home Office?—The Visiting Committee have a minute book in which they write their remarks, if they want to call the attention of the inspectors or Commissioners to anything they very often adopt this conrse, and a copy of it is sent up to the Commissioners by the Governor, but as a matter of fact they communicate generally with the Secretary of State. direct.

478. The Chairman has asked some questions and I will not put any questions upon the general principle, but I rather gather that so far as the labour is concerned in the gaol you are of opinion that the cellular system which has gained ground, and which is becoming general, perhaps, all over the world, is the best?—Yes.

479. That is with penal labour in the first part of it?—Yes.

480. Of course, there is no reason, I assume, why the penal labour should not be productive labour in the first part of it?—It is not practicable in short sentences.

481. But supposing you can?—There is no objection to it if it can be made so.

482. And in some prisons it is made so, is it not; of course it would depend upon circumstances?—The difficulty is in getting short sentence prisoners who can turn out productive labour, there is no time to teach them.

483. But there is some productive labour which requires no skill, for instance, pumping water and that kind of thing?—Productive labour of that kind could be done.

484. And in some places it is done?—Yes, grinding corn and pumping.

485. There would be no objection if it could be done?—No, but we can buy corn as cheap as we can grind it, or cheaper.

486. When you leave the first class of hard labour and go on to industrial labour, is it your opinion that industrial labour in that stage is almost the backbone of success in prison labour?—It is; the satisfactory working of present system depends upon it.

487. Then in what form do you consider that industrial labour could best be done, in association. After a certain time I mean, nine months, I believe, is the time?—Mat-making industries could be done in association or in the cells.

488. But at present quite apart from the question of economy in any way, under which system do you think it would be better for the prisoners and for the prison system, to have it in association like we will say at Wandsworth, in shops or in cells?—I see no objection to association in the longer sentences, or to men working in workshops, under proper supervision and on productive industrial labour with sufficient staff.

489. I am talking of it now quite apart from the question of economy, but do you think that that would be the more advisable course apart from the question of economy?—Yes, under conditions before mentioned.

490. How many prisons are there that have workshops?—All the prisons have something in the shape of a workshop.

491. But nothing adequate for it?—No, only in the large prisons. There are large workshops at Wakefield and Wandsworth and other large prisons.

492. But nothing like sufficient to give accommodation to the number of prisoners who may be found there?—Not for all the prisoners, and in smaller prisons where there are only very few prisoners it would be difficult to work them in association to any extent.

493. Is one of the drawbacks to working in association that they come to know one another so well by sight?—Yes, and there is the temptation to communicate and to talk, that, of course, leads to reports and to increased punishments.

494. It would increase the expense?—Certainly.

495. And if it were a better place to work in, association, of course, is the only way in which the money could be got back would be by the better system?—By productive labour.

496. Then the result of the productive labour and the better system, so far as prisoners are concerned, is that they would not return again?—Yes, by an extended system of productive labour we might hope that it would have that effect.

497. There is another class of prisoner—a person who is committed to prison for, we will say, so many months or weeks, or whatever it may be, in default of finding sureties. How is he treated?—He is treated as a prisoner, sentenced to simple imprisonment.

498. With no privileges?—With no hard labour.

499. Do you think that is good, considering the class?—I see no objection to it.

500. Considering those offences for which they generally would be obliged to find sureties and, in default, suffer imprisonment, do you think they are in any way entitled to special treatment?—I see no objection to their being treated as they are.

501. They have no special privilege?—They are just the same as the other prisoners, but they are not sentenced to hard labour of the first class.

502. Do you see any reason why they should not be?—I do not see any necessity to alter the rules.

503. (Miss Orme.) You told us about the method you had of appointing warders and officers generally; how do you appoint those that are going to take the direction in a workshop. Do you require any special technical qualification?—Yes, we should. For any person holding the position of an artisan or an instructor, we should go into the qualifications before his name would be put upon the list.

504. So that you would send a skilled master to look after a workshop?—Yes.

505. What system do you follow with regard to the laundries and kitchens and sewing-rooms for the women; do you send skilled instructors there?—In the large prisons, where they are employed in large numbers, they are all put under women warders who know something about it. We have no specially paid instructors.

506. For instance, in a large workroom like that at Wormwood Scrubs, would the head women there have been really technically instructed in cutting out, and in quantities of material, and so forth?—No, not technically instructed. The officer who knows most about it is usually selected.

507. Then in the case of the laundries, are they skilled laundresses who are put there?—They are not skilled laundresses. In the same way we get the person who knows most about it. We have tried to get laundresses, but there is a great difficulty in getting them to come into the service.

508. Do you advertise for skilled instructors in those cases?—No.

509. With regard to the employment to which female prisoners are put is there any distinction made between the life they are likely to lead when they leave the prison; for instance, whether they will return to their own homes or whether they will earn their living in a trade?—I think not.

510. There is no distinction made?—No.

511. Do you see any impossibility in distinguishing between those prisoners who are likely to go back to mere domestic work and those who have to earn their living in a trade?—You mean as regards labour?

512. I mean simply as regards labour. Supposing you have a woman in for two years, could a distinction be made according to whether she would return to her own home for domestic duty or whether when she went out she would have to earn her living?—In giving her a trade.

513. Yes, or would you always send her to the laundry or sewing-room in the same way?—If possible she would be employed at a trade if she wished it.

514. You think there would be no difficulty in making a distinction of that sort?—I think not.

515. But none is made now?—No, the employment is left to the matron. If a female prisoner wished to be employed at any particular trade with a view of taking it up when she went out, and spoke to the matron, she would arrange it for her if possible.

516. But are there any opportunities at present for female prisoners to learn any trade of that sort?—Not many.

517. Merely domestic work, laundry work, cooking, and sewing?—Yes, I am talking of local prisons. In convict prisons it is different.

518. With regard to prisons where you get a large number of receptions such as Holloway, I suppose it is impossible to have any associated work. They are nearly all short sentences?—That is so.

519. You cannot use there, as a punishment, the withdrawal from associated work?—No.

520. So that the influence of the warders is more important than in other prisons?—Yes.

521. Do you make any difference as to the length of hours that the female warders work in those prisons of special difficulty?—No.

522. I suppose in fact the hours are rather longer when the receptions come in late?—Yes.

523. Would it be possible to make a difference as regards hours in prisons of special difficulty?—An increase of staff would be necessary.

524. You might have an increased staff?—Yes, it would be necessary.

525. In proportion to the number of receptions?—Yes.

526. I suppose it would be possible in a place like Holloway for a warder to be on duty from 6 in the morning until 12 at night, with a certain rest in the afternoon, if the receptions came in late?—I do not think the receptions come in so late as that.

527. But the settling them in cells takes time?—(Chairman.) Perhaps Captain Stopford will hand in a table of the hours of employment both in the male and female wards.

(Witness.) Miss Orme is asking as to the hours of reception. They come in very late sometimes from the Police Courts; we could not give a return of the late receptions. It does not happen every day, but it sometimes prolongs the hours, and makes it late for the Governor and everyone else.

528. (Miss Orme.) In arranging for the payment of officers I believe they supply their own food?—Yes.

529. And the prisoners cook for those who live in the prisons?—Yes.

530. Is it possible for the officers to arrange so that they dine together in two's and three's. They can cater for themselves in small groups?—They have a mess.

531. But not necessarily altogether?—They have a mess room.

532. But they may arrange, for instance, that two of them should have a dinner, and that three of them shall have another dinner?—Yes.

533. Is it in accordance with the discipline of the prisons for prisoners who are on diet to cook all these various meals?—Yes.

Captain Stopford.

5 July 1894.

534. Do you think it is in accordance with good discipline that they should do so?—I think it would be better that they should not do it if possible.

535. I should like to know whether you approve of the present system of untried prisoners having no occupation at all beyond books?—It is desirable to give them occupation as far as possible; there is no reason why they should not do something, such as sewing.

536. There are certain difficulties, are not there, such as their demanding payment, and so forth?—The difficulty arises in fixing the value of their labour.

537. You think they might be met?—There is no reason why a prisoner awaiting trial should not be employed if she wishes it, in fact the rules provide for it.

538. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Do you mean that the prisoner would demand payment?

539. (Miss Orme.) Yes, they can be paid for their labour but there are difficulties in the way of their having scissors and implements of that kind in their cells, but under certain restrictions there is no objection to it.

540. You think it is a thing that is worthy of consideration?—Yes, it is allowed by the rules.

541. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) With regard to that last question would you allow an untried prisoner to earn money in the prison from the Prison Commissioners?—The rules permit it; they are allowed to work if they like.

542. I do not think we quite understand from you the relations between the Commissioners as a board. You said that Sir Edmund Du Cane called a board when he wished, and that a Commissioner could call a board. There is no regular board meeting, I understand?—We have no fixed meeting, and now we are reduced to three it is almost impossible to have a fixed time for one.

543. Would these rules be the produce of a board?—Yes, they would be discussed at a board.

544. With every regulation that goes to a Governor?—So long as we keep within the rules the Commissioners give their own instructions without having a board meeting.

545. But the general orders for a prison would be the produce of a board?—Yes.

546. And the only directions you could give as Commissioners would be such as fell within the rules?—Yes.

547. You used the words "certified cells." That was a well understood word where the prisoners were under local authorities, but do you have your cells certified in any way now?—Yes, the inspectors certify them.

548. In your own prisons the inspectors certify cells?—Yes; no cell can be used unless it is properly certified by an inspector.

549. In fact, you certify also yourself that the cell is satisfactory?—No, the inspector certifies.

550. All the cells are your own property?—Yes, but a cell is not occupied unless it is certified by the inspector according to the Act of Parliament.

551. You consider that still applies?—Yes.

552. You have mentioned that at Holloway and at the other prisons in London overcrowding does not now take place, owing to special regulations. Is there no overcrowding in any of the provincial prisons, Manchester or Birmingham, for instance?—At Birmingham there has been, I believe.

553. Is there any reason why you should not disperse your prisoners much more largely amongst the empty cells in other prisons?—There is the hardship of removing prisoners a distance away from their friends, and it is not usual to remove them further than we can help. If there happen to be two prisons in a county or adjoining county, we should have no hesitation in removing them, but transferring prisoners to long distances is to be avoided as far as possible.

554. You think that is a grievance which the prisoners feel?—They do feel it, undoubtedly.

555. Worcester and Gloucester prisons being used for Birmingham purposes?—Yes, they might complain in that case.

556. Therefore, if local prisons are overcrowded anywhere, you think it would be necessary to enlarge those prisons, and not to make use of superfluous accommodation elsewhere?—There is an objection to enlarging prisons, over a 1,000 or thereabouts.

557. Quite agreeing with your view, and Liverpool Prison being full up, say, within 50 or 60 cells, with absolute uncertainty as to whether you might not have 100 prisoners come in, you would not like to reduce your Liverpool Prison to 200 empty cells by sending prisoners away?—Not to any great distance. The Act of Parliament allows prisons in an adjoining county to be alternative and we should not hesitate to use them to prevent overcrowding.

558. So far as adjoining counties are concerned, you think there is no objection to it?—No.

559. But by using the prisons of adjoining counties cannot you get sufficient room anywhere?—Yes.

560. So that there is no reason why Liverpool should be overcrowded?—Not if alternative prisons were used.

561. Do the Commissioners make use of their power to remove prisoners to a sufficient extent, and prevent occasionally a rush of prisoners causing the prisons to be overcrowded?—Yes.

562. With regard to the Prisoners' Aid Societies, do the Governors and the Prisoners' Aid Socities communicate freely with each other?—Yes.

563. You have said the Governor is well acquainted with his prisoners and tries to find out what is best for them?—Yes.

564. And he would communicate those views?—He would.

565. He would not be doing his duty unless he did so? That would be purely voluntary?—Yes, purely voluntary.

566. The Commissioners would encourage his so acting?—Yes.

567. So that the Prisoners' Aid Society would know what class of prisoners were coming forward?—Yes, their agents usually see them a month before they go out always.

568. With regard to what the Chairman has been speaking about as to the classification of young prisoners, will you give us a table of the prisoners between 16 and 18?—A return has been called for of juveniles in prison under 16, over 16, and under 21.

569. I should like to ask that that class between 16 and 21 should be broken up again into groups. I should say 16 to 18, and then I think there should be a class for 19 to 21.

570. (Chairman.) Yes, you should have them for each year?—For how many years?

571. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Take it for each year from 16 to 21, and let us have the number of prisoners of those ages for the last five years.

(Chairman.) Including 16 and including 21.

(Sir J. E. Dorington.) Sixteen is at present a juvenile offender. Then can you let us have a return showing how many of each age are first convictions, and how many are re-convictions?—Yes.

572. You consider that boys do not mind prison. On what ground have you formed that opinion?—From personal observation. I did not say they do not mind prison, but I said they do not mind prison in the same way as an adult, they do not take it so seriously.

573. Do you mean at the time, or when they come out?—When they come in.

574. Do you think that is the general opinion?—I am speaking for myself, it is my own opinion.

575. You said you thought a prison was not a proper place for boys under 16; does that refer to a long sentence or to a short sentence?—I think they are better out of prison under any circumstances.

576. What would you do with a boy under 16 who has committed a crime?—That depends upon his crime.

577. Say he has been picking pockets as a sample ?—It would be better to birch him and send him out.

578. You would flog ?—I would birch him.

579. Suppose he did it a second time ?—I would birch him again.

580. Under any circumstances would you confine a boy under 16 ?—I think it is better not to send him to prison.

581. Then where would you send him ?—To some other place, I do not think prison is the place for him.

582. But in a prison he does not come into contact with anybody ?—No, but they like to be thought men, and they think it is rather a fine thing.

583. You think they get a notion that prison is rather grand ?—Yes, I think so.

584. And you went on to say that for boys who had been to a reformatory school, and who then were subsequently convicted, of course getting up to a certain age that they should not go to prison ?—I think they had better not.

585. But they would be about 17 or 18 ?—That, of course, would alter the circumstances ; 17 and over 17 they should be sent to prison.

586. You suggested a penal reformatory which would be another sort of prison ?—Yes.

587. Perhaps you are aware that reformatory managers have long desired that there should be a penal reformatory to which they could send their bad boys ?—Yes ?

588. And you think boys who have been at a reformatory and who are subsequently convicted should rather be sent to that sort of reformatory than to a prison ?—It depends on the age, under 17.

589. Those must almost necessarily be older boys ?—I think boys over 17 should be sent to prison.

590. From 17 they should be subjected to the same treatment in a prison ?—Yes.

591. Perhaps you would like to make your remark that no boy should be sent to prison under 16, extend to 17 ?—Yes.

592. I suppose you are quite satisfied that there is no contamination in prisons as at present conducted until they come to long sentences and get together in association ?—I can only say that we make every effort and take every possible precaution against it.

593. Practically you are very well satisfied yourself that it does not take place ?—Yes, I think so.

594. And in your workshops in association you also think there is no harm ?—Not under proper supervision. There would be danger if they were shut up together.

595. You think you have sufficient supervision in your workshops now to prevent communication ?—I think so.

596. You have a very large number of prisoners at Wormwood Scrubs, and your workshops are not very large there ?—No, they are not.

597. Would you like to make your workshops much larger, looking at the question of contamination ?—No, I think they are sufficient for present purposes.

598. If the workshops got larger, the risk would become much greater ?—Yes ; without more officers. The more workshops and association are extended, the more warders must be employed.

599. But subject to sufficient warders, you think you might extend your workshops to any extent ?—To a greater extent if labour could be obtained.

600. At Wormwood Scrubs, your workshops are adequate for employing all the labour which is available in a prison ?—Yes.

601. So that you do not want to enlarge your workshops ?—No.

602. Your workshops at Wormwood Scrubs are much more open and free for communication than they are at Wandsworth ?—Yes ; Wandsworth was taken over from the county. Wormwood Scrubs has been built since.

603. Do you think Wandsworth is of a better pattern than Wormwood Scrubs ?—No.

604. You do not express an opinion either for one or another ?—No, they are both good.

605. (Dr. Bridges.) With regard to the question of the labour to which prisoners are set, at such prisons as Wormwood Scrubs, I think it is principally such work as making hammocks and ships' fenders, and mail-bags, and work of that kind ?—Yes.

606. That forms a large proportion of the work ?—Yes.

607. Is that work of much use to a prisoner when he is discharged ?—He might earn a living at it, but it is not so much use as mat-making would be.

608. There is another branch of labour of which we have not spoken at all ; that is, agricultural labour outside in the grounds ?—Yes.

609. Have you formed a definite opinion as to whether that would be a useful kind of labour ?—Yes, it is adopted in many prisons where we have large gardens. Vegetables are grown in most of the prisons, but it does not employ a very large number of men.

610. I observe that from the returns. Would not it be possible to employ a larger number of men at that kind of work ?—Not without enlarging the prison gardens.

611. For instance, at Wormwood Scrubs, is not there a considerable amount of ground belonging to the prison ?—No, only what you see the prison standing in ; nothing outside it.

612. Does not the ground at the south belong to the Government ?—There is only the ground that is within the walls.

613. But if there were more ground attached to the prison, you think men might be employed upon it ?—Certainly, they could be employed on gardening. A certain number are so employed in most prisons.

614. If an unskilled labourer found his way into prison, would not that kind of labour be better adapted to his physical condition, and be a better training for industry when he leaves the prison ?—Yes ; in many cases.

615. I pass now to the position of the medical officer of the prison. I suppose he reports periodically ?—He sends in an annual report.

616. To whom does that go in the first place ?—To the Commissioners.

617. Does he also report upon special incidents that occur in prison ?—Yes, he enters them in his journal.

618. And they come before the Commissioners ?—Yes ; and they come before the inspectors at their monthly visits.

619. Has your attention been drawn to the increase in the proportion of infirmary cases among the women in later years ?—No.

620. I will illustrate what I mean. In 1880, for instance, the total number of infirmary cases appearing in the return was 1,011 among women, and in 1893 the number was 1,591 ?—What return is that ?

621. I refer to a return in the report of the commissioners for 1879–80, and I compare that with the return in the report for 1892–93, the number of prisoners received into the prisons being rather greater in 1880 than in 1893. The number of infirmary cases in 1893 was 1,591 against 1,011 in 1880 ?—I do not know the reason, but probably the medical inspector might throw some light upon it.

622. That did not come specially before the Commissioners ?—No, I think not.

623. No reason occurs to you ?—No.

624. It will be found not merely to be peculiar to the return in the report of 1892-3, but also to hold good of the previous return of 1891–92 ?—I think the medical inspector will be able to explain it to you better than I can.

625. How are the warders, both male and female, who attend upon the sick in prison, chosen ?—In the large prisons the warders are chosen from some knowledge of nursing, compounders are specially appointed in larger prisons,

Captain Stopford.

5 July 1894.

626. But I am speaking of those who attend upon the sick?—They have no special training. They put their names down for this particular employment, and the doctor chooses the best men he can get.

627. Are prisoners employed in attending upon the sick?—Occasionally, if it is necessary. If it is necessary to have a man to attend a patient who is dangerously ill it is done.

628. Then, it is not insisted upon that the attendant upon the sick shall be a trained hospital attendant?—No.

629. With regard to the question of overcrowding, I believe in the local prisons the cells are practically all much of the same size?—Yes, there are about 800 cubic feet for ordinary prisoners, and 1,000 for the infirmary.

630. You are well acquainted with the Portland Prison?—Yes, I have been there.

631. The cells in which prisoners are confined there during the time when they are not at work are very much smaller than that?—Yes, they are what are called sleeping berths.

632. They do not give much more than 200 cubic feet, do they?—220, I think.

633. Do not you regard that as a very small space?—Yes; as compared with the new ones, many have already been replaced by larger cells at Dartmoor of about 500 cubic space.

634. At Dartmoor would the cells be about the same size as at Portland?—Some of them. Two new prisons have been built there with larger cells.

635. It practically means you just double the space?—Yes.

636. I believe the plan with regard to labour is that for short term prisoners for the first week they are put on No. 1 diet, which is bread and water with stirabout gruel in the middle of the day?—Yes.

637. To what length does that go?—Seven days.

638. Would a man in prison for a month be for his first week upon that diet?—Yes, for the first seven days.

639. Have you had any reports from doctors to the effect that that was found injurious?—No, I have not, but it has recently been brought to my notice that the female prisoners in London reject the Indian meal in favour of oatmeal.

640. So that in fact a woman in London on the No. 1 diet for seven days might not even eat the whole of that?—They reject the Indian meal. On the other hand it is said that in the northern counties they like Indian meal, and that to tramps it is even attractive.

641. Might there be any modification in that according to the geographical position of the prisons?—To alter the diets would be a matter of serious consideration.

642. There is a standing order, I think, with regard to injuries that have been found when prisoners have been taken to lunatic asylums. Is not that so?—Can you give me the number of the order?

643. Perhaps Dr. Gover would know that?—Yes, I think Dr. Gover would be able to tell you better.

644. With regard to insanity breaking out among prisoners, do you consider that the proportion of those who are admitted in a sound mental state into prisons, and amongst whom insanity breaks out, is larger than that among the general population. I am not speaking of those who are found to be insane on arrival at prison and of whom there is no previous record that they have been found insane?—I have no means of answering that question.

645. I did not know whether that had been considered collectively by the Commissioners?—I think not. Dr. Gover would know more about it.

646. I was only anxious to know whether it had come specially before the Commissioners for their consideration?—No, it has not.

647. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Have the Commissioners formed any opinion as to whether re-commitments are increasing in proportion to the convictions?—No, we have not.

648. You have not looked into that matter?—I have not.

649. Could you have the matter looked into for us, and find out what is the result of imprisonment at the present time as compared with former years. There is a table of re-convictions there?—Yes, at page 5, Diagram No. 13.

650. I think that only shows the population in re-conviction?—It shows the fluctuations in the estimated number of the criminal classes at large in prisons and in infirmaries.

651. Does "criminal classes" mean re-convicted persons?—No; I believe it means those known to the police to be criminal.

652. You are aware that the number of crimes in England, including the indictable offences, which are outside what are called "crime," apparently has very considerably increased?—Yes.

653 But the prison population has very largely diminished?—Yes.

654. And you would say that that is a very satisfactory result, providing that the criminality of our criminals has not increased by it?—Yes.

655. It is clear that that proves that a considerable amount of crime is punished in some other way than by going to prison, and if that is not injurious it is very desirable?—Yes.

656. The danger is that that may increase the number of re-convictions, that the criminals might be more hardened and more numerous. Do you think that is so?—I cannot say. I have not formed any opinion on the subject.

657. If you were to take the total number of convictions in any year or commitals, and deduct from it the number of persons more than once previously convicted, and then compare the numbers of second convictions with the total so found, you would know the proportion of persons who having been once committed to prison return again, and the proportions who having been once imprisoned never again enter a prison?—Yes.

658. Because no prisoner could be convicted twice unless he had been previously convicted once?—No.

659. I have taken that out for a couple of years and I think it is a return that we ought to have officially before us to enable us to judge whether our system is going on well. I have taken the proportion of second convictions on entering prisons and those not previously convicted, say in 1870, were 13·2 per cent.; in 1893 it was 12·4 per cent. That looks as if the system was a success; that although we are imprisoning very much fewer persons in proportion to the total crimes, yet the number of persons requiring to be re-committed is increasing notwithstanding that reduction. I think it will be well to probe that deeper. I want a return of the proportion of second convictions of persons entering the prison to those not previously convicted in each year, the reason being that it is clear no person can be convicted a second time unless he has been convicted a first time, and all the subsequent re-convictions must have been of persons re-convicted a second time, and if you once ascertain how many of those who are convicted come up a second time you will know whether your system of imprisonment is successful or not. That is one of the crying questions in France—the amount of recidivism which exists, I think these books do not give it to us, but they supply the means of getting it.

(Dr. Bridges.) We had better have the absolute numbers as well as the per-centages.

660. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Yes. Then may I ask for that information to be afforded for every fifth year from 1860 to the present time?—I think we can get that. It will be for every fifth year since 1860.

661. (Mr. O'Connor.) What part of the administration comes specially before you?—I take my share in the different parts.

662. Are you conversant then with the details of London prisons, for instance?—Yes.

663. You spoke of prisoners being employed occasionally only as attendants on the sick?—Yes.

664. You think the word "occasionally" represents the facts of the case?—Yes.

665. I was in a prison the other day and it was explained to me as a matter of course that the whole system was bound up with the permanent and regular employment of prisoners as attendants upon the sick?—Cooking, cleaning, and general attendance is all done by prisoners.

666. I am speaking of nursing the sick in the wards. Let us take another point. You have not much land at Wormwood Scrubs outside the prison, have you? No.

667. How much land is attached to the Wandsworth Prison?—A considerable extent.

668. Do you know in whose hands it is for occupation or use?—A part of it is let or was let to a nursery gardener.

669. Does that meet with the approval of the Commissioners?—Yes. We have lately taken some of it for a cricket ground for the officers.

670. And with regard to the rest?—We should take it if we wanted it.

671. Do you think that is the best way of using it?—I think so.

672. But is it the business of prison authorities to farm out land for market gardening purposes?—We do not want it at present.

673. If you do not want it why do you not get rid of it?—We might want it for officers' quarters or for some other purpose, that is the reason we are keeping it.

674. You will build over the whole of that?—We might build over the whole or a portion of it.

675. Within what period do you think there is a reasonable possibility or probability of that being done?—That depends entirely on the money we have to spend.

676. Is there any maximum to the number of prisoners you would have in one prison?—No.

677. I mean for practical purposes?—I think that is in my evidence already given.

678. You would flog boys up to 17?—I would birch them rather than send them to prison.

679. Or even 17 rather than send them to prison?—Yes.

680. From 18, 19, and 20 you get sometimes some of the most troublesome prisoners?—Yes.

681. That is because they have got the spirit of youth in them?—Yes, no doubt, in some cases it is so.

682. After they have been in prison a good many years that spirit goes out?—Yes, I should think so.

683. I suppose spirit is not necessarily criminality?—I suppose not.

684. It may not be the object to crush out all spirit?—No, it is not.

685. Have you any improvement to suggest other than not crushing out the spirit?—Yes. It is not intended to crush out the spirit; one of the objects of the present system is to encourage and enable a prisoner to improve his position by good behaviour and industry.

686. I suppose some of the greatest hypocrites in prison are those who get the best marks?—Probably so.

687. Do they have Sunday exercise in prison?—Not in local prisons.

688. Why?—There is not sufficient staff for it at present. Half the officers go off on alternate Sundays to give them a holiday.

689. The absence of Sunday exercise is, I suppose, a blot on the system?—It would be better to avoid it if possible.

690. But there is not sufficient staff for it?—No.

691. Speaking generally of your prisons, are they sufficiently staffed?—They are for present purposes.

692. Except that you cannot give them Sunday exercise?—No, and if there was any larger extension of prison industries we should require more.

693. You have not the same proportion in your different prisons?—For separate prisons the staff is 5 per cent. of warders and assistants.

694. (Chairman.) When you say the staff is sufficient I think you said at our last meeting that it was necessary sometimes to bring in outside assistance?—In special cases, for assizes and sessions; but for ordinary purposes the staff is now sufficient.

The witness withdrew.

Adjourned for a short time.

Mr. John Burgess Manning called and examined.

Mr. J. B. Manning.

695. (Chairman.) You are the Governor of Pentonville?—I am.

696. How long have you been there as Governor?—Four years at Pentonville.

697. Where were you before?—I was eight years at Wakefield.

698. As Governor?—Yes, and about 17 years at Chester Castle as Governor. I was five years there as Deputy Governor and I have been in the prisons service since 1859. I was appointed Deputy Governor at Chester Castle in October 1859, Governor in 1865. I moved to Wakefield in August 1882 and to Pentonville in June 1890.

699. You have had before you the reference to the committee?—Yes.

700. I wish to ask you first some questions as to allegations about overcrowding at prisons. In your experience have you found that the available accommodation is insufficient?—To what period does that allude? Do you mean while I have been at Pentonville or during the whole of my prison experience? For four years I have been in London.

701. Then let us confine ourselves to that?—I have been obliged to apply for prisoners to be removed from Pentonville during that period.

702. Because there was not a sufficient number of certified cells?—Because I anticipated we might receive more prisoners than we had accommodation for.

703. As a matter of fact you have never had more prisoners than can be accommodated in the certified cells and the hospital?—No, we have three rooms which are certified for 19 beds in the hospital, and on one occasion I have been within one prisoner so as to have only one spare bed, but that was for one night only.

704. Have you had to put prisoners in the hospital who otherwise would not have been put there?—Yes, in the hospital cells. We have 38 cells at the hospital which are like ordinary cells, but they are at the hospital. They are certified in every way the same. Some of them have not the hospital beds, but the ordinary plank beds, and on that occasion I occupied the whole of those; in fact, I had only left seven beds vacant. We have a room nearly as large as this room where the medical officer sees the prisoners every day that have been received the day previous; and I directed to be made on that night six separate beds there, and I put an officer in with them during the night, who sat up, and who was visited by the officers on duty during the night.

Mr. J. B. Manning.

5 July 1894.

705. What year was that?—That was in 1893, I think on the 12th of December.

706. That was running it rather fine?—It was very fine. The next day we had a large discharge, and therefore I had 30 spare beds the next day. It was only for one night that I did it.

707. Do you imagine that the 17th section, sub-section 1 of the Act of 1865, is adequate under existing circumstances?—I think that was passed under different circumstances. It was applicable to each local authority, and at that time the prison for Middlesex was Coldbath Fields Prison. When that was closed the prisoners were removed to Pentonville, but I have now prisoners from other counties and other jurisdictions which would not have been committed to this prison. I get prisoners now from Essex, and also from Kent and Hertfordshire.

708. So that acting on this particular sub-section you would run some risk of not having sufficient accommodation?—Not acting strictly on the sub-section, because then it was only intended to provide for prisoners for a certain district in Middlesex; but now we have prisoners from the other counties.

709. But the practice of the Prisons Department is regulated still by this particular clause of the Act; that is to say, they take the average maximum for the five years?—Probably they may.

710. And they provide that there is an equivalent number of certified cells in each prison?—In one place or another.

711. In each prison?—It is so difficult to confine a prison now to a particular district. You cannot do it as you could under that Act of 1865. When that Act was passed every local jurisdiction was compelled to provide its own prison, but since they were taken over by Government we have a less number of prisoners; and we receive from other districts.

712. I understand that the number of certified cells in a local prison is governed by the first sub-section of clause 17 of the Act of 1865?—That was passed when every local authority was bound to maintain its own prison or to provide for its prisoners being kept somewhere else where there was an excess of accommodation, and when the Prisons Act of 1877 was passed the Government took over the whole of the prisons.

713. Subject to the regulations in the Act of 1865?—You cannot confine them to particular districts because there are now many counties where they have no prison at all. In your own county, sir, of Flint, there is no prison.

714. Certainly, but the number of certified cells does not have relation to the particular place where prisoners come from?—That was what the Act was passed for. There was no other way of sending to prisons when this Act was passed in 1865; because if you take the county of Middlesex were we are now sitting we have Pentonville Prison and Wormwood Scrubs Prison both in the same county; and you have also the City of London that was obliged to provide its own prison, which used to be at Holloway. Wormwood Scrubs was then a convict prison and although I have a large number of prisoners in custody (I have to-day 1,142) I know that there are 200 to 300 vacant cells at Wormwood Scrubs, and if I should receive an unusual number during the next few days I could get 50 prisoners transferred over there in 24 hours.

715. Have you seen this return which was issued last year on the motion of Mr. Morton?—I have.

716. Then the number of authorised cells in the second part of the term is calculated on the five years average of the greatest number of prisoners in each of the five years under section 17?—Taking the largest number of prisoners in that particular prison.

717. Yes?—Yes.

718. Then each prison is bound to have a number of certified cells equal to that?—Yes, no matter where they come from.

719. That is so?—Yes.

720. Then according to the working of that upon what you say it does not appear that that allows altogether a sufficient margin to provide against a large transfer from some sudden cause or another to the prison?—That is based on the extent of the requirement on the greatest number on a day for five years. Take, for instance, the last five years, take to 1893.

721. Excuse me; but do you say this return is based upon the greatest number on any one day in the the five years?—Yes, the first of the five years the greatest number was 1,171; in the next it was 1,165; in the next it was 1,185; and in the next it was 1,183. This is not from Mr. Morton's return because this is down to our present time. Then on the 30th of December last year I had 1,192 prisoners in custody. The 30th is the correct date; not the 12th, as I said before.

722. Mr. Morton's return is not based on that principle. It is based on the average of the five years?—On the average of the largest number for the five years, the maximum average.

723. It is not the maximum average; it is the average maximum in each of the five years; it is not the greatest number on any one day in five years?—Yes, for instance, in one year the greatest number in one particular day was a certain number; in the next year it was another number; in the third, fourth, and fifth years it was another number. You add those five together and divide by five and then you have got the average of the greatest number.

724. (Mr. O'Connor.) The average of the five numbers, each being the highest number for a particular year?—Certainly, and the average for the last five years is 1,169. We have 1,174 separate cells in Pentonville Prison.

725. (Chairman.) In addition, you have how much accommodation in the hospital?—For 19 prisoners, that is in association, in three rooms. There are 38 cells in that 1,174 that are separate cells, which are, of course, always available to sleep a man in.

726. How many associated rooms have you in the hospital?—Three.

727. Holding how many?—Nineteen prisoners.

728. Do you approve of the system of association?—No.

729. Under Rule 26?—That is separate cells with three in a cell. I think that is most objectionable. At Pentonville Prison we never put three in a cell, although it is allowed. According to my experience, I think it most objectionable.

730. Will you state the reasons for that?—I am afraid it is difficult to state them. There is always a fear of something going wrong. For instance, one man being asleep and two awake.

731. Is there any special arrangement for the inspection of such cells?—We never have them at Pentonville.

732. So that it really does not come in there?—No.

733. How is it that that system is not worked at Pentonville?—We have never been forced to it. We have always had separate beds for all the prisoners we have had there; that is occupying the 19 beds in the rooms at the hospital.

734. Assuming you have the same class of prisoners as you have elsewhere in other prisons, it is alleged that you have a certified number of epileptic or diseased prisoners, whom it is not safe to put into solitary confinement. They are, therefore, put, under this rule, in association of not less than three on the recommendation of the medical officer?—Yes.

735. Then do I understand that the medical officer at Pentonville has never recommended that they should be so associated?—Never. If a man is required to be associated, he is put in one of those associated rooms where there are lights all night and an officer always on duty.

736. But in the case of an epileptic prisoner?—He would be there, if the doctor thought his case sufficiently severe for that kind of treatment. Many men who come in say they are epileptic, but, while they are there, they have no fit. A man is put into the padded cells so that he may not injure himself with falling, and the light is left burning, and the men are visited almost continuously both night and day.

737. You state that you have a very strong opinion against this system of association?—Yes.

738. And you have indicated generally on what that is founded. Where have you had practical experience of the dangers and evils of that?—I had that at Chester. The accommodation was small at Chester. When we had religious riots at Birkenhead, about Garibaldi and the Pope, we had large numbers committed there, and also at the time of the Colliery riots at Dukinfield and Ashton-under-Lyne, and then I received the whole of the assize prisoners, and we were obliged to put them in association and to put three in a cell to find accommodation for them. My opinion is that it is most objectionable. I used to have the men quarrelling and fighting when they were three in a cell.

739. Have you had experience of that kind subsequently at Wakefield?—No, we had ample accommodation there. It accommodated something like 1,700 prisoners; but from the time the Commissioners took possession they reduced it by distributing some of them and sending them to the nearer prisons. That reduced the number, so that when I went there we had never above 1,000, and when I left we had only about 600 prisoners in.

740. You would be in favour of the complete abolition of this three in a cell system?—Certainly, most decidedly.

741. (Mr. O'Connor.) Your objections to three in a cell would be the same as your objections to two?—Two is not allowed. That is illegal.

742. But the objection would be the same?—Certainly.

743. (Chairman.) Now with regard to the question of visits to prisoners and communications with them, are you satisfied with the working of the existing rules?—Yes, I have no occasion to find fault with them.

744. You are not of opinion that it would be wise to allow a freer system of visits, where the responsible authorities are satisfied that a visit could do no harm and might do good to the prisoner?—You are not speaking now of prisoners' friends, are you?

745. I am speaking of any visits?—By people who fancy they have a mission for doing good among the prisoners?

746. Yes?—No, I think we have ample means of doing that good. We have two chaplains, a Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, and we have a gentleman from the St. Giles' Christian Mission and we have the Salvation Army people.

747. At the present moment I am speaking rather of the earlier period, and not of the period before discharge. Take the case of a man who is sentenced to 18 months or two years. I suppose that the representatives of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society would not come until within the last month?—No.

748. Then, so far as the earlier period is concerned, you think that the existing system is sufficient, and that it would not be desirable to extend facilities for visits to prisoners?—That is my opinion.

749. Do you personally go round every day?—I do.

750. Do you see every prisoner?—I do not. I see about half the prisoners. I have a Deputy Governor, and we each exchange wings alternately, so that I go to half one day and the deputy goes to the other half, and then I follow him the next day, but any prisoner who wishes to see me, applies in the morning to the officer, and he is brought down to the office where I hear complaints and applications.

751. Is that system of exchange generally done according to your experience?—Generally, where there are deputies. I did the same in Wakefield when my deputy shared the duty with me and I found it in operation in Pentonville and have continued it.

752. Would the same system be applied where there is a chaplain and an assistant chaplain?—They divide according to their sentences generally. One will take the long-time prisoners, say, of three months and over, and the assistant chaplain will generally take those for under three months.

753. With regard to the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society there was a circular issued I think from the Home Office at the end of last year?—Yes.

754. Which was to be handed to prisoners before their discharge?—Well, it was stated that prisoners were to know of it before their discharge. We have had a notice put in all the cells that anyone wanting assistance must apply a fortnight at least before their discharge. Those circulars have not been withdrawn.

755. Is this circular only given on application by the prisoner?—The others are in their cells. We have a small notice. I have not withdrawn them from Pentonville, I found them in use there.

756. You mean the old notice?—Yes.

757. I understand rather that this circular was to take the place of them?—Well it was, but I have never been clearly informed whether there was to be a copy in every prisoner's cell. I have not received enough of them to put them in every cell, but I think it was stated that the prisoners were to have it put where they could see it, and they cannot see it except in their cells, because you cannot have them stopping in the corridors; and to have it put up in the lodge when they are coming out is perfectly useless.

758. Have the prisoners any opportunity of seeing a list of the societies which may give aid?—No. I think that circular directs that it shall be the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society in connexion with the prison, but that society may refer it to others if they think fit. My experience is that they never refer one to another. There is a little jealousy between them, I think.

759. Then this circular puts the responsibility on to the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society?—Yes.

760. And then that society can communicate, if it is desirable, with certain other agencies?—Yes.

761. That is to say, it leaves the whole discretion in the matter to them?—It does as far as that circular goes. They may have communications with other Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies, but they do not refer one to another in the same prison.

762. Do you see any objection to putting a notice in the prisoner's cell that before his discharge he can, if he chooses to apply for it, be supplied with a list of all help agencies, and that he will be allowed to choose the agent of any particular society?—I do not see that there is any objection to that, but it is only the experienced prisoners, who have been in prison repeatedly, that would know the difference between these societies; and I find they frequently try to get the benefit of both societies at Pentonville. A man will put his name down at Pentonville for the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society. It is never refused. If I can recommend it I do so; but if I think there is no hope in the man's case I send it to them; if I cannot recommend it I submit it to the society and let them deal with it. They are the responsible people. The applicant will often make an application to see Mr. Wheatley, of the St. Giles' Christian Mission.

763. I understand you see no harm in supplying a list to prisoners if they wish for it, nor to allowing them to see any one gentleman of any society they please?—Not the slightest.

764. The question has been referred to us as to whether the existing arrangement under which where there are over 700 prisoners there should be a Deputy Governor. It has been referred to us as to how that system works. Have you any views on the subject?—Well, with 700 prisoners, I should like a deputy.

765. Do you think 700 is a right division to make?—Well, I cannot exactly say. That is a subject which I have not thought about. I should like a deputy with 600 prisoners.

766. Perhaps you would like a deputy with 200?—No, I should not care about a deputy with 200. My numbers got down to 600 at Wakefield, and the

Mr. J. B. Manning.

Deputy Governor was transferred. I made no objection to that, because I visited the prisoners myself.

767. You managed 600?—Yes.

768. But that would be about the limit?—Yes, I should not like more without a deputy.

769. Do you think it more desirable to have two prisons of 600 or one of 1,200, in the interests of the prisoner and the supervision by the authorities?—I should prefer one prison of 1,200 with a Governor and a deputy. That is, taking such prisoners as we receive at Pentonville, because it is only a few of them that want attention. 12,341 prisoners, I think, I received last year, and above half of those were for 14 days and under. 12,341 was our gross reception last year, and 6,300 odd of those were for 14 days and under.

770. Have you any view upon the practice of appointing to the charge of a prison a chief warder where the number of the prisoners is below 100?—The present practice is 100. I think that is going rather high. There should be some few small prisons for men who are chief warders to look to get the governorship of, I think; but I do not think it is wise to extend it too far, although I am a man who has risen myself.

771. Do you give that opinion upon your own observation?—My own observation is, that I have had with me, men that have passed on to be chief warders in charge, and I know that some of them were, I may say, almost so illiterate to a certain extent, that they would be to a great extent at the mercy of their clerk as far as official correspondence went. Then I know that in some prisons they have met with some little opposition from the chaplain and the surgeon who have objected to receive their salary almost from an officer that was compelled to wear a uniform.

772. Are the warders in charge compelled to wear a uniform?—Yes.

773. What kind of uniform do they wear?—An ordinary chief warder's uniform.

774. With any distinctive mark?—Not for being in charge. It is an ordinary uniform of a first-class chief warder, and whenever he is on duty he is supposed to wear that uniform. I know I had one—a very good man—who was in charge of a prison that I will not name, and I know he had a good deal of unpleasantness both with the surgeon and the chaplain.

775. That would not necessarily show that he was not fit for the position?—No, it was rather a large prison. It was close on 100 prisoners, and I think they did not like it.

776. Do you think that the general system of punishment is satisfactory?—I think so.

777. You have no proposal to make for any change? No. I think that our present powers if used patiently and fairly and with discretion are sufficient to meet all cases.

778. Are you in favour, as a matter of general principle, of light punishments?—Yes.

779. And short?—Of light punishments, and short but progressive. If a man is brought before me for not doing his task after he has been shown it and has had time to acquire knowledge of the work, the first time I generally caution him. He will say perhaps, "I cannot do this," but I say to him, "we know from "long experience better than you can what can be "done and the law is that you must do it. If you do "not you will compel me to punish you, but this time "I will let you off with a caution, though you must "remember that I shall not be able to do it again." Many of them go back to their work and do it like men, and if a man comes again I give him the least punishment I can. If he is a man for more than a month and certified for first-class hard labour, I order him to earn a few extra marks in the first stage, but if he is a short period man, for less than a month, I have no alternative but to give dietary punishment and all I can do is to alter his diet. The rules say I may alter it for one day, but I generally give it for three-quarters of a day in the first instance. I rarely go to the extent of my power with regard to the No. 1 punishment diet, and I think I have never gone to the extent allowed me with either No. 2 or No. 3.

780. Have you been fortunate in the punishment record at Pentonville?—I do not quite grasp your question.

781. Does Pentonville show a favourable record with regard to prison punishment?—I am not certain. I have not compared it carefully with others.

782. But you have not had any particular difficulty in controlling it?—No, I have not. I have got a deputy governor who had seen nothing of prisons before. He has repeatedly expressed his astonishment that the prisoners were as well behaved as they are.

783. Coming to the cases where you think a more progressive punishment is necessary, are you in favour of making it short and sharp?—With dietary punishment you cannot go to any great extent. I am limited to three days. I can give three days bread and water diet, but I never do that except for very bad cases.

784. Are you in favour of flogging?—No.

785. Have you often had occasion to flog?—We have a good number at Pentonville. At Pentonville the Visiting Committee orders flogging in nearly every case I bring before them where they have the power and the prisoner is certified as fit for it.

786. Do you approve of that?—I do not personally. I am sorry to see it inflicted, and I generally tell prisoners so. We have prisoners of contentious character, who seem ill at ease with their surroundings and who seem inclined to fight, and I tell them if the effect of my conversation with them is not sufficient that I shall send for a magistrate and that they will be flogged. I tell them it is a painful and degrading punishment and one which I am sorry to see inflicted, but I cannot help it if they will not conform to the rules.

787. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) What punishment do you want the magistrates to give?—They have power to alter the diet. They can give a longer period of No. 1 diet.

788. (Chairman.) Do you think from your experience that magistrates are more inclined to inflict severe punishments than Governors are?—I think so.

789. Do you think the system of punishment in local prisons by Visiting Justices answers well?—Yes, I believe it does. I have nothing to say against it. We have reports, and although I have 1,100 prisoners in custody I have frequently not a single report.

790. Do you think the power of the Governor is too limited?—I do not think it is. I think it is quite sufficient if used with judgment and discretion.

791. You would not be in favour of any further limitation?—No, I think not. I like to have the power to tell the prisoners that I can go to greater lengths if they compel me to do so. I think it has a deterrent effect.

792. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You have the punishment cell as well as the dietary to rely upon?—We have really no punishment cell at Pentonville.

793. A partially dark cell?—No, I have no partially dark cells. The only ones we have are cells with three doors to them, and if a man is noisy we put him there, and he does not disturb the other prisoners. The squares of glass in those cells are smaller, so that, even if he is inclined to do it, he cannot break his windows and do so much damage. The magistrates order a dietary punishment sometimes in the punishment cell, and then we send them down to these strong cells.

794. (Chairman.) Do you fully approve of the existing mark system?—Yes.

795. That works quite equally among prisoners?—Yes, I think it does.

796. I mean, for instance, a physically weak prisoner is able to earn as many marks as a strong prisoner?—Certainly; all those facts are taken into consideration, and they are not put to anything unless the doctor certifies them as fit for it, and a weakly prisoner on entering is seen at once and brought to my notice, and he gets his eight marks, his full marks, if he does his best.

797. They have all exactly the same advantages?—Yes, no matter what their physical condition or previous circumstances may have been.

798. Have you formed any opinion as to whether the best warders come from the military and naval classes or from the civilian classes?—I prefer the military men, because we get the pick of military men for the prison service. No military man is looked at unless he has a six years' good character. He must have been discharged with six years' good character, and then they are more alert than civilians. They know the importance of strict obedience to all orders, and some of the men that we get are remarkably good. We have about an equal proportion of military and civilians at Pentonville. I think we have a total staff of 100 all told, and I think we have about 46 that have been in the army and navy, and the remainder are civilians.

799. But, on the whole, you think that the warders drawn from the military and naval class make the best warders?—Well, we get very few naval men. I do not know very much of naval warders. I have had one or two mercantile marine men, and I do not prefer them, because they are noisy, shouting fellows, and I do not like any noise in my prison, and I forbid any officer to put his hand on a prisoner.

800. You prefer the warders from the military?—The characters being equal, I should take the military man in preference to the other.

801. Then you are not disposed to think there is any evil arising from what has been called "militaryism" in the newspapers?—No; I have seen that statement in the papers, but I do not think there is anything in it, as far as my experience goes.

802. In giving that answer do you take into consideration all classes of officials in prisons, Governors as well as warders?—Yes, I do. At present we are generally getting military men as Deputy Governors, and I know that the strictest inquiry is made as to their antecedents, their treatment of men, and whether they have been in difficulties of any kind, also their temper and disposition, before they get appointed—they are sent to a few of the large prisons where they are under an old Governor, and where they have a lot of experience before they go to take charge of a prison. I can tell you a tale of the old days when a particular prison governorship was considered the plum of the service and half a dozen Governors were selected after careful inquiry by the Visiting Justices, but when the matter came before Quarter Sessions a gentleman who had had nothing to do with the prison before, whipped up the whole of the County Magistrates and they put the whole of the six Governors on one side and selected him as Governor, the result of which was that the Committee resigned in a body. Take my own case. I was a Deputy Governor for five years and a candidate for the governorship of Chester Castle. I sent a circular round and I said I could not from my position canvass the magistrates for the appointment. An adjutant who was stationed at Chester Castle was also a candidate, and the whole of a bench of magistrates voted for him because I had not canvassed them for their votes, although I had sent a circular round. That was the old style of appointment.

803. You think there has been considerable improvement since then?—I think so.

804. Do you think the hours of labour are too long?—No, I do not think we could manage with less hours.

805. Do you think they would be more efficient servants if their hours were shorter?—I do not think they would. I have 85 subordinate officers, and I do not know that there is a more respectable or better looking lot to be found in London. It is very rare that any of them come late, though they have to be there by 6 in the morning; then they have breakfast and dinner and leave at 6 in the evening, and there is no complaint to make.

806. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) At what time do they come in?—At 6 in the morning. You will always find some dissatisfied men who are agitating, and I know that there were some persons that were agitating and trying to get up an agitation for shorter hours, but my officers did not join in it.

807. (Chairman.) I am afraid that is a common practice now?—Yes. You were speaking about visiting. I thought, perhaps, you were going to speak about the ordinary visits to prisoners.

808. I was speaking generally of the existing system and as to whether it should be extended?—I was thinking of ordinary visits to prisoners, where their friends come to visit them.

809. Have you any view on that?—Yes, I have thought that after the first three months they might get a little more indulgence.

810. That is what I rather wanted to get at?—A convicted prisoner must wait for three months before he can get a visit. A trial prisoner can be visited every day and he can write a letter every day.

811. You would allow rather more latitude in that direction?—I think so after the first three months.

812. Subject to the discretion of the Governor?—And the prisoner's conduct.

813. And as to the character of the visitor?—Of course, the Governor always has power to refuse admission to objectionable visitors, and I do refuse them. If they are men that have been repeatedly convicted and recently discharged, if they come to see a friend I tell them it is only intended for respectable friends. I explain it to them and they are always satisfied, and I never hear anything more about it.

814. Have you anything more to state on that point?—No, trial prisoners, I think, get everything they can expect. I think that bailing might be used with advantage more freely for trial prisoners and that a man might be allowed out to earn something for his defence when his trial comes on. I know that is done largely in Sheffield. Mr. Jackson (Chief Constable) is a man of great experience and tact, and a man must be a very bad character who is committed for trial if he does not get the opportunity of bail if anyone is willing to be bail for him. I was there for eight years and we had hardly a case of estreated recognizance. The men turn up there and take their trial, and if they get their term commence to serve it.

815. I come now to (e) in the reference, regarding prison labour and the health of prisoners. To what extent do you have associated labour at Pentonville?—To a very small extent. Do you call the treadmill associated labour, sir?

816. Well, I can hardly say without having seen how it is worked?—There is no opportunity of talking. It is in a large room like this and the cells are on each side.

817. It is not in cells?—They are in partitions but open at the back.

818. (Sir Algernon West.) There is a kind of wings between each prisoner and the wheel?—Yes, there is a wooden partition.

819. (Mr. O'Connor.) They cannot see each other?—Not when they are working, except when they come down to rest.

820. (Chairman.) That would be called associated labour.—We have that, and we have the bakers in association, and we have a workshop where we employ joiners, tinners, blacksmiths, and plumbers. In the washhouse they now wash in boxes and there is a flap to the door there, so that they are more shut in than the mills are. We have some few in the grounds, such as gardeners, but they are generally scrofulous men, or men to whom the doctor's attention has been called, and they are generally put out as gardeners. They, perhaps, have swollen glands, or something of that sort.

821. What per-centage of prisoners would work at associated labour?—Including the mill; I suppose we have about a quarter of our prisoners at it.

Mr. J. B. Manning.

5 July 1894.

822. Have you any official definition of associated labour?—No. Well, where men are together; where they are not separated in their cells. "Associated" or "cellular" is the only distinction, and we have no space at Pentonville for much outside labour.

823. You would be glad of more associated labour of an industrial kind?—No, I do not think it is well to have the men work in workshops. The experience of those has always been bad. The men will communicate and can communicate, and if ever I have a complaint made of people writing letters, getting pieces of metal, or pieces of a joiner's pencil to write with it is generally from men who are working in association.

824. Those are drawbacks; but, on the other hand, are not there considerable advantages?—I do not know that there are.

825. Would not it humanise the prisoners rather more?—I cannot say that it does. The old hands—men who have been in repeatedly—always crave for association and try to come where they can get the opportunity of talking with others, whereas the respectable man, the timid man, who comes into prison for the first time, is glad to get away from everything and away to his cell, so that he may not be recognised.

826. Then would you be in favour of extending industrial work in isolation?—I would employ them in their cells if I could.

827. Are you in favour of non-productive labour?—No, of productive.

828. Would you wish to abolish non-productive labour?—I should be glad to see it abolished; but we have really no non-productive labour. Oakum-picking brings in something, though not much, and our treadmill we grind corn with.

829. Have you no crank?—No.

830. You have no unproductive labour?—No.

831. (Sir Algernon West.) I suppose the treadmill grinds corn?—Yes.

832. That is merely a means to an end. You could grind the corn with far more economy?—Well, there would be an expenditure on fuel. You would require fuel and stokers, and such things, if you were to do it. At Wakefield it is used for pumping water. They pump the water for the prison with it.

833. (Chairman.) Then how do you provide labour for prisoners when they are admitted?—When they come in at first do you mean, sir?

834. Yes?—We generally put them to oakum picking for a day or two. That is a stop gap in all prisons. It is a thing you can put anyone to, and a month's man cannot do much else, because if he is certified for first-class hard labour he is put on the mill for six hours, and he has only a portion of his time left for oakum picking. As soon as he gets 224 marks he gets off the mill, and then we learn him anything we can do for the Government. We make letter bags for the Post Office, and coal sacks for the Navy.

835. The view has been expressed to the Committee that in the case of a certain number of prisoners on admission it has been found that they are physically unfit for labour requiring any skill?—They are undoubtedly.

836. And that even oakum picking is rather beyond them, and that the only thing for them is the crank?—We get them all to pick oakum. The crank is perfectly useless.

837. Your experience shows that you can set prisoners to work on admission without the use of what is called non-productive labour?—Certainly. You will find every prisoner employed the day after his admission into Pentonville Prison. He will be picking oakum or something.

838. What is the maximum number of hours in hard labour?—Ten, but we do not take more than six at the wheel. We are limited to six hours at the wheel in first-class hard labour, and the only first-class hard labour we have is the treadmill.

839. Do you think that maximum is too large?—No.

840. There is no danger from it?—No, I do not think there is.

841. You, of course, have had experience of the withdrawal of mat-making and other industries from prisons?—Yes.

842. Did you think that was a misfortune?—I think it was a great misfortune. I was sorry to lose it as a prison employment. I looked upon it as peculiarly a prison employment.

843. You would like to see it introduced again?—Yes, I should like to see it introduced again.

844. Any extension of a suitable industry you would welcome?—Yes.

845. Now with regard to the system of distributing books. That is in the hands, as I understand, of the chaplains and the schoolmaster warders?—They do it; but the order is that the prisoner's books are to be changed once a week, and that is done strictly.

846. That is not the universal system. It is once a fortnight, is it not, in some cases?—No, it has been once a week for some time. I think it is an order from the Commissioners.

847. At all events it is once a week in Pentonville?—Yes.

848. Would you be in favour of allowing prisoners within certain hours to read as much as they liked?—Well, we could not exchange the books oftener than once a week where there is such a large number to exchange. When a man has done his task or when he is having his meal he may read, but he must not neglect his work for the purpose of reading.

849. Has he his book in his cell?—Yes, certainly.

850. He is liable to be inspected?—He is continually inspected. Officers are continually going round and seeing how they are doing their work.

851. If it were practically possible and provided it did not interfere with the prison hours of labour, you would be in favour of allowing prisoners to retain suitable books as much as they liked?—I do not see any objection to it, but we could not, I think, change them oftener than once a week.

852. That is a practical question?—Prisoners will come and say "I have had this book before and I "have read it." I will say "Who is it by?" Perhaps he does not know. "What is it about?" He cannot tell. I tell them that books are given for their improvement and not merely to skim through; but when once they have read a book through they ought to be able to pass an examination upon it.

853. (Mr. O'Connor.) What do you understand by the words "Exchange a book once a week?"—The schoolmaster goes round with trays of books and each prisoner who is entitled to library books has a library card in his cell, so that the officer can see what books he has had, so as not to give him the same one again. Sometimes he will ask for the same book.

854. I understand the mechanical arrangement, but do you mean that there is in a prisoner a right to ask for a new book once a week?—Yes.

855. Or to retain the old one?—Yes; he can ask to be allowed to keep it another week and he is allowed to do so.

856. (Chairman.) With regard to prisoners who show signs of insanity, what precautions do you take?—Of course, we call the attention of the medical officer to them at once. He directs them to be put in what we call "observation cells." They are ordinary cells but they have lights always at night, and they are visited every half hour night and day. The man is watched there.

857. Do you think it is becoming an increasing practice for prisoners to be sentenced or sent to prison, though even in the court there are, at any rate, primâ facie grounds for supposing them to be either insane or on the verge of insanity?—I do not think that it is increasing, but it is a constant practice, and the friends of prisoners and the local authorities sometimes will try to get rid of those crazy individuals by sending them to prison; and as soon as they are sent there they will send a medical certificate or something to say that the man has been troublesome, and they were afraid of him when he was at large, and they hope some steps will be taken to get him into a lunatic asylum. That is, they try to shift the responsibility from the local authorities to the prison authorities. There were one or two cases at Wakefield. One where a man was committed for trial, and no doubt was insane at the time he was committed, who was removed to an asylum, and the Prison Commissioners to this day are paying something like 12*s.* a week for the man's maintenance there, which is far more than the average cost of patients in the asylum.

858. (Mr. O'Connor.) Do you mean that was the result of a conspiracy by the man's friends?—It was not conspiracy, but it was a shirking of responsibility.

859. (Chairman.) Have you any increase in insanity amongst your prisoners?—No.

860. Do you think prison life and discipline has any tendency to produce insanity?—Not at all. If you take up a volume of judicial statistics it would seem that the per-centage of lunatics to the population of every age is very large, but of those that are sent away as lunatics you will find the great majority of them were lunatics when they came to us, and perhaps had been so for a long time. Very few men come perfectly rational to prison, and go on for any length of time, and then become insane.

Mr. J. B. Manning.

5 July 1894.

861. The strain on the prisoner is generally during the first period of confinement?—Yes, the first portion of his first sentence. I think the mental anxiety is then greater than at any time, and also just previously to his discharge. I have known men to serve a long sentence, and to go on well, and then during the last month run down frightfully from anxiety as to what will become of them in the future, and how their friends will receive them.

862. Having regard to that, would you be in favour of making any relaxation in the present system?—I do not think you could because they would always know when the end was coming, and the mental anxiety would always come accordingly.

863. But still a little gentler treatment would mitigate that?—I do not think it would, it is anxiety of mind as to the future.

864. (Mr. O'Connor.) It is the absence of hope?—The absence of hope and the idea of what is to become of them when they go away, and how they will be received by their friends.

865. (Chairman.) Has the general health of your prisoners always been satisfactory?—Yes.

The Committee adjourned until Thursday the 12th of July, at 10.30.

THIRD DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Thursday, 12th July 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN).

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.
Sir JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
RICHARD BURDON HALDANE, Esq., Q.C., M.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
MISS ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Mr. JOHN BURGESS MANNING recalled and further examined.

Mr. J. B. Manning.

12 July 1894.

866. (Chairman.) Coming to the question with regard to juvenile offenders do you think, speaking generally, the present arrangement is satisfactory?—No.

867. You do not think it is satisfactory?—I do not; I think it is a pity to send juveniles to prison as they are sent.

868. When you say "juveniles" do you mean boys or girls of 16?—Boys or girls under 16.

869. But do you think that is sufficient definition of the term "juvenile"?—Well, for not sending them to prison I think it is; but where we take them as juveniles in prison I think that age might with advantage be extended.

870. What is your opinion as to the effect of imprisonment upon young persons (I am speaking now of prisoners say under the age of 20 or thereabouts), and the older men?—Well, I think they all lose the dread of prison when once they have been in it.

871. Do you think that the younger prisoners have not the same feeling with regard to prison, and do not look upon it in the same way as the older men?—I do not think there is much difference. I think most people dread a prison until once they have been in it; but, once they have been in it, a good deal of that dread is gone, particularly amongst the juveniles.

872. Do you think that a prison is as deterrent to a lad of 17 or 18 as it is to an older man?—Do you mean before he has been in or when once he has been in?

873. I mean when once he has been in and when once he experiences what prison is?—I do not think there is much difference; I cannot think there is.

874. Captain Stopford seems to think that the younger prisoners did not feel the effect of imprisonment so seriously, and treated it to a certain extent in a spirit of levity?—There is no doubt that is true, because they cannot look ahead like the older person can, the person who is more advanced in years feels the consequences and sees the consequences of it as it will affect him in after life, and I do not think the juvenile does realise that. He finds that prison is not as dreadful as probably he has pictured it to himself, and then he has less fear of it afterwards than he had before.

Mr. J. B. Manning.

12 July 1894.

875. I suppose you would say it would be natural that a lad should have high spirits?—Yes.

876. And therefore would be able to bear imprisonment better, and even to look at it as a change not altogether unpleasant from the life he has been accustomed to lead?—That would only apply to the lowest class, I believe.

877. But still you would agree that so far as the actual effect of imprisonment is concerned, the younger prisoners would not feel it quite in the same way as the older prisoners?—Certainly.

878. Then so far as that is concerned it would not be in the same degree so much of a deterrent in the case of the young prisoners as in the case of the old?—No, it would not.

879. Then looking at it from another point of view, the effect of imprisonment upon a lad or upon a girl cannot really be estimated by them?—No.

880. But it has very serious consequences for them in after life?—I believe so. That is my impression. Once the stigma of the prison is attached to them I think it is a heavy weight in life afterwards.

881. Then if that is true do not you get at once a fruitful cause of inequality in regard to the effects of imprisonment as between the young prisoners and the older men?—Yes, there may be something in that.

882. The after effects of imprisonment stay with a lad for many years—possibly all his life. Do not you consider that possibly it may be a punishment out of all proportion to the crime which he originally committed?—Quite so.

883. Then if that is so the present system is not altogether satisfactory?—It is not satisfactory, and I am afraid the recent change in the law will not be quite satisfactory. In September of last year an Act was passed by which magistrates could send a lad to a reformatory school without sending him to prison. Up to that time he could not go to a reformatory school without going to prison first, but now it is optional. Some magistrates will act upon it, but my experience already is that some do not act upon it.

884. They will send them to prison?—Well, within the last couple of months I have had a couple of boys sent to prison, one from the police court and the other from the Central Criminal Court.

885. What age are those boys?—One is about 16; the other is about 13. I am not quite sure what the age of the younger one is.

886. What imprisonment are they sent for?—For 10 days, and then they will go to the reformatory, and of course they will make out amongst the other lads that they are heroes and have suffered more than the others have, which will have a bad effect, I think, in the reformatory school where some go to prison and some do not. There will be the leaven of the old school still attached to the reformatory lad.

887. Then do you think that the change is in the wrong direction?—No, it is in the right direction; but I think it ought to have been compulsory, and that they ought not to have been sent to the prison.

888. Does not that rather point to the setting up of a different class of reformatory?—It would make the reformatory like an industrial school.

889. To a large extent?—Yes, to a large extent, but I am afraid it will go back to the old groove. That is my fear. Now it is left optional with the magistrate whether he sends the boy to prison or not. Some clerks will say it is very much easier to send this lad to a reformatory school, and to let the prison authorities find out where he is to go. Then they merely commit to the prison for a certain number of days to go to a reformatory school. In the other case, if they do not send the boy to prison, they have to look out for a reformatory school themselves.

890. But of course it is rather too soon to judge of the effect of the Act?—Well, some magistrates are still sending them.

891. But it is possible that the practice may become general to take advantage of the Act, and not to send the boys to prison?—I should fear it would drift rather in the other way. There is such a tendency to put a responsibility somewhere else, and to leave it for somebody else to have the trouble instead of taking it yourself. I know that many old reformatory managers, and good managers, were strongly in favour of a boy going to prison first. They said, "Let him go to prison and be punished," and when we receive him we can say, "You have been punished for your "offence, and we are taking you in hand to reform "you, and try to make a good man of you." But I always thought they might with as great ease have said, "We are saving you from going to prison altogether; we are taking you in hand not to punish "you, but to make a man of you if you will make an "effort yourself."

892. It has been proposed by some that what is called a penal reformatory should be set up half way between the prison reformatory and the prison?—Where the boys would go before they went to the reformatory school?

893. Yes, possibly. I do not know that that has been fully thought out, but it is held that there is at present a gap between the reformatory schools and the prisons, and there are a certain class of young offenders too bad perhaps for reformatories, but who are too young and too unformed to send to prison and to receive the stigma of prison. Do you imagine that the difficulty might be met by the setting up of an institution something like that?—I am not certain that it is, because the time for which they go to prison is very short. It is little that can be done with a lad there; it is more with the idea to punish them that they are sent to prison. At Redhill, in Surrey, they will take the worst lads. In fact, the manager has said, "We would rather have lad a that is found hopeless, than a good lad who commits himself for the "first time."

894. I want to press you a little upon this question of juvenile prisoners?—Yes.

895. The juvenile offender according to the Act is 16 or under?—It is.

896. I think that Captain Stopford is of opinion that there was a certain discretionary power with Governors to give some latitude to prisoners of 17?—Yes, I have exercised some power. I do not know that I have any particular authority for it, except my desire to do the best I can for the prisoners.

897. Then would you limit that to prisoners up to 17?—Up to 20.

898. In what respect would you make a difference?—I do not employ them outside their cells. I do not allow them to go cleaning in the wards. And I think with good results.

899. You take special care that they shall not be contaminated by other prisoners?—Exactly.

900. But so far as visits from friends or relations, and communications with the outside are concerned you do not allow a difference?—No. They are entitled to a visit when they have done their three months. Then at every interval of three months afterwards they are entitled to a visit.

901. But what is true now of lads of 16 and 17 is also very often true to a considerable extent in the case of lads of 18 and 19?—Yes.

902. Or even higher?—Up to 20 or 21; but then I think I ought to add that amongst that number we get some very bad criminals; young fellows that have been in trouble over and over again, and who seem to glory in their degradation, and who seem to think it manly to do wrong and to give way to wrong inclinations.

903. Would you say that you had got habitual criminals in the person of prisoners under 21?—Certainly.

904. Have you a considerable number of prisoners under 21 whom you would call habitual prisoners?—Not a considerable number. I have never looked that out, but still there are a large number of men that are habitual criminals before they are 21 years of age.

905. What in your mind constitutes an habitual criminal?—A determination to live by crime, returning to their evil ways directly they are released from prison and back to their old associations.

906. You do not regard one as an habitual criminal according to the number of times he has been in prison?—No.

907. So that by your definition it is quite possible that a lad or a man may be an habitual criminal without ever having been in prison?—They may. A man may associate with criminals and live by crime, but he may not be detected, until he is 20 or 21 years of age. Therefore I think if you had any scheme for separating these lads their previous history ought to be carefully inquired into, not taking it as we do now on their mere statement. We have nothing now to go by as to the age but their own statement.

908. But that is never verified?—No.

909. They can say what they like?—Yes, and we put them down according to their statements unless we recognise them in the prison; but if you are going to make a separate class of them great care should be exercised, or great wrong will be done. There should be some mode. It ought not to be difficult to do it. There are the school board officers, for instance, that look after truant children and the like, or you might even put the responsibility of proving that they are first offenders, and that they have not been the associates of criminals upon the prisoner and his relatives and let some one see that you are not mixing habitual criminals with lads that have not been leading a bad life.

910. Do you think that the majority of young prisoners who come to you, say of under 21, have been in reformatories and industrial schools?—No, the majority have not been in reformatories and industrial schools. I believe that great good has been done by reformatory schools. I have seen statements to the contrary, but years ago I interested myself a good deal in reformatory schools, and I found a very large per-centage did well afterwards, and that only about 5 per cent. came back to prison, but those who do come back to prison after having been through a reformatory, and have been been found hopeless there, are the very worst of criminals. That sometimes I think casts an odium on reformatory managers that when a lad has once been there before and all the influences of the reformatory are thrown away upon him a young convict as soon as he is at liberty returns to his old ways, and then as soon as he gets into prison again he is one of the most difficult we have to deal with.

911. In any change that is made that class of prisoners would constitute a very considerable difficulty?—They would.

912. You have given me your opinion that on the whole prison does not work quite equally as between young offenders and old offenders, and also that the after effect of imprisonment is much more serious in the case of the one class than of the other?—Yes.

913. Is not it also true that you have a better chance of reforming a young prisoner than an old one?—Well, I am not certain of that.

914. At any rate, if that is not clear it is in a sense more important?—It is far more important.

915. It is more important that the effort should be made?—With the young, yes; although I say we cannot do much. I do not think you can do much more in a prison with the young than you can with the old, but still I think outside the prison far more can be done with the young than with the old.

916. You say not so much can be done with the young in the prison under the existing arrangements?—Just so.

917. Do not you think it is possible by treating the young prisoners as a class apart to provide a system somewhat different to that which is necessary in the case of older or habitual offenders?—Quite so, with the safeguard I have mentioned, that the previous history should be carefully investigated of everyone.

918. And I suppose following that, you would require that greater latitude should be allowed to those immediately responsible for the keeping of these prisoners in order that they might adapt the treatment to the special requirement of each case as you might find desirable according to the inquiries you made?—Certainly. I suppose that is the reformatory practice.

919. Does not it rather come to this, that you require a different kind of prison or place of detention for the young prisoners?—Quite so.

920. Under the present system you have more or less a hard-and-fast line?—We have.

921. And sufficient latitude cannot be allowed for the differential treatment of the young?—No, we cannot vary it to any great extent.

922. Up to what age would you be disposed to carry this change?—Up to 20.

923. 20 or 21?—Yes, 20 or 21.

924. I suppose you would have to reserve power in in the event of the young prisoner, who is being kept under a more modified form of prison treatment, to transfer him if he showed himself incorrigible to the more penal class of prisons?—Yes, that would be desirable.

925. On the other hand, if you see a prisoner, say, of 19 or 20, and he showed himself desirous to improve and behave well, you would keep him under the modified form of treatment?—Certainly, you would not degrade him in any way. You would rather encourage him to go right.

926. Now, with regard to the possibility of contamination under the present system, do you think that sufficient safeguards exist to prevent contamination?—Well, I think they do. I do not see that we could carry it much further. I do not think the great amount of contamination that is often spoken about takes place in prison. The worst thing that takes place in prison is the power of recognition and of knowing the prisoners after they are released.

927. That might give a hold to the older men over the younger men?—Yes.

928. And they would pull them back into crime?—Yes.

929. Could that be held to be in any way an argument against putting local offenders into one prison?—Well, it is an argument against putting the confirmed offenders where they can communicate with or recognise those that are sent to prison for the first time. They ought not to see them if possible. They ought to be apart from them. Of course, it is easy to recognise any one. I am associated with criminals in a prison, but I never talk to any one to contaminate them and they recognise me in the street. I take no notice of it. I pass on. They are never rude to me; but if I had had the misfortune of being a prisoner they would at once hang upon me and say, "I re-"member you at Pentonville," and unless I squared it with them somehow or other, no doubt I should have trouble with them.

930. It is said sometimes that it is the police who drag the prisoners back?—I think that is an excuse that is only made by persons when they have fallen themselves. My own experience is that the police are very willing to help them, and if a man is willing to make an effort to do anything, I can always with confidence apply to the police for assistance, if I cannot give it.

931. You think the real danger is in being recognised?—Yes, the older man who has seen them before can bring pressure to bear upon them.

932. I suppose you take special precautions in the case of the younger prisoners, to keep them apart for that very reason of preventing recognition?—We do, and they are located in a separate part of the prison; they exercise in a yard where they are not seen by the older men, and at chapel they are the last to go in; they sit at the back, and they are the first to go out.

933. Do I understand they exercise in a separate yard?—Yes.

Mr. J. B. Manning.

12 July 1894.

934. That is not the practice at other prisons?—I am not aware of that. I do not visit many prisons now.

935. With regard to chapel you are satisfied that no communications take place?—I am satisfied of that. I have seen statements about it, and I had some talk with a gentleman who visited the prison, and he said that he had been on board ship in the stoke-hole and the forecastle, but he had heard more swearing in that chapel than he had heard in either of the other places. I ventured to say I thought that was an exaggeration, because there are officers stationed all over the chapel. I attend chapel myself whenever I possibly can, and it is very rare I have complaints about misconduct in chapel. Sometimes there are; but if a man used bad language, it can only be heard by the man on each side of him without instant detection. If one man speaks, another will turn his head directly. That is seen by the officer. I do get complaints of talking in chapel. I had two the other day when each man made the same excuse, and said that for the moment he forgot himself.

936. So that you think as between ordinary prisoners it is difficult, and that as between older and younger prisoners it is almost impossible?—Yes. I think the great fear is recognition, the getting acquainted with their faces, so as to know them outside.

937. With regard to this class that you keep apart, up to what age do you do it?—That is only up to 16.

938. Then would a lad of 17 be sitting with the ordinary prisoners?—Yes, he would be sitting with the ordinary prisoners.

939. And contamination would be possible in that case?—Well, words might be passed, but they would be very few.

940. Still the only way to make it absolutely secure would be by making the younger offenders a separate class?—Yes.

941. And, speaking generally, you would be in favour of making such a change in our present system?—Yes, with the safeguard I have mentioned, that it should not be on the prisoner's mere statement that he had not been in prison before.

942. I do not know if you have any view to express to the Committee on the question of untried prisoners?—No, I have none at present, but I have had considerable experience with trial prisoners.

943. Have you anything to say with regard to the present system?—No, only what I mentioned the other day; I think they might be more largely bailed. Instead of waiting in prison they might be allowed bail to earn money for their defence and the support of their families until the trial comes off. I mentioned where it was done, namely, at Sheffield, and during the eight years I had the control of the Sheffield prisoners I think it was done with good effect.

944. But with regard to their actual treatment in prison?—No, I have nothing to suggest.

945. Do you think it would be advisable to give governors greater latitude in regard to their treatment?—No, there is nothing that occurs to me which we are not authorised to do by the rules that it would be desirable to do.

946. Do you think that under the present Acts, and under the rules and regulations governing the system that sufficient discretionary power is lodged in the hands of the Governors?—I do.

947. Of course you have given your opinion in favour of a change with regard to young offenders?—Yes.

948. But, speaking generally, concerning the administration of the prisons, do you think that Governors have sufficient discretionary powers left to them?—I think so. Could you suggest to me in any way where you think there might be a doubt, sir?

949. Well, take for instance the question of visits to prisoners and letters?—I have no authority to allow a prisoner to write special letters, but there is an authority if a letter is received which concerns a prisoner in any way for me to communicate its contents to the prisoner. On the other hand, if a prisoner can show cause why some particular information should be communicated to his friends, I can do that, and, of course, I avail myself of both those privileges.

950. Supposing it came to your knowledge that there might be a very considerable moral advantage to a prisoner from being allowed to receive a letter, and to answer it, or vice versâ, have you discretionary power?—Not for him to receive a letter or answer it, but I can communicate the contents of any letter to him, and I can communicate to his friends the prisoner's wish on that subject; but if it came to my knowledge that it would be to his advantage, either that he should write or receive a special letter, I should represent it to the Commissioners; and leave has never been refused. I get the letter back by the next post to say "approved."

951. But is not it possible that the present system is rather too hard and fast with regard to this question of letters?—I do not know that it is. If I thought it desirable that a prisoner should write a letter, I have power to allow him, but I must report to the Commissioners that I have done so.

952. But does not that very fact deter Governors from writing, when, in fact, they would be inclined to give permission, because they may say, "I cannot "be always bothering the Commissioners to make "these special exceptions"?—No, I do not think so. Prisoners are placed at such disadvantage that I think there is no Governor but what would be willing to help the prisoners within the strict line of duty.

953. I have no doubt you yourself have written letters on behalf of prisoners before now?—Yes, frequently.

954. Then you would say that, as a general practice, it would be right to allow prisoners to write or receive letters which might have a beneficial effect upon them, and help to reform them. As a general principle, would not you agree with that?—Yes, as a general principle, I would. In fact, it is the general principle that is followed. The only thing is, that instead of having power to do that by itself, I refer it to the Commissioners and I get their authority.

955. But the rules provide that prisoners shall only write and receive so many letters?—Yes.

956. That is the ordinary rule?—Yes.

957. And whenever you write to the Prison Commissioners it means making an exception to that rule?—That is provided for either in our rules or standing orders.

958. But what I rather mean is that while that rule may be perfectly right with regard to a suitable number of prisoners such as a man who would only write and receive letters for the purpose of breaking the prison monotony without any idea of improvement; is not it possible there is a considerable number of men upon whom freer communication with people outside might produce very considerable effect?—There are cases where, as I suggested the other day, after the first three months I thought there might be some relaxation of that rule, and that they might communicate more frequently with their friends.

959. But then in that case would not a larger discretionary power have to be given to the Governor?—Not if the rule was altered that it might be done in a month. I like to have a firm rule in dealing with a prisoner, and be able to say to him "This is the "rule, and this is the law," because if you have a wide discretion, it may lead to favouritism, and you may favour some prisoners unduly.

960. You were in the prison service before the Act of 1877?—I was.

961. Could you give the Committee generally your view of the effect of that change upon prison discipline having regard to the effect of imprisonment on the prisoners?—Well, it has rendered prison treatment far more uniform than it was before.

962. Is that altogether to the good?—That is altogether to the good I think. In fairness to the prisoners, they are treated and dieted the same now in every prison, and there were many anomalies before.

963. Do you think more is now done for a prisoner since the transference than before?—Certainly, because they can earn gratuities now, and it was only in a very few prisons they could earn gratuities before. That was one of our difficulties. A man's time expired, and he had not got a shilling, and no friends either to go to, and he would say "I must either beg or steal as "soon as I get outside."

964. You think the prisoners altogether are better looked after in the prison?—Yes.

965. And the treatment is more adapted for beneficial effects after release?—I think so.

966. And in fact you think that the Act of 1877 produced a very distinct change for the good?—I think so. That is my impression. I served for about 18 years under the magistrates, and experienced great kindness at their hands, but I must say that the Prison Commissioners know far more of prisons and prison rules and everything of that kind than the magistrates could do.

967. The magistrates in different localites would interpret rules differently?—They would and they would not agree to the same thing. In the county I was serving there were two prisons: in one there was a progressive dietary and in the other there was not. Well, two men might commit an offence and one of them be apprehended just before the quarter sessions. He might be tried at Chester, and get, say, 12 months' imprisonment with hard labour. He would begin with a progressive dietary, and he would not get the largest dietary in the prison until he had done six months of his sentence. The other man by evading arrest for a few days might be apprehended by the same police officer, taken before the same magistrate, and committed to sessions. He would have gone to the adjourned sessions at Knutsford, in the same county, to be tried before the same chairman at the quarter sessions, and might get exactly the same sentence of 12 months' hard labour, and he would get the largest diet in the prison the day after his conviction.

968. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Did not quarter sessions establish the dietary for the prisoners?—No, the visiting justices of each prison.

969. And they were not directed by quarter sessions at all?—They had to get the approval of quarter sessions before they sent it up to the Secretary of State.

970. And the quarter sessions approved two different dietaries?—And the Secretary of State did. The visiting committee of both prisons met and had a large conference, and the magistrates at Knutsford said, "Well, the progressive dietary might do, but can- "not you take our dietary as the progressive one?" I ventured to say that probably it had not been framed with the progressive dietary being in view, and the dietary that was suggested was one that had been in use for some time at a large prison in an adjoining county. One magistrate said, "Well, is "this another suggestion from Chester?" "Yes." "Oh, well, we cannot give way to Chester in every- "thing"; and the Committee broke up without coming to any decision.

971. (Chairman.) Well, you see various advantages which have arisen under the Act of 1877. On the other hand do you see any disadvantages?—I do not.

972. You think that the change was beneficial all round?—I do, and a great saving undoubtedly to the country

973. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You said something with regard to imprisonment previously to reformatory treatment. I suppose you think the only boys that ought to go to reformatories are criminal boys?—Certainly, because there are industrial schools for the non-criminal.

974. And that they ought to be rather specially criminal boys and not slightly criminal?—No, I do not say that, but I mentioned the Redhill School where they prefer the special criminal boys.

975. At Redhill they think the business of a reformatory is to deal with the special criminal class?—And the managers have said that some of these special criminal boys have more grit in them than some of the quieter boys.

976. Supposing a boy, being a criminal, has been in prison before, can there be any objection to his being imprisoned again when his case is considered to be sufficiently serious for him to be sent to a reformatory?—Not if he has been in prison before.

977. Is not that rather the class that ought to go to reformatories?—I think they ought to go to reformatories instead of going to prison in the first instance.

978. Is not that rather a case for an industrial school?—They cannot send them to the industrial schools if they have been once to prison, and I have seen unfortunately lads of from 10 to 12 years sent to prison for a few days, which, of course, at once blocked the industrial school for them.

979. And that is a sufficient reason in your opinion to do away with imprisonment?—I think the chief reason is to avoid the stigma of a prison being attached to a lad's name.

980. If the boy has been sent to prison first of all, and not to the reformatory?—Yes.

981. Then the stigma question does not come up, does it?—If they are sent to prison, yes.

982. But they are sent to prison first of all, and not to a reformatory; then if there is a subsequent conviction and the case is considered grave enough to send him to a reformatory, is there any objection to sending him to prison then?—No, because he has been in prison before.

983. Is not that exactly the case of a boy that ought to be sent to a reformatory?—That is the class of boy.

984. And not the class of boy that has never been to prison before?—I do not quite follow you.

985. Is not it the case that industrial and reformatory schools are established for the purpose of the classification of schools for children?—Yes.

986. So that in industrial schools you may see young children who are tending towards crime, but who are not criminals?—Yes.

987. And to reformatory schools you are to send those who are criminals or who have been in prison before?—I think you may send to the industrial schools a boy who has actually committed crime if he is young enough.

988. Is not that exactly the case where you want to dispense with prison? You send them to an industrial school when you want to dispense with prison, but to a reformatory school, where they are distinctly cases for a reformatory?—Some magistrates will exercise their discretion differently from others. Some magistrates will send to reformatories first, if I am to believe the statement of the lads.

989. You think that would be an error?—I think if it were his first offence there is power to deal with it at the police station. If a lad had been birched and talked to, and sent home, he might not have got into trouble again.

990. But you would not send such a class as that to a reformatory school at all?—Not for the first time.

991. But if he had once been dealt with, is there any objection to his being sent to prison as a place of punishment before sending him to a reformatory?—I think it is as well to avoid the stigma of the prison if you can, and I think it might be avoided. I think the Act of last year was passed with that object in view.

992. You are aware that very nearly all the reformatory managers in England strongly oppose it?—I am. I know they would rather have the boy punished before he came to them, and I mentioned that just now; but instead of saying to the lad, "Now "you have been punished for what you did, and we

Mr. J. B. Manning.

12 July 1894.

"will try to do you good," I think they might say, "We are saving you from punishment for what you "have done, and we are going to try and make a "man of you."

993. Take the case of a boy who has been imprisoned for some crime, and who is again taken up and convicted, and instead of being sent to prison again is treated with much greater leniency, and sent to a place where he is comfortably taken care of, and made as jolly as possible with a lot of other boys: is that a proper treatment?—I do not see there is any harm in sending him when once he has been to prison. You are talking of cases where the lad has been in prison before, but once he has been in prison before you may send him there half-a-dozen times if you like.

994. Are not the reformatory schools specially intended for boys who have been previously convicted?—No.

995. And who are bad boys?—They are eligible for the reformatory schools, but you find many in the reformatory schools that have never been in prison except for the ten days or a month before they went to the reformatory.

996. But is not it the case that reformatory managers do try to refuse boys that have not got a serious history about them?—They do.

997. If they are sent on a first conviction?—Yes, they do not like receiving them on a first conviction; some reformatory managers do not, unless there is a bad history to the boy, or his surroundings are of a certain order.

998. If there is a bad history, should not the boy be distinctly punished?—No, that might have been the boy's misfortune, or that of his surroundings.

999. I am not speaking of that; I am speaking of the bad history of a boy, that is to say, he has committed crime and has not been dealt with?—That is a matter to punish for the crime I think, and to take each one on its individual merits.

1000. But should a boy be sent to a reformatory unless he has committed crime previously, and are boys commonly taken in who have not committed crime previously?—Yes, boys are frequently sent who have never been in trouble before.

1001. You said you would go up to 20 years of age in making a difference in prison treatment. Would you be inclined to allow the age of 16 for reformatories to be extended to a higher age?—That is a matter I have not thought about, but I do not see any reason for doing it. The general opinion seems to be that lads should not be kept too long in these reformatories. In fact, that Act that has been recently passed provides that the sentence passed should be such that it should expire by the time the boy reaches the end of 19 years.

1002. Of course, that would be a bar to extending the age at which boys might be sent to reformatories?—It would, unless you extended the age to which they might be kept, and I suppose there must be good reasons for not doing so.

1003. The establishment of the age of 19 would be a barrier to extending the age at which persons might be sent to reformatories?—Yes.

1004. You have rather indicated that you would ike almost a special prison for persons between 16 and 20?—For first offenders. For lads who have not led a criminal life.

1005. That would be a class of reformatory?—Yes.

1006. In that way you would not object to it?—No.

1007. Do you think any good could be done by a reformatory treatment of that class unless there was a longer period of imprisonment or detention than that which is commonly pronounced when a sentence of imprisonment is passed in that class?—No, I think the Act provides that it shall not be less than three years in a reformatory.

1008. I am supposing that you must not detain beyond 19?—Yes.

1009. But that you have a provision that boys may be sent to a separate prison or reformatory being over the age of 16?—Well, they ought to have a couple of years at least, I think, to deal with them.

1010. But unless with a two years' sentence such a treatment would be useless?—I think so.

1011. You would not be prepared to recommend a separate prison or reformatory unless a longer period was allowed for detention in such a place than the ordinary periods of sentences of imprisonment?—Certainly not.

1012. You have said that the small per-centage who come back from the reformatories to prison are very bad?—They are.

1013. Will not that naturally be the case? The residuum of criminal population to which treatment has been ineffectually applied is likely to be rather bad?—Yes.

1014. That is no slur on the reformatory treatment?—Not the slightest.

1015. You said you would like to separate the habituals in prison from the others?—Yes.

1016. You have in your prison a record of all those who have been convicted more than once?—As far as we know.

1017. Do you think that is at all reliable?—No, it is not.

1018. But to the extent to which you have it you may already separate them, may you not?—We could to that extent but there would be the danger in trying to keep one class separately, of putting with them a very old offender who denies it when he comes there, and of whom there is no record, so that I think that there should be some careful mode adopted.

1019. With the means of information you have now you think the separation would be ineffectual?—Yes, we should have some of the bad ones amongst them who would do a lot of injury, I am afraid.

1020. Are you prepared to adopt the Bertillon system?—I have not had any instructions.

1021. With regard to prisoners having greater latitude than at present in writing letters in prison it is plain, I suppose, that you look upon the writing of a letter as a privilege, which is rather a useful element of discipline?—Yes.

1022. And, therefore, you would not like to allow prisoners to write as freely as they pleased?—No, certainly not.

1023. And you think the present rule is adequate with the amount of discretion that is permitted to Governors?—I think so.

1024. I suppose you do not know what counties were in the same unfortunate position as yours of having two dietaries?—Well, there were not many counties in that district that had two prisons, but we differed from the adjoining counties.

1025. Did you differ from Liverpool?—I believe we did.

1026. Do you think prisoners had any preference to go into one rather than into another?—Certainly, the old prisoners used to talk about where the better dietaries were, but I do not think it had much effect upon them.

1027. As regards discipline, I suppose Chester was not altered by the change of management. Your rules wedt on much the same?—Yes.

1028. Chester was a very good prison?—I thought so.

1029. And Knutsford was a good prison too?—Yes; but they had a bigger diet there, and I think it was an injustice where two persons would be treated and dieted in a different way.

1030. The Home Office had laid down a scale of dietary?—They had recommended a scale of dietary, but I think very few adopted it. They only recommended them.

1031. (Dr. Bridges.) Have you among your prisons at Pentonville a certain number of prisoners whom you would call weak minded?—Yes.

1032. You have none, of course, who would be insane?—If a medical man certifies a prisoner to be insane, I call on the Chairman of the Visiting Committee to attend with another magistrate, and if they are satisfied they certify, and I then report it to the Secretary of State and get an order, for removal.

1033. Supposing they belong to the weak-minded class and cannot be certified as insane they are necessarily kept in the prison?—Yes.

1034. Do you make any differential treatment of that class?—The doctor's attention is called to them, and he directs them to be kept in the observation cells where they are closely watched, and they are not tasked the same as the other prisoners.

1035. Is any difference made with this class as regards their association or as to their being kept in observation?—They are kept as a class by themselves and exercised by themselves. We have not a large number of them, and they generally include a few epileptics, say from 16 to 20, perhaps a few more than that at times. We have those half-witted creatures coming again and again to prison.

1036. Are they kept well under observation in a solitary cell?—Yes; in an ordinary cell, except that there is always a light both day and night.

1037. Have you formed any opinion as to whether isolation is calculated to promote their health?—No; I have not noticed anything. They are carefully watched, and if they seem to the doctor to get worse, he will, if necessary, order them to the hospital and association room. But there are some that are not. They seem weak and half-witted; they do not seem to get worse except gradually in the course of years, and probably they land in the asylum at last, but they are men, who, if they were tried to-morrow for any serious offence, would be acquitted on the ground of insanity.

1038. With regard to first offenders, you have given the Committee your view with regard to juvenile first offenders, but I suppose you have a certain number of first offenders who are between 20 and 30?—Certainly.

1039. Would you think it desirable, supposing you had the power of doing so, to keep those adult first offenders away from the others?—No. I think their minds are strong and settled at that period. I do not think the surroundings have much to do with it afterwards; there are so few opportunities in a local prison for association, conversation, or contamination.

1040. With regard to the women, the women who work in the kitchen and in the laundry are more or less in association, are they not?—We have no women at Pentonville. At Wakefield the cooking was all done in the men's prison and the food carried down, so that we had no cookhouse amongst the women, and in regard to the washing the women washed in boxes; that is all the first stage prisoners did. If they were in the second stage and eligible for employment out of their cells they would be all employed at machines or mangling and so on, but always under the inspection of officers.

1041. I think you have told us that at Pentonville there is no associated labour among the men except the treadwheel association?—We have plumbers and joiners.

1042. Might not an adult offender for the first time come into contact with them?—He would; he would be seen by the others, and there is the danger of his being recognised afterwards.

1043. Coming to what has been said about reformatories, how would you propose to deal with that 5 per cent. residuum of bad cases?—They become habitual criminals; you cannot do anything with them I am afraid.

1044. You do not think any step can be taken at present?—No.

1045. As to outdoor labour, have you formed any opinion as to whether, especially for juvenile offenders and for these weak-minded criminals, outdoor labour like digging and other agricultural work would be an advantage?—It would undoubtedly both mentally and physically, I think.

1046. With regard to visitors of prisoners. It is maintained by some people that great advantage would accrue from allowing prisoners to be visited by philanthropic persons; of course, due provision being made as to who they were, and that they were persons of character and sense. Have you thought about that question?—I have never seen that much advantage would arise from it. In the first place, there would be the difficulty of getting these persons. Then they would not know much about the regulations, and they could not help interfering with the discipline and with the work of the chaplain, and I think the prisoners are very artful. They have always a ready tale to tell, and the majority of them would try to excite the sympathies of strangers. They will try it on with a new Governor or a new officer, and I think they would try it with these special visitors if they came.

1047. (Mr. de Rutzen.) You were talking just now about young juvenile offenders, who are sentenced under the old Act to 10 days' imprisonment and a number of years in the reformatory?—Yes.

1048. Do you know, as a matter of fact, that it sometimes took time to find a reformatory?—It did.

1049. Have you ever known an instance where the difficulty has been such that the term of imprisonment has expired?—I have.

1050. And the whole thing has become nugatory?—Yes, the boy was turned adrift at the expiration of his 10 days.

1051. And never got into a reformatory at all?—No.

1052. Now, I gather from your answers that you would not have a boy, a juvenile, imprisoned at all?—I would not.

1053. On remand or on sentence?—I would not send them to prison under 16 if I could help it.

1054. You know the difficulties about getting a reformatory?—Yes.

1056. During that time, what else is to be done with the criminal excepting to remand him in many instances?—In some instances they might be kept in police stations, and in other instances they might be sent to the workhouse.

1057. Under the present rule, supposing a boy is of reformatory age, he could not be sent to the workhouse?—I do not know if there is authority now to do it, but I think provision might be made for it. I think provision is made in that Act of 1893.

1058. Children might be sent to the workhouse up to a certain age?—I think the Reformatory Act of 1893 gives power to send to other places, and if a boy is there he can be followed and re-arrested, no matter where he has been ordered to be detained.

1059. But if he is apprehended, and there is no person who will be bail for him, and he is of just such an age at which he can be sent to a reformatory; perhaps he is a boy, for instance, who had been living in a lodging-house, and no one will be bail for him; then there is no other place to send him to at present but to prison on remand. Would that be another reason why you think a change should be made in making another place of detention for juvenile offenders?—Yes, that would be an advantage, undoubtedly it would meet that difficulty.

1060. And do you know that that is a very great difficulty at the present time?—I have no doubt it is, but at present it is not as great as it has been in years past. Some years ago the reformatory schools were filled, and we had great difficulties, so that when I received a boy I used to send two or three applications on the chance of one being successful, but at the present time the numbers are low, and if a lad is eligible I seldom have them refused.

1061. (Dr. Bridges.) Are you aware that very great difficulty has occurred in those instances where a magistrate has ordered the boy to be kept in a workhouse pending the provision of a suitable industrial school?—No. That the police would know.

1062. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Then I take it that in cases such as I have mentioned, and among others where it is necessary to detain a boy, that you think there should be some place of detention other than the prison?—I do.

1063. As to what you have said with reference to boys being in prison and getting sentenced, exactly the same thing applies, it makes him careless about it?—Yes.

1064. And whether on remand or under sentence, the stain still remains?—Yes, and when he gets with the other boys at the reformatory he will describe what prison was like; he will say, "There is no cane and no rod, or anything there."

1065. Just one word about the possibility of contamination. I notice that you said just now that the worst form by way of contamination was probably represented by the power of recognition?—That is my impression.

1066. Now in the exercise ground how many do you exercise together?—Sometimes 80 in one large yard.

1067. And the same 80 are exercised every day?—Yes.

1068. The same people?—Yes.

1069. And so of course, if they are there for the week they become fairly familiar?—Yes, with each other's faces.

1070. And cannot fail to recognise each other in after life?—No, that is why masks were adopted at one time; but of course they were a failure.

1071. They could see through them?—They used to turn them up and they were suffocated with them. I have never had them in prisons, but I have seen them years ago.

1072. Just one question about weak-minded people, you of course are aware of immense numbers of letters perhaps marked upon a committal sheet so as to draw attention to the state of mind of the criminal on remand?—Yes.

1073. Those are very common, are they not?—Very common, but as a rule there is not very much in them, they are often done to excite sympathy or with the idea of getting the prisoner better treatment.

1074. I mean when they come to you; when they come to the prison there is just a note on the commitment, drawing attention to the state of mind, and asking for some inquiries into the state of mind?—Certainly, they are always attended to.

1075. Do you see the letters which are sent in answer to that by the doctor or the prison chaplain?—Yes, I do; but we have not so many as they have at Holloway or in the remand prisons.

1076. No; but I am now speaking of this because you have had them before you?—Yes.

1077. And you know the sort of answer which from time to time comes?—Yes.

1078. It is generally in a sort of stereotyped form, "We find that So-and-So is of weak intellect; but "we have seen no absolute sign of insanity." That is very often the case?—Yes, in the majority of cases.

1079. I ask that question for the purpose of ascertaining the state in which a great many go into the gaols?—Yes.

1080. (Miss Orme.) How many seats have you in your chapel at Pentonville? How many can you seat there, do you think?—I can tell you exactly by referring to a little book in my pocket. It is 753 in the Protestant chapel.

1081. And what is the average attendance?—We have about 880 prisoners; that is about our average of Protestants, so that the whole of our prisoners do not attend chapel every day: that is if we are full.

1082. But on Sunday?—Some would only go to one service.

1083. And you have two services in the chapel?—Yes.

1084. About how close do the prisoners sit?—They sit side by side on the seats.

1085. Without a space between them?—Yes.

1086. And you say you very often attend yourself?—I do.

1087. Do they join in the responses much?—Very freely.

1088. So that you get a general murmur of sound?—Yes.

1089. Do not you think a good deal of conversation goes on during those responses?—I do not think so, because they would have to watch all the stops and everything if they were to attempt to carry on a continuous conversation. The prisoners are, say, sitting here, and the officers are seated above them and can readily see if they are putting their heads together for the purpose of talking.

1090. If they are sitting together without any space at all between them, then if they said a short sentence, about the length of a response in the Litany, for instance, they could communicate with each other, and the warder would not hear them?—Yes, but it could not go on to any great extent, not to the extent I have seen it represented in some of the papers.

1091. With regard to untried prisoners you said you had no suggestion to make?—I have not.

1092. How are they occupied during the day?—They generally read or write; they can write to their friends, and some prisoners will ask for work; some will pick oakum rather than sit in their cells doing nothing.

1093. And you would always give them oakum to pick?—Yes.

1094. But there would not be a variety of employment for them?—No.

1095. Do you think it would be an improvement to vary it?—It would not be desirable to introduce tools into the cells, I think.

1096. And you have no suggestion to make as to their employment?—No.

1097. (Sir Algernon West.) So much of your evidence turns on the question of age as to juvenile offenders?—Yes.

1098. I want to know if your experience shows that boys are very apt to exaggerate their age so as to get among the men?—There is no doubt that lots of boys under 16 have stated that they were over 16. In the first place they escape being sent to a reformatory, and in the second place, being over 16, they get men's diet, and from their physique and build they cannot do first class hard labour. The doctor would not pass them for it.

1099. There is every temptation for a boy to say he is over 16?—Yes, and some come there and say they are over 16, but to look at them you would not think they were more than 13 or 14.

1100. That makes a difficulty of demarcation?—Yes, I think if they are to be separated according to age that ought to be verified.

1101. Do you believe that the Acts of Parliament at present in force and the regulations of the Home Office are thoroughly well carried out throughout the country?—I think they are.

1102. You have given us your opinion about juvenile offenders generally speaking. Have you any other suggestions to make as to improvement in the law or in the regulations?—No.

1103. (Chairman.) I just want to pursue one matter a little further, I think you said in reply to Sir John Dorington that supposing a change were made with regard to young offenders there are some of those whom a short time of imprisonment could not improve, and you would require something like two years in reforming them?—Yes.

1104. But then, do I understand, you are in favour of making this change in the direction of the present reformatory system?—In the present reformatory system; not in prisons.

1105. My point has rather been that there is a class of young offenders whom it is necessary to send to prison, but for whom the present prison treatment is not adequate or altogether right in its nature. Would you propose practically to abolish imprisonment for this class of offenders?—For boys under 16.

1106. But I am rather speaking now of the young offenders under 21?—No.

1107. Then does not it rather point to having a reformatory in two directions; first of all to set apart a prison or part of a prison for young offenders who would be treated as a class apart?—For first offenders, sir?

1108. Well, I am now speaking of young offenders and not necessarily of first offenders, and who would be subjected to treatment differing from the present prison treatment, and calculated more for the special cases of young offenders?—I think it would be desirable to separate them and treat them in the way you suggest as first offenders, but if they come afterwards two or three times, they are like the residuum of the reformatory class, and there is little hope, I am afraid, of any treatment ever doing them much good.

1109. To take the case which you have suggested arises pretty often. We will take the case of a young fellow who leaves prison, and whose good intentions have been acted upon by the advice and help he got in prison. He comes out and meets an old offender, and being rather weak, he is dragged back into crime, and re-appears in prison?—Yes, there are hundreds of such cases.

1110. But surely a case of that sort you would not like to relegate to prison among old offenders; you would think there was a chance for him?—If he comes in, in that way and yields to temptation of that sort, I think there is little hope for him.

1111. But do not you think it is worth trying?—Yes, that is where the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society and the St. Giles' Christian Mission come in. If any young person says, "Will you write to my "employers or my parents"? they are always ready to do that for him and to take him in hand, and they will find him shelter and food until they can provide something for him.

1112. I was rather thinking of the period of imprisonment in which it was necessary to prepare the young offender for his release. After his release the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society no doubt will do a great deal for him; but it is important to give him such treatment in prison as will prepare him for living a more honest and better life when he leaves?—That is our chaplains' work, and that is what the chaplains are there for.

1113. But I think you have said that the prison system does not altogether meet the cases of these young offenders. You have not sufficient discretionary power to give such treatment to these young offenders as you may think their particular cases may deserve?—I confine it to first offenders, I cannot go beyond that. When they come again I am afraid there is not much to be done for them.

1114. Then I rather understood you, in reply to Sir John Dorington, quite apart from this question of treating the young offenders as a different class in prison, and giving them a different treatment, to be in favour of some extension of the reformatory system; so that in the case of young offenders, who, under the present law and present regulations, could not go to a reformatory school, power should be given to the authorities for sending, say a lad of 18 or 19, to a reformatory school for say two years?—Yes, but only for first offenders.

1115. You would limit that to first offenders?—Yes.

1116. You are not prepared to advise any change practically with regard to the prisoners who came in for the second time?—No, except that I would separate them in the way I have stated. I would not allow them to go working amongst the other prisoners. They might be separated in chapel too.

1117. Would you carry that out up to the age of 21?—Yes.

1118. But you would have to exercise your discretion as to whether the particular prisoner was incorrigible?—I would separate him from the other no matter what his age might be when he is in prison; but I would not mix him with the first offenders. I think that is the ground where good may be done.

1119. Then I think you expressed the opinion that it was not desirable to send prisoners on remand to prisons?—The young prisoners?

1120. Yes?—Yes, I would not send them under 16 to prison. That is an idea of mine.

1121. Where would you send them?—There is the difficulty, unless you had such a school as one of the gentlemen of the Committee mentioned, namely, a school where you could send them while you are making inquiries.

1122. But it might not be difficult to provide such a place in London or in populous centres?—No.

1123. The difficulty would arise in the provinces?—No. There you would get the assistance of the police, and there for days and days the police stations are unoccupied.

1124. But is a police station a desirable place for a lad of 16?—Well, it has not the stigma that the gaol has. If he is locked up and kept there, he is taken for examination before the magistrates, and they could keep him in the police station very well.

1125. He would be there under the charge of a sergeant of police?—He would.

1126. And for many days?—No, I do not think for many days.

1127. But still for some days?—For three or four days he might be.

1128. You do not think there would be any great danger in that?—I do not think there would. I do not think there would be danger, and I do not think there would be difficulty.

1129. I think there are some points on which you wish to make remarks on the evidence you gave last time?—Well, I was asked the other day about the appointment, as warders, of soldiers and others, and I professed a preference for military men; but I ought to have added that if a person applies for prison employment and brings satisfactory testimonials, comes up to the required standard of height, and passes his medical examination, there is no distinction made. The cases are sent forward whether they are soldiers or civilians.

1130. Is the process of that application that a man comes to the Governor?—He applies to the nearest prison.

1131. He applies to the Governor?—Yes.

1132. And then the Governor makes the necessary inquiries?—He is measured to see that he has the standard height. If he has not, it is no use going any further. Then the question arises, has he good testimonials, because he is asked to bring testimonials of a recent date. I look through them to see if they are satisfactory. I cannot go further than that. Then inquiries are made afterwards. Then he goes to the medical man, and, if physically fit, he fills up his form of application, and I forward it to headquarters without prejudice. If he is a smart or intelligent looking man, I generally add a note to that effect. Sometimes I am obliged to say his education is defective; for instance, if he cannot spell the simplest word.

1133. Then the appointment is made by the Prison Directors?—Then inquiries are made, and he is directed to attend before the Civil Service Commissioners to pass an examination, but it is a very simple one; and if he passes that, then his name is put on the list of approved candidates, and when it comes to his turn he is offered an appointment wherever the vacancy may be.

1134. Then I think you wish to say something about flogging?—When I was asked whether I approved of it I said no, without any reservation, but I should be sorry to see the power to flog abolished. I think it desirable in some cases. I have known some cases where we could not influence the man by any other means, and there are some that, without the fear of the lash, I am afraid would not keep their hands off the officers; but I only like to see it applied in extreme cases. I am always sorry to see it applied for a first offence unless it is for a violent assault upon an officer.

Mr. J. B. Manning.

12 July 1894.

1135. Then about Deputy Governors you wish to say something?—I spoke of 600 before, and I expressed my preference for a Deputy for that number. My opinion is that it is a great strain with 600 when you feel the responsibility is your own, and that you can never leave the prison for a few hours or half a day without feeling some difficulty may occur, and I am to be blamed for not being present, or someone being there to decide what is to be done.

1136. Who takes charge when there is no Deputy Governor?—It is left to the Chief Warder.

1137. And he would have charge of the 600 prisoners during the Governor's absence?—Yes, and if any difficulty arose he would have to decide upon it, and exercise his discretion.

1138. (Sir Algernon West.) In the case of annual leave would they send another Governor to a prison with 600 prisoners to relieve, or would it be left in the hands of the Chief Warder?—It has been left in the hands of the Chief Warder. At Wakefield the Chief Warder took charge in my absence.

1139. (Chairman.) For six weeks?—We are entitled to six weeks in the year, but under these circumstances I never take more than a week at a time, and so keep constantly in communication with the prison; but with a Deputy Governor I feel I can take a month at a time, and go away and leave everything in his hands.

1140. In your experience did any serious difficulty arise?—No.

1141. But you took such precautions by shortening your own leave of absence?—Yes, and of being in constant communication with the prison.

1142. Is there any other point you wish to clear up?—No.

1143. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Prisoners who are sentenced to penal servitude, say for three years, are entitled to a remission if they have behaved properly and well?—Yes, they can earn a remission of nine months, so that it comes to two years and three months.

1444. Now assuming a prisoner sentenced to two years or 18 months hard labour, or any lesser term, he has to suffer to the very day for which he is sentenced?—Yes.

1145. With no power of remission?—With no power of remission.

1146. Now considering that the penal servitude man for three years can expiate his offence with two years and three months penal servitude, do you consider it hard that the man who is sentenced to two years should have to serve until the last hour of his sentence?—Well, I consider that the two years' hard labour is a more severe sentence than the three years penal servitude, because the convict only does nine months in separate cells.

1147. And it is the hardest punishment which a prisoner can undergo?—Yes.

1148. A very hard punishment?—Yes, a very hard punishment.

1149. Now, assuming that the two years' man has behaved as well in prison as the penal servitude man, do you think it would be to the advantage of the prisoners that there should be some power given of some remission of the sentence?—There might be advantages and there might be disadvantages with it, because there would be a difficulty in drawing the line where remissions should begin.

1150. That is the difficulty?—Yes; and then in the discipline. I find convicts are a contentious lot, and if a man comes and he is not getting the whole remission possible it is never his fault. It is always some officer that has done it out of spite.

1151. But it is an extra hardship upon a man, who, we will assume, has been thought worthy of being dealt with by imprisonment and with a sentence short of the penal servitude sentence?—Yes, there are other disadvantages in addition to that. For instance, the man with two years has the clothing he brings in with him fumigated and put aside, and he puts it on when he goes out of prison. The gratuity he earns in the prison can be only 10*s.*, but the convict gets a new suit of clothes when he is released, and he gets a larger gratuity; he gets a better diet, and he is employed during the latter part of his sentence in outdoor work.

1152. And in that sense what I call the two years' man is in a great deal worse position than the man who has been convicted and sentenced to penal servitude?—He is in a worse position. I receive the convict lodgers weekly from the different convict prisons that are to be discharged in this district, and they come in brown, sunburnt, healthy-looking fellows, making quite a contrast to our prisoners.

1153. One other question upon that is this. A man who gets his one hour's exercise a day (and taking the mass of me nwho are sent to goal for long or short periods, they get one hour's exercise a day), do you consider that physically he is fit to take up that employment which is likely to fall to his lot when he goes out?—That would depend upon circumstances. In some instances he would and in some he would not.

1154. And I suppose it would be the case in a great many instances that he would not be physically in such a state as to be able to take up hard manual labour?—The hands would suffer undoubtedly by going to manual labour.

1155. Yes; and there would be want of muscle too?—Yes, and want of muscle.

1156. With reference to the visits to prisoners what is your mode. Is there a long sort of corridor?—Yes, with boxes on each side.

1157. And those visits are paid within a certain time of the day?—Yes, between 10 and 12 and 2 and 4.

1158. Do you find that the noise is such when they are paying their visits as to make it impossible for them to be heard?—Yes, unless they are carefully looked to.

1159. And that will not make it much better, will it?—If any party begins to shout their visit is stopped for the time, and the prisoner is turned the other way, and they are told if they can speak in a loud whisper they can be heard and not disturb their neighbours. When I came to Pentonville it was usual to hear them scream out at the top of their voices, and it was only a loud-voiced man that was good for anything.

1560. The visit was not worth having?—No. I told them they could whisper across, and the prisoner stands so that he cannot be seen to the right or to the left, and cannot be seen by any other person.

1161. (Mr. O'Connor.) Do you know the visiting system at Holloway?—I heard of it once.

1162. Were they visiting at the time you were there?—There were some in.

1163. Was there more noise than in your prison?—There was not. At that time everything was quiet and orderly there. I only went there once, and that was just after the time when some complaint was made of the noise that was made at visits. I went to see the alterations there. They put the officer on a raised platform, but I did not think there was any improvement in that.

1164. (Dr. Bridges.) With regard to the appointment of the prison warders. Where a warder is appointed to supervise a workshop I suppose it would be an advantage that he should know something about that trade?—It would.

1165. So that in that case a civilian perhaps would be a better person for the post than a military man?—He would be useful for repairs about the prison. I am not sure about a workshop. We have an artisan warder attached to all prisons now. The officer who is there would have to enforce discipline and see that the prisoners did not communicate with each other. For him to direct a prisoner, or begin to look closely into the work of one prisoner would throw all the rest out of gear.

1166. With regard to a joiner's shop an engineer would be hardly capable to direct that part of the work?—Yes.

1167. With regard to making hammocks it would not require much skill?—No. We have a sealed pattern to go by, and an intelligent officer can see whether it is made by the pattern.

1168. You do not see the advantage of appointing as warders men who belong to trades?—We are very glad to get them, because as a rule they are more intelligent than any other class; and, if we have any breakdown we can send that officer with one or two prisoners perhaps to look to the repair or whatever it may be.

1169. (Mr. O'Connor.) It has been stated to us that the deterrent effect of the prospect of imprisonment is greater in the case of adults or persons over 21?—Yes.

1170. (Chairman.) Do you use some of your cells for storage purposes?—No.

1171. They are all available?—Yes, they are all available for receiving prisoners.

The witness withdrew.

Dr. GOVER called and examined.

Dr. Gover.

1172. (Dr. Bridges.) I think you hold the office of Medical Inspector to Prisons?—I do of local prisons, and I am Superintending Medical Officer of Convict Prisons.

1173. You have presented in your annual reports statistical reports of the mortality in prisons?—Yes, I have.

1174. In the report for 1893 I think you gave the death-rate for many years?—Yes, I think I have done so. I have prepared a table showing the return. That table, I think, shows it for the last 20 years.

1175. Will you give me the page that we may have a reference to it on the notes?—It is on page 60 of the Appendix to the 16th Report of the Commissioners.

1176. From this report it appears that in 1893 the death-rate was 7·1?—Yes.

1177. The death-rate has diminished, has it not, of late years?—It has on the whole; most decidedly.

1178. Do you consider that it has diminished since the prisons have been under one control?—Yes, there has been that tendency, I think, distinctly marked.

1179. It appears from the return you have been so good as to refer us to?—Yes. If you take the 10 years following the year 1877 and the 10 years previously you will see at a glance, I think, that the mortality is much less during the latter period.

1180. Is that death-rate that you give for the prisons in your opinion to be in some respects qualified by the discharge, prior to the expiration of their sentences, of prisoners who are dangerously ill?—It is to some extent qualified by that, and I have worked out the figures for the last six years which I thought would be a convenient period. The mortality per 1,000 per annum of prisoners in local prisons was 7·6 during the six years ending 31st of March 1864. The releases on medical grounds during the same period were 4·5 per 1,000 per annum. Now supposing you reckon all the releases on medical grounds as deaths, and supposing you add them to the actual deaths, then the rate of mortality would be 12 per 1,000 per annum. It makes a difference of 4·5 per 1,000, supposing you reckon them all as fatal cases, but they are not all cases that would probably be fatal.

1181. Could you describe those cases that would not be likely to be fatal?—Yes. Among the cases discharged during those years are stricture, chronic abscess, chronic bronchitis, debility, abdominal tumours, blindness, paralysis, and infectious diseases.

1182. Would not there also be pregnancy?—Yes, but I have not reckoned the pregnancy cases amongst those.

1183. You have left those out?—Yes. I should have said exclusive of pregnancy cases.

1184. Could you form any estimate of the proportion of those released prior to the expiration of the sentence who would in all probability have died if they had remained in prison?—Roughly speaking I should say it would be 50 per cent.

1185. Therefore supposing the nominal mortality to be 7 per cent. you would think it right to add 2 per cent.?—2 per 1,000.

1186. That would bring up the mortality in the prisons for the last five years to 9·6 per 1,000?—Yes, about that.

1187. We cannot, of course, fix this increased proportion very accurately?—I can give you the figures of the convict prisons for the same period.

1188. Will you do so?—The rate of mortality for the six years ending 31st of March 1894 in convict prisons was 11·1 per thousand per annum. The releases on medical grounds are much smaller in the convict prisons than in the local prisons, so that they make very little difference to the rate of mortality, and they were actually ·9 per 1,000 per annum, so that if you reckon the releases as deaths and add them to the actual deaths it would give an actual mortality of 12 per 1,000 per annum in the convict prisons.

1189. Would you say that the average age of the convict prisoners was higher or lower than that in the local prisons?—It is somewhat higher, I think.

1190. The range of ages, I suppose, would be rather different in the two cases?—Yes. It would be rather different. It has been worked out, but I have not the figures with me. In the convict prisons it is distinctly higher than in the local prisons.

1191. In taking the local prisons the majority of the population would be I suppose between 20 or 40?—Yes decidedly that would be so.

1192. The number above 40 would not be very great?—No.

1193. To compare therefore the mortality in prisons with the mortality of the general population, might you not take the number of persons in prisons between the ages of 20 and 40, take the deaths at that age, and compare it with the deaths between 20 and 40 of the general population?—Yes, I think that would be a fair process. I might venture to state that there is a very able and elaborate paper by Mr. Walker, the Medical Officer of Holloway Prison, in the "Sanitary Record" for the 15th of June 1891. In this paper Mr. Walker shows by some very careful calculations that the mortality in convict prisons at the several ages is exactly that of the general population. It is exactly the same to a fraction minus the deaths in the general population from zymotic diseases.

1194. Can you put that in?—Yes. (The Article was put in. See Appendix VII.)

1195. Turning from the death-rate to the sickness rates, you, in your annual report, supplied information as to the rate of sickness?—As to the number in hospital, but in order to furnish the rate of sickness it would be necessary to know the number of prisoners in hospital for every prison for every day in the year and I have not had time to ascertain that. We do not give that in our printed reports; but speaking from my observation I find that the average number of patients in the hospitals of local prisons is about

12 July 1894.

2·5 per cent. of the population. In the convict prison the proportion of prisoners under treatment in hospital is somewhat larger and amounts to between 4 and 5 per cent.

1196. And in your annual report you give the daily average of prisoners during the year in each prison and also the total; and in the column immediately following, you give the total number of cases of sickness treated in hospital?—Yes, quite so.

1197. I wish to ask you this question. In the summary of medical statistics for the year ending March 31, 1880, in the third report of the Commissioners, page 64, the daily average of female prisoners is 3,396, and the total number of female infirmary cases is 1,011. In the 16th report, page 46, it appears that the average number of women in prison was 2,317, and the total number of cases treated in hospital is 1,591; showing that the number of infirmary cases amongst women had very greatly increased in those 13 years?—I do not think that that shows any increase in sickness. It shows a difference of administration purely. It is purely due to myown action as medical inspector. I was appointed inspector of local prisoners at the latter end of 1878, and I found at once that the sick prisoners were not attended to properly, and that they were not admitted sufficiently freely into hospital, and as a result of my visits and conferences with the medical officers I have been the means of securing a more free use of the hospitals. The sick are more freely admitted into the hospitals than they were formerly. With that additional admission into hospital there has been a decrease in the mortality.

1198. Coming to quite recent years the number of infirmary cases amongst women in the 14th Report which is for the years 1890–91 was 1,218 cases as against 1,591 in the 16th Report; therefore there has been an apparent increase in the last three years?—Well, we have had influenza amongst other things; besides in small populations there will be fluctuations that one cannot quite account for. I do not think there has been any increase of deaths amongst the female prisoners, but we have had an increase of cases requiring observation and a good many cases of pregnancy, cases not of a serious character, requiring admission into a hospital, but not indicating any serious prevalence of disease or falling off of health amongst the prisoners.

1200. I was going to ask you whether you had drawn up a return presenting the number of suicides in a series of years?—Yes, thinking it would be convenient to you, I have found that there were 48 suicides in local prisons during the six years ending March 31st, 1894, or about eight per annum.

1201. Does that compare with any previous period?—It does. I found in the course of some inquiries I made some years ago (and I daresay you may have seen them printed, in the 3rd Report of the Commissioners), that the tendency to commit suicide was greatest during the first week of imprisonment, and that 34 per cent. of those who committed suicide were waiting for trial. I also found that the tendency to commit suicide in local prisons was greater in proportion to population than in convict prisons.

1202. I was asking whether you could furnish a table comparing the last five years with the five years preceding?—Yes.

1203. You can get it from your Reports, no doubt?—Not exactly for the last five years I think, but for the five years ending 31st March 1893, I have the figures here.

1204. With regard to insanity the number of cases of insanity reported in the 16th Report is, I think, 307?—Yes, it is 307.

1205. What page do you get that on?—The table is given on page 62 of the 16th Report of the Commissioners.

1206. That gives, does it not, the particulars of each case of insanity occurring in the local prisons during the year ending 31st March 1893?—It does.

1207. Of those 307 how many showed evidence of insanity on admission to prison?—In 251 of those cases.

1208. Leaving a balance of 56 who showed no evidence of insanity on entering the prison?—On the day of admission to prison, but in 22 other cases the existence of mental disease was recognised a few days after reception and it may be therefore presumed to have occurred before the day of admission.

1209. That leaves 34 cases then, in which, so far as appearances went, they were fairly sane on admission into prison?—That is so.

1210. Do you consider that, taking the rate of insanity per 1,000 occurring in prisons, that that quantity of 34 is larger than would have occurred in the general population?—It is larger than would have occurred in the general population undoubtedly.

1211. Are you prepared to express any opinion on those 34 cases with regard to the causes that might have produced insanity?—I have questioned a good many medical officers as to the causes of those cases of insanity occurring and they have given me the following as the chief causes of insanity arising in prison. That is to say, drink is the first cause and the most important of the whole. Prisoners become insane sometimes in prison as the result of intemperate habits prior to imprisonment. Among other causes there are epilepsy, financial troubles, domestic troubles, puerperal fever, lactation, sunstroke, misfortune, worry and disgrace, disappointment in love, irregular habits, suspense and anxiety; but they do not mention imprisonment as the actual cause of insanity in a single case.

1212. From questions that you have asked of medical officers of prisons do you think that imprisonment may have been a subsidiary cause?—I think that imprisonment very often has the effect of delaying the outset of symptoms of insanity, but I do not think I can say it is even a subsidiary cause.

1213. I understood you to have rather admitted that the proportion of cases of insanity breaking out among prisoners admitted sane was larger than that of the general population?—Yes.

1214. Now the causes you have just assigned are not special causes connected with prison life, and therefore would not account for that increase of insanity in prisons?—They would account, I think, for the cases of insanity arising in prison without the necessity of attributing that insanity to the effect of imprisonment.

1215. You think so?—Yes, I think so. I do not know whether it would be convenient that I should give you some particulars for the year ending March the 31st last. Those are the figures which I have for the year previous, but I have the figures for last year.

1216. Yes, we shall be glad to have them certainly?—During the year ending 31st, 1894, 359 prisoners were reported or certified to be insane in local prisons. Of these, 287 were recognised as being insane at once upon reception: 17 more were recognised as insane within one month of reception; making a total of 304 who were presumably insane on entering the prison. This leaves 55 to be accounted for, and among this residue of 55 some are reported as having been in an unstable condition mentally on reception, or in a doubtful condition, or in a weak-minded condition. They are so returned by the medical officer when received, so that I think that really in very few cases did the insanity of this residue originate in prison. I think that in those cases of unstable mind and doubtful state of mind and cases which were not immediately recognisable on reception there must have been some unsoundness prior to imprisonment.

1217. A certain number of cases are reported as being sound on reception into prison?—Those are the cases that appear to the medical officer to be sound when he has the case before him.

1218. With regard to those cases, are they subjected to the same rule of discipline as to diet and labour as those persons appointed and reported sound, but afterwards turning out to be insane. During the time they are sound they would receive the same diet as other prisoners?—Yes, but I would beg to remark that a great many of those cases are remanded by magistrates specially for observation, and they are placed on No. 3 diet, and are kept under special observation by the medical officer, and reported upon generally at the expiration of seven days.

1219. Will you refer to page 62 in the 16th Report, and to the prisoner who has the registered number 3,045. His mental condition on reception into the local prisons is reported as sound?—Quite so.

1220. Six weeks after he was imprisoned a mania comes on?—Quite so.

1221. What I was asking was: during the first week of that man's imprisonment would he be put on No. 1 diet?—I think so, in that case.

1222. And after the first week he would be put on No. 2 diet?—Yes, that would be so.

1223. Supposing that insanity was latent in him, that he was a person of an unstable state of mind on coming into prison might it not be that the low diet of the first week and even of the first month in prison might have contributed towards it?—I think it might contribute to it in individual cases, but I do not think it is so in any large number of cases. There may be a few cases in which that does apply.

1224. If a person is recognised on admission into prison as being of a feeble condition, would the medical officer specially diet him?—Yes, he would specially take care of him then. It would be his duty to do so.

1225. And, therefore, the only case in which that extra diet would not be given would be that no mental unsoundness was recognised?—Quite so.

1226. I pass now to the prison medical officers. Are there any special qualifications required in the appointment of a medical officer?—He is always required to have a double qualification—a qualification in medicine and in surgery, and as a rule if there are several candidates for one appointment, the medical man with the best qualifications is chosen. At all events that is one of the points which is taken into consideration.

1227. Is it the fact that any of the medical officers have had any special experience in lunacy before their appointment?—Yes, several have been assistant medical officers in lunatic asylums before their appointment. They have come from the asylum to the prisons, but I do not remember their names at this moment. I only know that as a fact. Several of our assistant surgeons have been assistant medical officers in asylums.

1228. Could you very well state the duties of a prison medical officer?—They are very numerous. There is a standing order describing them. I can give you briefly the chief duties if you wish.

1229. Amongst them at any rate one would be to examine every prisoner upon admission?—Certainly, that is so.

1230. He would see him, I suppose, on the first day of his admission?—In local prisons sometimes prisoners arrive at 9 and 10 o'clock at night. In small prisons the medical officer is not resident. He is a practitioner perhaps living at a distance, and a prisoner arriving late would be placed in the reception department, where he would be attended to by the officers and be seen by the medical officer the next day; but where prisoners arrive early in the day they are seen on the same day by the medical officer.

1231. Within a few hours?—Yes.

1232. Is an examination made of all the chief organs of the body?—Yes, a most careful examination. Every prisoner is stripped and auscultated and examined as to the condition of his joints and muscles, and his condition is entered in the reception register. Shall I put in a sample?

1233. Yes?—I will put in specimen pages from the medical reception register for the local prisoners, and the medical history sheet used in the convict department.

1234. With regard to his physical condition I see that you state the weight. Is anything noted as to any peculiar conformation of body?—In the local prisons the medical officer would notice that in his column for remarks, and in the convict prisons it would be placed in the special space assigned for those special conditions.

1235. Is there anything like what would be called an anthropometrical measurement?—There is not.

1236. There would be no measurement of his head, for instance?—No, we have nothing of that sort. I may mention that the number of prisoners received, for instance, at one prison in one day is very large. At Holloway we may receive 100 in one evening, and at such prisons as Strangeways and Liverpool very large numbers are received.

1237. Is there any examination of his mental condition by the medical officer on admission?—Well, the medical officer examines him and endeavours to the best of his ability to ascertain his condition mentally and physically, and deals with him accordingly.

1238. Would not there be an advantage, supposing it were practicable, that every medical officer of a prison should have rendered himself in some degree competent by a short stay in a lunatic asylum to estimate any symptom of actual or of latent insanity?—I think it would tend to add to his efficiency as a medical officer. At the same time I may state that the bulk of our medical officers are extremely careful men, and make very careful entries as to the condition of prisoners on reception. I think it very unlikely that any prisoner who is at all defective, either mentally or physically would be required to do the same labour, and would be treated in the same way as other prisoners. Every allowance is made for a man with such defects.

1239. Is any inquiry made as to his past history, or as to his parentage?—Not the parentage. I think we have no information as to the parentage. In fact, we have no information at all except what can be obtained from the prisoners themselves. You will see the medical officer has a space in which he enters the previous illnesses of the prisoner.

1240. This last information would be derived from the prisoner himself?—Yes.

1241. Coming to the prison infirmary, a certain number of persons are taken into the infirmary and a certain amount of sickness is treated outside of course?—Yes.

1242. They are treated like out-patients and see the medical officer when it is necessary?—Yes.

1243. And I gather that since your administration you have encouraged the reception of prisoners into the infirmary to a larger extent than before?—Yes, I have done so.

1244. In the infirmary under what kind of conditions are the patients with regard to nursing?—In all the large prisons we have specially appointed nurses who are on duty both day and night. I may say there is first of all a hospital principal warder as he is called, generally. In addition to that there are officers on duty in the wards, and also in the largest prisons nurses whose special duty it is to nurse the prisoners both night and day.

1245. Would a hospital warder in the case of men be a man of previous hospital training?—Yes, in the prisons we generally have a man who does duty during the temporary absences of the hospital warder and at other times; and who gradually learns in the course of years what is the duty of a hospital warder; and he is usually chosen to fill up vacancies.

1246. In the case of a man being severely ill, would he be attended to by the prisoners themselves?—To some extent. In the smaller prisons, where we have not got a constant staff of permanent nurses, we sometimes utilise the services of selected prisoners under supervision, but they are always under strict supervision. Such prisoners, for instance, do what cleaning is necessary.

12 July 1894.

1247. May I take it that in the larger prisons you always have the element of skilled nursing?—Yes, and in the whole of the convict prisons.

1248. And the hospital is never left without a skilled nurse—male or female?—Never.

1249. In the smaller prisons it might be otherwise?—In the smaller prisons, especially in the smallest, the hospital may not be occupied at all for weeks together. Then in the case of severe illness occurring and a prisoner being admitted on the ground of pneumonia, for example, arrangements would at once be made for his being attended to, and if necessary outside attendants would be hired. We very frequently hire attendants from outside and they are employed for long periods in nursing prisoners.

1250. Of course what you have said as to male prisoners applies equally to the female?—Quite so.

1251. Coming to the question of the prison generally with regard to their accommodation I believe it is the case that the cells in the local prisons are always pretty much of the same size?—Yes.

1252. They are all ventilated, are they not, in the same way?—Very much in the same way; practically in the same way.

1253. By the air coming in from the top and being sucked out at the bottom of the cells?—Yes, quite so.

1254. With regard to the convict prisons where men are employed in outdoor labour some of the cells or sleeping berths are extremely small?—They are.

1255. For instance, at Portland, would not it be the case that there is not much more than 220 feet of cubic space?—It is something like that; they are very small; they are mere sleeping cells.

1256. In the case of the halls in Portland prison, the only means of warming is by the gas jets which are kept alight all night?—Exactly, as far as I remember.

1257. Is not that a very unsatisfactory mode of warning a prison?—The cells are altogether unsatisfactory; but it must be remembered that the prisoners are out of doors a great deal, and that their health has always been remarkably good whilst occupying those cells; so that although those cells are theoretically unsatisfactory, I cannot say that I can attribute any serious evil to their use.

1258. You think that the evil of that small amount of accommodation and the bad system of warming is counterbalanced by their being employed in outdoor labour?—Yes, and the very healthy conditions they are placed under generally.

1259. But you would not think it satisfactory that a man should be confined in a space of 220 feet, would you?—No.

1260. Have you reported on that point?—No, because it is well known to the authorities that they are very small cells, and previous committees have visited them, and in reporting upon them I should be only reporting what was already known and acknowledged. Of course no construction is so expensive as that of cellular construction, and to accommodate all the convicts in cells of the same cubical capacity as those of local prisons would mean an enormous expenditure.

1261. Still you might have an intermediate size?—Yes.

1263. (Dr. Bridges.) Would it be the duty of the prison medical officer to report on unsatisfactory insanitary conditions that might occur in the prisons?—Certainly; he is provided with a form for that purpose, which he sends in quarterly.

1264. Do those returns come before you?—Yes.

1265. Coming next to the question of food I believe that the present system of dietary in prisons very much accords with the Report of the Departmental Committee of which I think you were a member?—Yes.

1266. It consists of those four classes?—Yes, it is still the same diet; the diets have not been altered.

1267. The dietary for prisoners during the first week (I am speaking now of local prisons) is No. 1 dietary, is it not?—Yes.

1268. That is the bread-and-water diet as we may call it?—The stirabout diet we call it.

1269. On the whole, after your long experience of that diet are you quite satisfied as to the stirabout?—I think that in the case of the women experience shows that it may be possibly advisable to have an alternative diet which the medical officer may order for women who have an objection to the stirabout and who will not eat it. That question is under consideration at this moment.

1270. There is, is there not, rather a difference between the North and South of England?—Yes, the London women have more objection to the stirabout, for instance, than the women of the North. The stirabout is a very nutritious porridge made of oatmeal and Indian meal.

1271. But as a matter of fact in London prisons is not a great deal of that thrown away?—Yes, by the women. It is returned; and, for that reason, I am about to recommend an alternative diet which may be used at the discretion of the medical officer.

1272. Have you seen reason to think that apart from the objection the women have to the stirabout, the quantity of that stirabout diet, the No. 1 diet, is sometimes insufficient?—Not for a short period I think. It is only taken for so short a period that I think it is not more meagre than is required in order that it may be salutary in a prison sense. Of course it is admittedly a diet that does not come up to the theoretical standard as to its nutritive excellence.

1273. I quite understand. Assuming it is good and quite right for prisoners sentenced to a few days' imprisonment, you do not yourself see any objection to its use for a week by people who are sentenced to a month?—No, I do not. I must say that having carefully inquired into that point and having also taken the opinions of very experienced medical officers I am not prepared to recommend any alteration.

1274. I think for a long sentence you do not begin with No. 1 diet?—No, it is strictly confined to those very short sentences.

1275. Is it only given to those who are sentenced for a month?—Yes, for a month and less.

1276. With regard to the clothing. Is any difference systematically made between the winter and the summer clothing?—Yes; as regards the prisoners when they go out to exercise they are furnished with a cloth cape.

1277. Which they wear in the cold weather when at exercise?—But there is no difference made as to the clothing worn in the prison, seeing that the prisons are all warmed and brought up to a temperature of between 60 and 70.

1278. The prison is never cold?—Never.

1279. It is only with regard to outdoor exercise or outdoor work for which extra clothing is wanted?—Yes, amongst the convicts we are very careful. They are provided with gloves and with leggings and with other outward coverings. The convicts working out of doors, in addition to the ordinary clothing, are provided with cloth leggings and a jersey; and in very cold weather with gloves.

1280. With regard to punishment, flogging is sometimes employed?—Yes.

1281. What is the maximum amount?—36 lashes with the cat.

1282. Have you ever heard in your experience of any injury occurring from that?—Never; every man about to be flogged is carefully examined by the medical officer and the medical officer is bound to express his opinion as to the prisoner's fitness to undergo flogging. If he thinks he is unfit for the number of lashes ordered, it is his duty to certify to that effect.

1283. Have you ever heard the opinion expressed that an attack of kidney disease has been the result of flogging?—Never.

1284. With regard to the labour of the prisoners, have you observed the physical effect produced in the convict prisons of Dartmoor and Portland by outdoor exercise?—I have not had any injurious effects brought to my notice. I think, as a matter of fact, a great many improve in health. It is one of the duties of the medical officer to exercise care and visit the prisoners at labour, to see that no prisoner is placed at work for which he is unfit.

1285. But supposing a man to be placed at Portland in the quarries to be fit for outdoor labour, and to be placed upon outdoor labour, would you consider the effect upon him was good?—Yes, and I have never known any case to the contrary.

1286. Contrasting that with the labour used in the local prisons, is it the case that the comparatively confined labour there has a rather less beneficial effect than the outdoor labour of Portland and Dartmoor?—Yes, I might go so far as to say that certainly; but I would not go so far as to say that the labour at which prisoners are placed in local prison does injury in any cases.

1287. Would not that depend very much on the kind of life they had been leading before?—It would, and that would be considered by the medical officer in his recommendation as to the employment of the prisoner. If he thought any particular employment was likely to be injurious, he would say so.

1288. Speaking of that class which I gather from what you have said is a somewhat numerous one in prisons; people of an unstable mental condition, of a feeble circulation, and a feeble brain, do you consider that for such persons as those outdoor labour would be preferable to labour and confinement in a cell?—I think, looking at the matter strictly medically, that it would be so.

1289. Are there any prisons in which there is a considerable amount of labour in the gardens or in the fields?—In local prisons?

1290. Yes.—Yes, there are some prisons in which there are large gardens, and in which the vegetables are grown for consumption in the prison. Prisoners undergoing the longer sentences will be frequently found working in those gardens.

1291. I will ask you just once more about these feeble-minded persons. Would not a long period of isolation in a cell tend rather to intensify their debility of mind than to counteract it?—I think that taking the word "isolation" in a strict sense it would be so; but I do not think there are any conditions that we could call "isolation" in local prisons. There is "separation" but not "isolation." I do not think the "separate confinement" can be described as "isolation."

1292. Well I rather mean the system as it exists of doing work in a cell?—I think it is really so much modified that there are no ill effects from being under lock and key in a cell.

1293. I was not speaking about its effects on a healthy person, and making him ill; but its effect upon a person already in a debilitated state of mind?—I think it would be injurious in that case; and the dealing with those cases is one of the very important duties of the medical officer. He has an unlimited power to exercise a discretion in those cases.

1294. To what extent is he able to exercise a discretion with regard to the employment of the prisoner. Are there trades in the prison on which such persons can be employed under somewhat different conditions from the rest?—Some of those prisoners are very stupid as well as weak minded, and we have some difficulty in finding employment for them, but the medical officer would express his opinion to the Governor, who would employ such a prisoner out of his cell in cleaning about the prison and in going about what is called fatigue work; carrying about things and working in the kitchen, or he might be placed in an associated cell. There are various means of dealing with prisoners suffering from depression and who are in a state of mental debility; and I am sure that those cases are always very carefully attended to by the medical officers throughout the prisons generally.

1295. Have you formed any opinion about the separation of children from other prisoners?—I think they should be kept as far apart as possible, and I believe that that is done generally speaking. In a large prison it is very easy to keep them apart from the other prisoners, and I believe it is always done. I know that in a prison lately a very little boy was received, and the Governor at once sent him over to be taken care of by the matron in the female infirmary. They thought him unfit to be anywhere in view of the male prisoners, and so they dealt with him in that way, and something of that kind is done in the case of any very young juvenile prisoner, I believe.

1296. I suppose your duties have not lead you to consider the question of reformatories?—No, I have not had much to do with reformatories.

1297. (Mr. O'Connor.) Were you ever a medical officer of a prison?—Yes.

1298. For how long?—I was at Millbank from 1860 to 1878.

1299. Were you the sole medical officer there?—No, I was the resident medical officer from 1860 to 1865, and then I was promoted to the post of senior medical officer there on the retirement of Dr. Guy.

1300. Were there two medical officers there?—Yes.

1301. At the same time?—After that I had an assistant medical officer.

1302. There were two medical officers?—Yes.

1303. How many prisoners?—There must have been from 1,000 to 1,200 prisoners.

1304. Is there any prison in which the medical officer has two assistants?—No.

1305. Is not there one?—No, there is no prison in which there are two assistant medical officers.

1306. I suppose the business of chief medical officer at a prison with a large number of prisoners would be, if he attended to it thoroughly, very wearisome and worrying?—Very; it is one of the most arduous posts in the Civil Service, and more worrying than any private practice; at least, I think so.

1307. From the disciplinary circumstances?—Yes, there is a very heavy responsibility and a constant responsibility. There is a constant fear of some oversight.

1308. I suppose the work of a medical officer in a convict prison would be less varied than in a local prison?—Yes, somewhat.

1309. It is simpler?—Well, it is different. The convicts stay long enough to suffer from diseases, and to require surgical treatment and operations, so that there is more done in the way of surgery in the convict prisons than in the local prisons.

1310. In the local prisons, I suppose, by reason of the very rapid stream passing through of a great number of persons the work would be more incessant and very much more varied?—The responsibility of such medical officers as those at Dartmoor or Portland Prisons is, I think, quite as great as that of the medical officer of a large local prison with a large population.

1311. I suppose where you have a local prison with both male and female prisoners the responsibility and wear and tear would be greater still?—Certainly; the female element is very disturbing very often in the prisons.

1312. Long service as a prison medical officer is likely to be very trying to the individual?—It is.

1313. Are you satisfied that in these larger prisons where you have both male and female prisoners one medical officer with one assistant is a sufficient staff for the duties to be done?—I do not think it is always sufficient.

Dr. Gover.

12 July 1894.

1314. When those medical officers go on leave what system have you of replacing them, or one of them?—In the majority of the large prisons a locum tenens is employed from the outside.

1315. Not from the prison staff?—No.

1316. He would have less acquaintance with the criminal population?—Quite so.

1317. He would also be a man of less responsiblity?—Quite so.

1318. Would those circumstances at all incline you to think that it would be better to have a somewhat strengthened medical staff for the general prison service?—I think it would be so.

1319. Have you ever had occasion to make any representation with regard to that?—I have not done so, because the necessity for the second assistant surgeon and medical officer is always most felt when one or the other is away on leave, and of late years the employment of a locum tenens has been pretty general, so that that particular difficulty has been to some extent overcome.

1320. Sometimes when you have two officers the number of prisoners is much less than in other cases where there are no more than two?—Quite so.

1321. In the larger prisons do not you think there is serious need for a second assistant?—I think there is such need in such a prison as Holloway or Walton. Now, at Holloway we receive perhaps from 80 to 100 prisoners a day for two or three days in the week. Everyone of those prisoners has to be carefully examined. The ordinary duties have to be discharged. The warders and their wives have to be attended to. So that there is a great strain on the medical officers.

1322. So that if a medical officer makes a mistake in his diagnosis when a man comes in for the first time it may come back on him years afterwards?—It may.

1323. With great responsibility?—Yes.

1324. So that in a very short time within a very few hours of the day the strain upon such a man may be very serious indeed?—Certainly.

1325. Will you kindly tell us why it was you recommended an increased admission to hospital. What was it that you observed which called for it?—On my first appointment after making a few rounds I found the sick prisoners were too much treated in the cells. They were not sufficiently freely admitted into hospital and consequently the treatment was not carried out satisfactorily and the results were not satisfactory. Therefore at my interviews with the medical officers I encouraged the more free use of the hospitals.

1326. Did you find that was pretty equal as a system, or was it more so in some places and less in others?—The prisoners I think were more adequately dealt with in the Metropolitan prisons than in the country prisons.

1327. In some country prisons there were men left in cells who were quite unfit to be there?—Yes.

1328. And the death-rate in consequence was higher than it need be?—Well, it would require very considerable inquiry to absolutely prove that, but I suspect it to be so.

1329. Your increased admissions resulted in a sensible diminution of the death-rate?—As a matter of fact there was a sensible diminution of the death-rate.

1330. Were there any other circumstances concurrent with that change in administration which would also affect the death-rate?—There was greater attention given to the sanitary arrangements of the prisons and to the preparation of food.

1331. I suppose it would be rather difficult to distinguish between the cases?—Yes; you could scarcely differentiate between the cases.

1332. (Mr. Haldane.) There are one or two questions I should like to ask you. The principle on which our prison system proceeds as regards diet is the subjecting of prisoners of whatever class, and whatever station in life to a uniform system of treatment?—Yes.

1333. That also is true in regard to differences of age and build. A man of six feet high has the same amount of food allowed him as a man of smaller stature, and a man of 40 the same amount as a young man of 18?—Yes.

1334. Has it in your experience struck you as a matter requiring consideration whether some greater elasticity is not needed in that respect?—There is very great elasticity inasmuch as the medical officer can recommend any increase of diet he chooses, and he constantly exercises that power.

1335. He could do that; but that is merely on specific medical grounds?—Well, if a prisoner were found after a short period of observation to be losing weight largely he would certainly have an increase in diet.

1336. Supposing a man comes in who has been accustomed to live fairly well and he is put upon the same diet as a tramp, is not the punishment in the case of a man who has been accustomed to the better sort of food very much greater than it is to the tramp?—Yes, undoubtedly.

1337. And that is an evil which if it can be met consistently with objects should be done?—I suppose it may be said that the man who has lived well prior to imprisonment is a man who has been better off in every respect. He has had a better education, a better bringing up, and is more responsible. I do not know that it is quite unfair that he should suffer more.

1339. Is not that a matter which ought to be considered in connexion with any classifying of prisoners?—As a matter of fact the medical officers do consider even that, and instead of merely increasing the elements of the diet they will sometimes in such cases even alter the scale of the diet.

1340. The same would be true of occupation. What is sufficient for a man who had not worked with his hands may be insufficient for a man who has been accustomed to an active life; and the prison system as it exists at present provides very little room for discretion in that respect. I am talking now of the earlier stages of the sentence?—I can only deal with that question in its strictly medical aspect. If a medical officer were to find any prisoner suffering as a result of any condition imposed upon him during his stay in prison, he would endeavour to neutralise that.

1341. There, again, there would have to be some specific medical evil which would come under the medical category?—Yes, the man would have to be dealt with specifically and categorically.

1342. But in the provision of books and providing mental occupation for the prisoners there is very little difference allowed to the Governor with regard to differentiating as between the treatment of prisoners?—With regard to books I may say I have not much knowledge as to that. That is not my department. That comes more under the cognisance of the chaplain, but I know of some cases in which the medical officer has recommended amusing books.

1343. Then in a case of that kind the medical officers have gone a little out of their way?—Yes. The medical officers have such great powers of recommendation that they make any recommendation they think necessary.

1344. I am asking the question which is a little wider than your department. Does not it strike you that the time has perhaps arrived, our prison system having been perfected into the state in which it is, when a somewhat larger discretion as to differentiating between prisoners in various matters of diet and occupation might be allowed to those who are immediately in control of the prisoners?—Do you mean to the Governors?

1345. Yes, to the Governors and to the persons in charge?—Well, I think with regard to diet that the medical officer ought to have very great powers, and to exercise them freely; but I could not go so far as to recommend that the Governors should have any such power as you indicate.

1346. We will take diet first. Would it not be a good improvement in our prison system if the medical officer had power to do what you tell me some medical officers do, of going a little beyond that, and to exercise a considerable latitude of discretion in the diets on which various classes of prisoners should be put?—Do I understand your question applies to the Governors?

1348. Then is not it the case that he looks at each case entirely from what I may call a medical point of view. Let me make it plain. To a particular man the diet on which he is put may amount to almost torture, for a time at all events, without injuring his health. In that case I apprehend it would be beyond the scope of the medical officer, interpreting his duty strictly, to interfere?—Except that he might interfere in the way of prevention. He might say to himself, "From what I see of this man, and what I know of "his previous history, I am afraid this particular diet "if he goes on with it will injure him, and I will "make this recommendation." Medical officers do very often act in the way of prevention.

1349. I am talking of where it will not harm a man, but merely inflict very great discomfort on him. Would you be prepared in that case to recommend that a wider discretion should be vested in somebody as to discriminating between the cases of prisoners?—I see no harm in investing that authority—in some judicious authority.

1350. There is nothing of the kind now?—No, the whole power is vested in the medical officer.

1351. And subject to that it is prescribed rigidly by rule?—Yes.

1352. As regards both diet and occupation I was suggesting to you the expediency of vesting some wider discretion in some functionary connected with the prison?—I do not quite know whether I am competent to give an opinion on that point as it is a question relating to prison management generally.

1353. It is. That is quite true, and of course on the question of policy there might be grave objections to it, but I was asking you from your knowledge, and when one speaks of the knowledge of a medical man it is embracing a whole field of experience which is rather wider than a layman's. I was asking whether if difficulties of policy could be got over, it would not be better in the interests of the moral as well as the mental health of those in prisons that there should be a larger power of discrimination?—I am still inclined to think that the powers with regard to variation of diet, should be vested entirely in the medical officer, lest for some reason the Governor, or any other authority who had such powers should exercise them injudiciously, and do harm rather than good.

1355. In some prisons, for instance, does a medical officer consider it is a great hardship on one or two men to be subjected to a diet to which he is totally unaccustomed?—Yes.

1357. And they do exercise a wide discretion?—Yes.

1358. That varies, I suppose, with the medical officers?—Yes, the medical officers always have some medical reason for their recommendation.

1359. That is what I wanted to get at?—Their view would not be so large as to exclude medical considerations. They are influenced entirely by medical considerations, I should say.

1360. What I was suggesting to you was—and it was going rather beyond medical considerations and taking into consideration the amount of suffering inflicted on the prisoner—what should you say as to enlarging the discretion of the medical officer?—I think that the interference with any accepted scale of prison diet is such a very serious and critical matter that I should not be prepared to recommend any extension in the way of giving discretion to any other officer than the medical officer.

1361. But I rather gather from you that you think there is at the present time a hardship in the view of the medical officer being limited to what we have called medical considerations?—I meant to say that the putting of a prisoner who has led a luxurious life prior to imprisonment upon a strictly prison diet is a great hardship, and one perhaps not contemplated by the sentence, but I have no reason to recommend empowering any officer but the medical officer to interfere with that.

1362. Perhaps you think there is a choice of evils there?—Yes, I think the interference with prison dietary is a serious matter that should be trusted to only one officer. There might be a clashing together of the governing and medical officers, perhaps. The medical officers being responsible for the health of the prison, I think should be the only person responsible for dietary matters.

1363. Would you extend that observation to occupation. Who do you think should have any discretion on that matter?—I should not extend it to occupation certainly. That is not so strictly a medical matter as diet.

1365. And yet it may be a hardship on a senior wrangler, for example, to be allowed only the same mental pabulum as you allow a tramp?—Yes, but a senior wrangler would be better fortified against such a position. He would be a man of mental resources not possessed by the other. He would be able to recall passages of books that he had read, and I cannot help dismissing from my mind his greater responsibility and the strict justice of the greater hardship he would undergo.

1366. But do you not think he might suffer very much more, being practically without an occupation from only having that which to the tramp, say, would be quite sufficient?—I think he would suffer extremely, but that suffering necessarily would not be injurious to him or shorten his life.

1367. You justify it on the ground of his greater moral responsibility?—Yes.

Adjourned for a short time.

1368. (Sir. J. E. Dorington.) As to the suicides that you say took place were those amongst persons who had been recognised as insane or were they unexpected?—I think they were unexpected in many cases.

1369. They were not among the persons who were marked as insane?—No, they were a distinct class.

1370. Were they all of one character as to the form they took?—As to the mode of suicide, do you mean?

1371. Yes?—No, they were very different.

1372. So that you cannot suggest any special precautions that should be taken?—No, we have taken all the precautions that suggest themselves, but you must have windows and window bars and ventilators.

Dr. Gover.

12 July 1894.

In some cases a suicide has been effected by simple strangulation. A man has, for instance, taken his pocket handkerchief and got a strip of something and actually strangled himself with it. That has happened several times.

1373. That is notwithstanding the constant supervision?—Yes. I do not think the number of suicides is large considering the population.

1374. There are about seven a year, I think?—Yes.

1375. Out of about 150,000?—Yes.

1376. When prisoners are discharged after long sentences in local prisons, do you think they are fit to undertake the ordinary task of labour—Oh, yes, after long sentences.

1377. You do not think they have all got soft?—No, I think not.

1378. Take an agricultural labourer, for instance, who has been kept in the warm and has been well fed and had nearly nothing to do, having been in prison for 18 months?—Well, he is kept pretty well to work, and with a long sentence such as that he is let out of his cell a great deal to do tolerably hard work in the prison and the prison grounds and the gardens and the kitchens, and fetching and carrying, and work that employs his muscles a good deal.

1379. Do you think they get sufficient work to keep them in muscular condition?—Yes; if you will go round and inspect the prisons, and have the prisoners classified, and take a group of prisoners finishing a sentence of 18 months, another of 12 months, another of six months, another of three months, and so on, you will find those who have been longest in prison are in the best condition.

1380. They are the heaviest?—Yes.

1381. And you really do not think they become too soft to perform their several tasks?—No.

1382. Because what is commonly called severe hard labour ceases at the end of the first month?—Yes, the first class hard labour, the treadwheel kind of labour.

1383. You would not suggest they should have any severer form of physical labour than what they get in the work about the prison throughout their sentence?—No, I have no reason to recommend that. I think the work is very suitable on the whole to their condition.

1385. With regard to the insufficient number of medical officers, I suppose Holloway prison is a very exceptional prison in regard to the number of admissions?—Yes.

1386. And, therefore, the ordinary proportion of medical officers there might be inadequate?—It is beginning to be felt to be inadequate, partly owing to the fact that so many prisoners are sent there by magistrates for medical observation.

1387. Those who are sent there for medical obervation require a considerable amount of the medical officer's time?—Constant examining and watching during their time, and reporting upon besides.

1388. Then if there are 80 prisoners coming in besides per day to be carefully medically inspected it would be impossible to get through them all?—It is hard work, besides, there is the medical attendance on the inmates already in the prison, and the officers and their families.

1389. Would you say a prison constituted like Holloway, receiving a large number of prisoners daily, not necessarily convicted, requires a larger staff than in an ordinary prison?—Yes.

1390. (Miss Orme.) You spoke about there being no change made in the clothing for winter and summer. At Wormwood Scrubs I found the women with what they call their summer clothing?—Yes. I referred to the males. In the case of women there is a difference.

1391. When you speak of the number in hospital, do you include those in cells, or only those in the associated wards?—I include those in hospital cells.

1392. In the local prisons you not infrequently have children born in prison?—Yes.

1393. Have you had cases of extreme depression shown by the mothers when the children are taken away from them at the end of the nine months?—In very few cases.

1394. If any trouble of that sort does arise, what happens?—Well, that would not come under my notice particularly.

1395. But do you know what powers the medical officer would have in such a case?—The medical officer would make any recommendation he thought proper, but I do not think, except it was a very extraordinary case, it would extend to keeping the child in prison.

1396. You have not heard of any cases where women have suffered from depression through not knowing where the child is sent?—No, I have not heard of any such case.

1397. (Witness.) I wish to guard against being supposed to say positively that the number of medical officers in any prison is insufficient. I do not think I should have alluded to the subject if I had not been asked the question, but as I was asked the question, I think that in such prisons as Holloway there should be an additional medical officer.

1398. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) There is a special reason at Holloway?—Yes.

1399. I ask that question in consequence of your previous evidence?—Yes.

1400. (Mr. De Rutzen.) You gave an answer just now to Sir John Dorington about the condition of prisoners undergoing long sentences in local prisons to the effect that you thought, under the circumstances, you mentioned they were perfectly fit to undertake the usual manual labour which was, perhaps, their only resource after being liberated?—Yes.

1401. But how about large prisons which have no surroundings such as you mentioned just now; which have no gardens, and nothing but exercise grounds?—In those large prisons there are very large kitchens. There is a great deal of fetching and carrying of clothing and food, and cleaning, and all sorts of work that has to be done in the corridors outside the cells, and the long-sentence prisoners are generally selected for that sort of work out of their cells—in the workshops, for example.

1402. But a great many prisons would have no workshops?—But still there is enough work to be done outside the cells to absorb the whole of the prisoners with very long sentences towards the end of their sentences.

1403. Would there be sufficient?—In fact the long sentence prisoners do not furnish a sufficient number of prisoners for the kitchen.

1404. I take it that would be the lightest of labour?—Well, it is sufficiently hard, I think, to exercise their muscles and keep them in condition, and it would not be an extremely hard kind of labour.

1405. I mean a perfect contrast from anything like convict prisons?—It would be very different in different cases. A prisoner who works in the kitchen would exercise different muscles and put forth a different amount of energy to a man working outside in the garden or sweeping the corridor. We have to avail ourselves of what resources we have, and I think, taking everything into consideration, that the prisoners undergoing long sentences are employed in a very judicious manner outside their cells as far as possible for some months prior to their discharge.

1406. But how would that be in the case of a prisoner, perhaps, who had been sentenced to nine months' imprisonment?—He would not be taken unless there was a deficiency of prisoners with long sentences, and there very often is that deficiency.

1407. Then the one hour's exercise will be the only exercise that he would get?—He would have his work in his cell to do.

1408. Yes, work of a purely sedentary character?—Exactly, but I have not known harm result.

1409. You would not think it judicious that a man should have some harder work to do to keep him in a fit condition?—If it were found necessary it would be recommended by the medical officer. You see it is not all the prisoners who have hard work to do before their admission into prison.

1410. That is true; but those who had?—Those who had would be less likely to be employed in the hardest kind of work that is to be done in the prison when outside; some, for instance, would be employed in such things as the carrying of coal—things that one can hardly remember at a moment's notice—but I think that adequate provision is made for all those cases.

1411. (Chairman.) You were asked a question with regard to the cells at Portland, and you said, I think, that no serious evils had been brought to your notice in consequence of their size?—Yes.

1412. Do I understand you to mean that you did not observe any perceptibly bad effect upon the health of the prisoners?—Quite so, and I think that is shown by the rates of sickness and mortality. The rate of mortality in convict prisons is exactly the same as in the outside population minus that from zymotic diseases. We have few deaths in prison from typhus, or typhoid, or small-pox, or any infectious diseases, and our mortality is exactly that of the general population minus those diseases.

1413. Portland prison is being made a temporary prison?—Yes; orders have been already given for a gradual doing away with those small sleeping cells and for the substitution of larger cells. The prison buildings are quite temporary.

1414. With regard to Rule 26 in the Act of 1865, have you a copy of that. It provides that every male prisoner shall sleep in a cell by himself or under special circumstances placed in a bed in a cell containing not fewer than two other male prisoners?—Yes.

1415. What is your interpretation of "under special circumstances"?—Well, prisoners are often, for example, received in a condition of delirium tremens and are unfit, locked up at night. Many prisoners are received in a doubtful condition, and we should not like to leave them locked up by themselves in cells; or they may be subject to fits; and in those cases some provision of that kind must be made.

1416. That is to say you interpret it by the last sentence of the rule?—Yes, just so.

1417. But you would leave a certain margin of discretion to the medical officers, that is to say, they would have to use their own discretion as to whether a prisoner was or was not suffering from a disease requiring assistance?—Quite so.

1418. And if he had any doubt in the matter he would be able to use his discretion?—Yes; in case of doubt he would generally act and make a recommendation.

1419. Do you approve of this regulation?—Quite so. I may say that it has now become increasingly frequent to employ attendants from outside in cases requiring supervision or observation, in cases unfit for separation and being locked up at night, for instance.

1420. Mr. Manning, the Governor at Pentonville, told us that he was very much opposed to the practice of association, and in Pentonville the practice was never carried out?—Well, he was using the term "association" technically. He means outside the hospital. The wards of the hospital in Pentonville are used to some extent for the association of prisoners who are unfit to be locked up in cells; so that in Pentonville you will find in the hospital wards a few cases of the same kind that you will find in other prisons in associatio n outside the hospital. It is simply a little difference of administration.

1421. Have you formed any decided opinion on the question of unproductive labour in prisons from the medical point of view?—Well, I would venture to say this, that the unproductive crank about which a great deal is said is an instrument not without its recommendation, particularly the crank of Appold's make. It is a very ingenious apparatus and is so ingeniously arranged that no prisoner can over-work himself. The resistance or pressure at the handle can be weighed out to a nicety—to an ounce—and the machine does not get out of order if it is not oiled; so that admitting you have work of that penal character, such as the crank and treadwheel, it is most valuable, for the reason that a prisoner cannot over-work himself. The number of revolutions is fixed at a particular resistance, and you may be almost sure that it is being carried out owing to the construction of the machine. Now, in the case of the flour mill you have an amount of resistance that can be only overcome by a man of great strength. At Wandsworth, where we have a few cell mills, we can only employ the strongest of the prisoners on those mills owing to their being so hard to work, and the cell crank on the other hand is largely used because it is exactly suited to the prisoners received: if we say that the prisoner has to work at a resistance of 12 lbs. and to perform a number of say 8,000 or 10,000 revolutions we know to a nicety what he is doing at the first, second, third, fourth, fifth and sixth hours, and so on, and we know that he cannot be overworked.

1422. That is an advantage. On the other hand, do you see any distinct disadvantages?—The fact that it is unproductive has been, I know, mentioned as a disadvantage, as being in some sense demoralising, but I do not think that if that is a substantial disadvantage, it is overcome by the use of such a thing as a flour mill in a cell, because the flour is produced at a greater expense than you can buy it by contract. At all events nothing is saved. I believe the cost of flour produced by a cell flour mill is rather greater. It does not grind so finely, so that the prisoner is not doing in reality productive work all the time.

1423. Still he is doing productive labour in this sense, that if he was not doing that he would not be doing anything?—He is not doing productive labour in a financial or commercial sense.

1424. But in a prison sense he is?—Of course it is a question of terms. The grinding of flour is not really productive.

1425. It saves a certain amount of money in prison administration?—No; on the other hand, I think the flour is dearer than the flour you can buy by contract. The grinding is not so fine, it is not at all like the grinding by steam at flour mills.

1426. There you have the labour in prison, and through that labour you grind a certain amount of corn, and therefore you have not to go outside to buy it. The labour costs you nothing; but, if you did not use it, you would have to go outside to buy it. Therefore there is profit?—But the balance from the store accountant's point of view would be the other way.

1427. However, you have not observed that the unproductive labour has any particular effect?—No, I do not think prisoners think about it. I think they simply think about the completion of their task. The task at the crank is very moderate I may say. I have frequently worked at it myself without any discomfort.

1428. Will you say that associated industrial labour in prisons is better for the health and condition of the prisoners than isolated labour?—No, I should not like to state that as a general proposition. A good deal depends upon the kind of labour, and the kind of prisoners. I think some prisoners are very much better in their cells. Some prisoners request to be in their cells, and do not like to be in association. Of course circumstances alter cases in that matter a great deal. I do not think you can lay down any general rule of that kind.

1429. Each case has to be judged on its own merits?—Yes.

Dr. Gover.

1430. Would you say it is an increasing practice with magistrates to send accused persons to prison whom they have reason to think are of unsound mind?—Yes, that is certainly increasing, especially in London, so that last year nearly 600 prisoners were sent to Holloway. I do not know the exact figures, but I know from year to year the number of prisoners sent to Holloway for observation is increasing. They are sent by magistrates to Holloway for observation on account of some doubt as to their condition of mind. The medical officer observes them during the period of remand and reports at the end of the time to the magistrate.

1431. It would be a very difficult thing for a magistrate to stop the practice?—Yes; no doubt for the public it is a good thing in itself, but it is a very inconvenient thing to the prisons. In former times I have no doubt a great many prisoners who were insane were dealt with as if they were sane more than now.

1432. Has your attention been called to an article by Mr. Morrison in the "Fortnightly"?—Yes.

1433. You do not agree with his conclusions?—No, I certainly do not. Mr. Morrison takes no notice of the statistics that have appeared in the Annual Reports of the Commissioners in past years, showing that the great majority of insane men are unsound on admission, and that a great many are sent to prison for that very reason. Another very extraordinary thing is, that Mr. Morrison, in endeavouring to show that the ratio of insanity in prison is greater than outside, makes no allowance for the difference of ages as between the prison population and the outside population. The rate per thousand for insanity, which he quotes, deals with the population of children and infants, and includes all ages. It includes children, who are not so liable to insanity as adults. (See Appendix VII.)

1434. I think he takes the population of over 15 for the three years—1890 to 1892, and his figures are 8 per 10,000?—But he has taken no notice of what was brought forward in the printed reports years ago, or the number of prisoners who are being received in an insane condition.

1435. I observe, he says, the actual ratio in local prisons is 113 per 10,000 from 1882 to 1885, and the ratio in local prisons in 1890 to 1892 has risen to 226?—Quite so. That difference would be due to the fact of these prisons being used as places of observation, and also as a convenient channel for admission into the asylum. They are a certifying medium in many cases. Prisoners are sent in many cases as a cheap way of certifying them.

1436. (Mr. O'Connor.) I do not know whether you have had your attention directed to the increase of insanity in this country during the last 15 years?—Yes.

1437. Is there as large an increase of insanity in the prison population as in the general population?—Not in the convict prisons, for the special reasons I have named. It does not arise in the prisons.

1438. Is there a larger proportionate increase, I do not say an absolute increase, but a larger proportionate increase in the insanity in prisons generally in the last 15 years than there has been proved to be in the general population?—I think there is in the local prisons.

1439. But not in the convict prisons?—Not in the covict prisons.

1440. (Chairman.) That would be partially explained by the fact that there is now a closer supervision into the mental state of prisoners?—Yes, and also owing to the fact that the prisoners are sent to prison, and I believe actually sentenced and sent to prison in order that they may be observed and dealt with. It is said that the police, for instance, finding a wandering lunatic take him before a magistrate; some charge is brought against the wandering lunatic, who is sentenced and sent to prison, and there certified and removed to an asylum.

1441. That is under the Lunacy Act of 1890?—Yes, and that is becoming more frequent of late.

1442. In judging as to whether a particular prisoner is or is not insane I suppose in prisons there would be rather less difficulty and hesitation in certifying than there would be outside on the part of two doctors who are asked to certify?—Yes, there would be undoubtedly. Medical men outside a prison have now, as you are aware, to certify cases with great reluctance owing to their liability to proceedings being taken against them and they will not certify unless they are obliged to do so.

1443. And in those cases if they send a patient to an asylum it means the deprivation of liberty but that reason does not exist with regard to prisoners already there?—Quite so.

1444. Therefore in the interest of a man's health there would be a greater readiness on the part of the prison doctor to determine that the man was not in a sane condition in order that he might go to an asylum and be properly treated in his own interest?—Quite so.

1445. And in fact, so far as his personal condition under restraint is concerned, he would be better off in an asylum than in a prison?—Certainly.

1446. I rather imagine that one argument which Mr. Morrison endeavours to substantiate in his article is that the alleged increase of insanity in prisons since 1878 indicated that the transfer of prisons was partly responsible for it?—Yes, I think he implies that certainly in his article.

1447. Can you give any figures with regard to the cases of insanity before and after that transfer?—No, I have no reliable statistics. There are no comparable statistics.

1448. Would it be possible to furnish any figures to the Committee throwing any light on the number of cases of insanity for the five years before 1878 and subsequently?—Well, I am not quite sure. I think that the figures quoted in my report some years ago were obtained from printed reports, but I am not quite sure as to their source. I have no doubt they could be obtained.

1449. Perhaps you will consider the matter, and if you can furnish the Committee with that you will do so?—Yes; I will.

1450. (Mr. O'Connor.) I suppose you would say that if this sort of comparison is to be made, the only persons to be credited to the prisons at the present time are those who become insane some time after they have been in prison?—Yes.

1451. In the first year 1892–93 you gave us 34 cases, and in 1893–94, 55 cases?—Yes.

1452. And that the other cases, 273 in one case, and 304 in the other were recognised on admission, or soon after, and really cannot be in any way calculated as the consequence of prison discipline?—Certainly.

1453. (Dr. Bridges.) I want to ask only two questions. One was suggested by some questions which were put to you by Mr. Haldane as to the power of the medical officers in matters of diet. I have here one of the quarterly reports of the Liverpool prison. If you will just glance at it, you will see there are a certain number of cases to whom the prison officer gave extra diet?—Yes.

1454. Does that 104 mean 104 separate persons?—Yes; I think that shows the extent to which the medical officers avail themselves of their powers.

1455. That is a large prison, is it not?—Yes.

1456. And in that period of that particular quarter the medical officer ordered it in how many cases?—In 104 cases during the quarter ending the 30th June 1892. The medical officer ordered extra diet in the prison of Walton at Liverpool.

1457. Is any reason stated for it?—The grounds are debility, old age, loss of weight, nursing mothers, and cases of continued short imprisonment.

1458. It was to those cases of continued short impri sonment that I wished to call your attention. That means that, in the opinion of that medical officer, the repeated use of the Number 1 diet would be injurious?—Quite so. No doubt it would be in that case.

1459. Is that a common reason for the medical officer of prisons to give?—Yes. I may say that it is a common reason.

1460. In one of these reports, that of the Wakefield prison I notice repeated complaints of the medical officer as to the sanitary condition of the prison with regard to the outbreak of diarrhœa?—That is due to the fact that Wakefield prison was built when very large drains were thought necessary; those drains are six or seven feet in diameter, and they are now gradually being replaced by smaller drains so that the evil is being overcome, but it involves entire reconstruction of the drainage of the prison.

1461. You said that the examination of the prisoner by the prison medical officer on his reception did not include what may be called a careful anthropometrical measurement?—No, it does not.

1462. Would that be for want of time on the part of the officer?—Yes, the medical officers would no have time for that, and they have had no instructions as to it; but if they had they could not carry them out for want of time.

1463. Therefore without some increase in the medical staff that kind of examination of the prisoner could not be made?—It could not be made.

1464. (Mr. O'Connor.) Have you any returns with regard to the insanity which supervenes among the warders?—No, we have no returns of that kind.

1465. Could you find out this for me; whether deducting the cases recognised as insane, cases either at or soon after the admission of prisoners, the insanity which shows itself subsequently among the residue of prisoners is higher or as high as it is among the warders?—I could not tell you that at once, but I could find it out for you if you wished me to do so.

1466. Would you say that the service of the warders has a depressing effect upon their mental constitution?—I think it is a depressing occupation, but I have not heard of the occurrence of cases of insanity amongst the warders in sufficient numbers to warrant me in concluding it to be productive of insanity.

1467. From the medical point of view have you anything to observe with regard to the hours of employment of warders?—I think that now they are reasonable.

1468. Even in the cases in which they are longest?—Yes, I think so.

1469. Male and female?—Yes, considering the nature of the duties I think they are now reasonable.

1470. Are you conversant with all the hours of employment in all the prisons of the male and female officers?—Yes.

1471. With regard to the food, I suppose you are familiar with the tables of the chemical equivalents of food in respect of carbon and nitrogen, and all that sort of thing?—Yes.

1472. With regard to men who are on full employment and light labour or doing nothing, would you say that the chemical equivalents in dietary No. 1 are sufficient to sustain a man in normal health while he is doing hard labour?—For a few days I think, but not for any long period.

1473. From a medical point of view would you have anything to suggest with regard to that diet and and that occupation?—I think that I have only to suggest that in the case of women there should be an alternative diet which should be used at the discretion of the medical officer.

1474. That is where they reject their food?—Yes; but I think in the case of men who eat the whole of the diet No. 1 diet that no harm is done by keeping them upon that diet, and by putting them at hard labour for a few days.

1475. For convicts under long sentences do you believe they have sufficient carbonaceous food?—Yes, I think so.

1476. Have you ever heard of their eating candle ends?—Well, I have heard of those cases, but there are some convicts with very voracious appetites, but I have not heard of any cases indicating that men with normal appetites indulged in that.

1477. Would you be surprised if a man stated that he had witnessed prisoners picking out candle ends from heaps of filth and eating them?—I know there are a few prisoners who would do that.

1478. Would that be from an abnormal or diseased voracity, or because the man felt he required something or other to keep him warmer?—I should think to the first class of cases. There are some prisoners with abnormal appetites who will eat as much as you can give them.

1479. Would that be a medical case? Would it be a disease?—It would be a case requiring observation.

1480. If a man would do that, would it be a case to modify his diet? In a case where they rejected their food would you give an alternative diet?—Yes, but many male prisoners do not masticate their food, it is a very common practice to bolt their food; the food is therefore not digested, and it does not nourish them. I think those prisoners require supervision and careful advice, and they get it.

1481. I notice with satisfaction that where women persistently reject the gruel you would give them an alternative diet?—Yes.

1482. Now, in the case of men who will resort to such extremes as have been mentioned, would not you give also some alternative diet?—Well, those cases would be brought under the notice of the medical officer, and he has already the power to increase or modify the diet, or even to take such cases into hospital if he chooses.

1483. Does not the same power exist with regard to the women at present?—Yes, but the number of women who will return their stirabout in the metropolitan prisons is sufficiently large to render it advisable to have an alternative scale which may be readily made use of and which is always ready to use.

1484. I want to ask you a general question with regard to juveniles in prison. I should like you to look at it, not from a merely medical point of view, but from an administrative point of view. Taking the question of juveniles at large, and the question of sending them to prison, have you from the medical or administrative point of view, or in the light of your extensive experience, anything to suggest to this Committee with regard to modifying the existing system?—Well, that is a question for which I am not quite prepared. I should like to take it into consideration, and to make any remarks on that subject as the result of that consideration.

1485. And even on the spur of the moment you would not care to give a medical view?—No, I would rather think over that.

1486. Perhaps the witness may be allowed to send in a statement?—Yes, I will send my remarks to the Secretary.

1487. (Mr. De Rutzen.) We have here an account of the number of people who are sent for observation—some 600 odd—out of which some 81 have been certified to be insane. Do you know, as a matter of fact, that a great many of the cases which are sent there are returned with the remark, that the person under observation is a person of weak intellect, but has shown no actual sign of insanity?—Yes.

1488. That is a very common form?—Yes, I am aware of it.

1489. Is there any record kept of those particular cases which are on the border line of weak intellect, but no actual insanity?—I do not think so; there would be in the individual prisons, no doubt; for, instance, at Holloway, out of the 600 sent for observation, a great many are reported either to be sound in mind or not sufficiently unsound to be certified insane. The medical officer, no doubt, has kept notes of all those cases, but we only have actual reports of the unsoundness. You can get them from the medical officers.

1490. That would be only by examining each one of them?—Yes.

Dr. Gover.

1491. That would be a tremendously long process, but there is no record kept of those particular cases which are in the Home Office list?—No, they are not kept in this office, and no doubt if you applied to the Medical Officer of Holloway prison he would be able to give you notes of all those cases. He keeps in a book the result of the observations. We only get in the reports the cases in which the result of observation is a certificate of unsoundness.

1492. Because a great many of the cases which you mentioned as where a person is taken up as a wandering lunatic; such a case, perhaps, as that would not come to you at all, but then persons who are charged with some offence, no matter what it may be, whether it may be being drunk and disorderly or any other offence, who from their appearance are in such a state as to justify anybody who has the person before them in saying before I can deal with this case I should like to know in what state of mind that person is. Those are the cases that would come to you?—Yes, certainly. A great many cases are placed under observation at Holloway. That is to say, of persons who have committed some offence which is suggestive of some mental aberration, such as attempted suicide, or some assault on their wives or families, or something of that kind.

1493. Of course you would not be able to give an answer to this question as to whether or not there are not a great many people who come a second time charged with some offence, and are sentenced about whom this particular report has been made that he is of weak intellect, but has shown no actual sign of insanity?—No, I have no particulars of those cases.

1494. As a matter of fact it happens every day?—I think that they could be obtained from the officer at Holloway.

1495. (Mr. O'Connor.) I suppose every committed prisoner, every man committed for trial is already under observation before he is sentenced?—Yes, certainly.

The witness withdrew.

Rev. G. P. Merrick.

Rev. G. P. Merrick called and examined.

1496. (Chairman.) You are the Chaplain of Holloway and Newgate?—Yes, I am.

1497. I think you have been only recently appointed to Holloway?—About a year ago.

1498. Where were you before?—At Wormwood Scrubs.

1499. How long were you there?—I think about three years from the time that Wormwood Scrubs was transferred from the convict to the local service; in other words when the convicts were sent away from Wormwood Scrubs, and the local prisoners were taken there from Millbank.

1500. Were you in the prison service department before that?—Yes, I was at Milbank for several years, and before that I was at Tothill Fields' prison, a prison at Westminster.

1501. How many prisoners have you to deal with now at Holloway and Newgate?—About 800.

1502. How many are at Holloway?—There are none at Newgate really. Newgate is only opened during the Old Bailey Sessions. Those who are awaiting trial for those Sessions are taken down from Holloway for trial at the Old Bailey, and then they are kept there as prisoners for a week or for the time being, but Newgate is not used as a prison; only as a house for detention for a few days.

1503. You have an assistant chaplain?—Yes.

1504. Is there a Roman Catholic chaplain attached to the prison also?—Yes.

1505. You have one assistant?—Yes.

1506. And does your assistant attend to the trial prisoners at Newgate?—No, I do that. He looks after the men really on one side of Holloway Prison and I look after the women on the other, but I take also the charge of the men and the women who go down to Newgate. It is much the larger share of the work.

1507. How many women prisoners are there?—I think about 400 at the present time.

1508. And the men are about 350, perhaps?—Yes.

1509. Then that is your standing arrangement. You look after the women prisoners?—That is a mutual arrangement, but I am responsible for the whole.

1510. Can you say whether it is a common practice among chaplains to make that particular division?—I do not know. I rather think not. Our circumstances at Holloway are very special. You see it is a house of detention for all prisoners; and it is a prison also for women. At Millbank it was a prison exclusively, and there we divided the work differently. There were six pentagons, and I took charge of three and my assistant of three. At Wormwood Scrubs there were four halls. I took charge of two—the convicts and the women—and my assistant took charge of the other two.

1511. How many prisoners do you think you can deal with adequately?—When first I went to Millbank I must have had nearly 1,000, and I was single-handed; but that did not go on very long. It was impossible for me to pay attention to 1,000 prisoners. I think now that my hands are full.

1512. With 400?—Yes; it really means more than that; it means three times that number in another prison, because they are in for such short terms, and being under remand they require such great attention. Even to-day, I have probably seen more cases than any other chaplain in the service; the numbers coming in are so large. A few weeks ago we had 176 admissions in one night. We saw them all the next day. I suppose that is an experience confined to this particular prison.

1513. What are your working hours?—Our service in the morning is at a quarter to nine. We are ready for the service, and then I stay until the work is done. Yesterday it was done at 4 o'clock. To-day perhaps it would have been done at about half-past one; the number coming in last night was not so large as the number of the night before.

1514. That is to say, you see all who wish to see you on your regular rounds?—I see everybody who comes in, everybody who goes out, and also those who wish to see me. The sick again have special attention.

1515. Have you found that with some prisoners there is anything like resentment against what they consider compulsory religion in prisons?—This is the first time the question has been raised, but only once since I have been at Holloway has a man asked to be excused from attendance at chapel. He was an educated man, an American medical man, and the reason he assigned was that it did not suggest church to him. I think at one time he sang in a choir, and the associations altogether were very suggestive and painful to him; but that is the only one I have had since I have been at Holloway.

1516. You find they do not make any objection whatever to it?—This is the first case: Sometimes at Millbank a woman did not wish to go to chapel, and we found the reason was that there was some person with whom she had had a quarrel, and she thought she might meet her and have another quarrel; but I should think during my whole stay at Millbank, and at Wormwood Scrubs, I could not have had more than about five cases in the course of a year; perhaps not so many; perhaps three.

1517. Have you formed any definite opinion in regard to the ordinary system of prison punishment upon the mental and moral condition of the prisoners? Are you satisfied with the system?—I will not say that I am satisfied with the system, but I am satisfied that it has not any injurious effect. I have never seen any instance of it.

1518. Does it occur to you that the system of punishment makes prisoners more refractory than one would expect under the circumstances?—I am rather under the impression that with the women that come in under short sentences, as they are at once put on bread and water, if they are subjected to punishment and are put on for a further term of bread and water it makes them very ill-tempered and disposed to be disorderly. I think that punishment should take another form than that of depriving them of food.

1519. What form do you think it should take?——

1520. (Mr. O'Connor.) This is only with women?—My experience has been always with women, except the convicts I had at Wormwood Scrubs; though to a certain extent my answers would cover them.

1521. (Chairman.) The question is what form of punishment do you propose?—It does seem very harsh, but I would rather their hands were bound, or something like that for a time. I hardly like to suggest they should have handcuffs, but I am of opinion that it is far more humane than depriving them of exercise, and keeping them down on an extremely low prison punishment diet. They complain frequently when they come in and say, "I have been "in and out of the prison within the last three days. "I am starved here and starved outside, but I got "some drink and I have come back again." I think in that way they are reduced to a state of great bodily weakness, and I would rather do anything than that they should suffer constitutionally.

1522. Are you against all dietary punishments?—I have not gone so far as that, but, as a general rule, I should object to dietary punishments.

1523. But with regard to the handcuffs, you would handcuff the prisoner in her cell?—Well, I should put her in a cell, perhaps, as a part of her punishment, but I should handcuff her. I think it does not hurt her physically so much as putting her on a reduced diet, and I think they would find the irksomeness of the matter very trying, though it does not hurt them.

1524. They would be sitting there in their cells with their hands tied, but what would you prevent them from doing?—Pulling up their clothes, and breaking the windows, and striking the officers. They feel it as a punishment far more than anything else. I suppose it is merely restraint, but the other thing seems to make them irritable, and it does not seem to deter them.

1525. Of course handcuffs cannot be put on the prisoners unless there are any special circumstances to justify it. That is so now?—Yes.

1526. You are opposed to anything like a punishment cell?—I think that the other would be a better remedy than that; I do not think it makes very much difference; they do not seem to regard it with any different feeling.

1527. Loss of marks is not sufficient?—No.

1528. Would you say that women are more difficult to deal with in point of prison discipline than men?—Yes, I think so; they will break out sometimes without any reason and they will say so. They are sorry for it afterwards.

1529. What you call "breaking out" is not known amongst men?—No.

1530. Do you find that women more often become habitual offenders against the prison rules than men?—I think so with reference to violence and making a noise.

1531. Do you think that women more often become offenders than men?—Yes.

1532. Do you approve of the present system with regard to visits and letters?—Do you mean in the number of visits?

1533. Yes, the rules and regulations with regard to friends seeing prisoners?—I think it might be extended in one direction, and that is to give the good prisoners more frequent intercourse with their friends; but otherwise it seems to me that the visits are sufficiently frequent. At Wormwood Scrubs they were conducted under pleasant circumstances.

1534. Then if you say you think that good prisoners should see friends rather oftener, it means that a discretion must be allowed to the Governor, to the authorities?—Yes.

1535. Does not that sometimes place the Governor in a difficulty when the prisoners know that it all depends upon then whether they should have this or that advantage?—I do not think it makes very much difference.

1536. At present he can say there is a definite rule and that he cannot go beyond it?—Yes, but practically the prisoners make the rule for themselves by their behaviour. If they conducted themselves well, they might have a visit once every two months; if they did not once every four months. So that they would make the rule for themselves.

1537. You are inclined to think that great latitude might be shown with regard to receiving visits?—Yes.

1538. And in regard to receiving and writing letters?—Yes, that is, where the acquaintances to whom they write letters are known to be reputable people.

1539. Of course you would hold that anything which tended to elevate a prisoner it would be advisable to adopt?—Yes, undoubtedly.

1540. And that if you can improve a prisoner's mind there is not much danger of the prison appearing less penal to that prisoner; that is to say, that in proportion as his or her mind improves he or she would have a full realisation of prison life?—Do you mean the degradation of the prisoner?

1541. Yes; and therefore by making those remissions in the interests of the prisoner, there would not be a danger of the prison as a deterrent becoming less formidable?—No, I think all prisoners, even the most depraved, are more or less sensible to the degradation and shame of imprisonment. There are very few exceptions. I have seen 170,000 prisoners, and have notes of the cases, and I do not think I have come across, perhaps, more than 30 or 40, who would be utterly callous and utterly lost to the sense of shame and degradation of being shut up in the prison cell It appears to me that that is the worst feature of the imprisonment, so far as they are concerned; it is not the mere surrounding of the cell, but it is the fact that they are shamed, which moves even the most degraded.

1542. With regard to the visits of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies, can you tell us what the practice is in Holloway?—We have three societies practically working at Holloway; the Sheriffs' Fund Society, the St. Giles' Christian Mission, the Reformatory and Refuge Union, besides Homes for fallen women; in fact, I may say, every society of the kind in London is ready to take cases from us. For the women we have a visitor, who comes in three times a week from the Reformatory and Refuge Union, and sees all those cases which are under remand, and for which the magistrates and myself think that there should be some reformatory provision made. There are other institutions. The Elizabeth Fry Refuge visits weekly cases which are eligible for that institution. A great many women want help in the way of clothing. I get a great deal of clothing sent to me, and I am able to give help in that way. The Reformatory and Refuge Union takes care of some of the women and sends them to suitable Homes. The St. Giles' Mission gives them stock and other, and pays their fares, and if we want anybody to take charge of a case, say to Liverpool, the prison officers themselves have been escorts to the railway station. The Commissioners are very good in that respect, and we are allowed to utilise such services occasionally, if the need arises. With reference to the men, if a man asks for aid we have not the same chances there because they are on remand. If they had been prisoners we could deal with any one of them; but even then if a man says his wife and family are in a state of destitution, or that he is in a difficulty as to home, clothing, or employment when he gets out, we communicate with the St. Giles' Christian Mission on his behalf, and Mr. Wheatley comes up to the prison two or three times a week to see people who have been referred to him. In the case of the Royal Society we generally communicate with them previously, and the man is sent to them.

1543. There are, of course, a good many societies which are allowed to help prisoners if they can. Do you see any objection to allowing a prisoner to choose of his own free will which society should help him? —We always do.

1544. Is he supplied with a list of the societies that could help him?—Generally speaking they know better than we do. That is a piece of information they always seem to post themselves up with. They always know about that. I may say with reference to the clergy who have worked with me, that I have always made a point of telling them to ascertain what the circumstances of the prisoner are; so that if a man himself did not think of it I should take the initiative if I thought it was a case where help was wanted. We always ask the question whether a man or woman has got a home, and what they are going to do. That is always asked of every case that comes in.

1545. I think you have the charge of the distribution of books?—Yes.

1546. Do you think that the present system is all that it should be?—I am rather inclined to think that prisoners when they come in want books really more then than they do when they have been in for some time. They get more intelligent and better employment after they have been in for a little time. When they come in they find their time very irksome, and it is very painful for them. For my part I think that I should give them more books than they have been accustomed to have hitherto.

1547. How often do they get books—once a fortnight, or once a week?—Once a week.

1548. Some prisoners will read their book through almost in a day perhaps?—It depends on the matter. The women like a story book; the men almost always like a book of instruction. I might say that out of one hundred thousand requests for books made by women I do not think I have had more than a dozen asking for an instruction or a school book. Some few have asked for French Bibles and Prayer Books but not for books of instruction. With men it is different. I had 200 copies of the "Popular Educator" in circulation at Wormwood Scrubs, and if I could multiply that number by three I could not supply them rapidly enough. Books like that they will read every page of and try to learn things: but with the women it is a question nearly always of a story.

1549. Is your library sufficient in point of number of volumes?—Yes. I may mention that once at Millbank I appealed to the prisoners to know what they thought a library should consist of, and I had some 300 or 400 suggestions from the prisoners themselves, and I found only in one or two cases that they appealed for anything but what we had supplied them with. One man wanted the works of Guizot. Another man asked for some scientific work, and another for some French book, but we found with some five or six exceptions that we were supplied with everything. There was a great demand for Dickens' works; Scott's works and Bulwer's works; but those we had.

1550. Would you be prepared to allow prisoners to read pretty much as they like provided it did not interfere with the work they had to do and attending chapel and so on?—Quite.

1551. You see no objection to it?—No, I should rather like it.

1552. With regard to your own special work in visiting prisoners, what class do you find you can more easily deal with, habitual prisoners, young prisoners, old ones, men or women?—My labours have been nearly always with women, but I do not know that there has been much difference. The habitual criminal from the mere fact that he is an habitual criminal shows that one's influence with him is very small; but I may say that everyone seems to have a germ of something better behind, if one can only reach it, and if one be the right person to do it.

1553. An habitual criminal is amenable?—Yes, he behaves very well, and so do the women generally speaking. The habitual drunkards and disorderly people do not. They are really the ones who commit the prison offences.

1554. Those who are suddenly cut off from drink? —Yes.

1555. Now with regard to the young prisoners, have you formed any opinion of the treatment of young prisoners?—I have always tried to keep the youthful prisoners from the others, and I draw a line at the age of 16. At Millbank and at Westminster we had a portion of the prison which we appropriated for children under 16, and we had another part of the prison very near where we placed those who were really first offenders, irrespective of age. We found that it worked admirably and did not interfere with the prison discipline, and at the same time it prevented them from being contaminated by being associated with others.

1556. Do you think there are opportunities for contamination?—Undoubtedly, but I do not think they are taken so much advantage of by the men as by the women. It seems a sad thing to say, but it is a fact. I do not find with the men now at Holloway that they try to get hold of the younger ones, but with the women and the girls it is very different, and one has to exercise very great care in putting the girls amongst older offenders.

1557. You say you draw a distinction between those of 16 and the others. Do you not think that that age is rather low?—No; with reference to boys, boys lose very much of their boyish character after they are 16.

1558. Are they not more careless about things and are they not more amenable to influences?—They seem to have the spirit of a boy and partly the sagacity of a man; and I find that boys get very much more criminal after they are 16 than before. I have got some papers and some figures dealing with some thousands of cases which I took notes of last year.

1559. I should like to see it. It might be as well if you handed it in?—It is part of a paper I was writing on the subject. There are 600 burglaries and I have taken the ages of the burglars. Then I have got pickpockets and petty larceny people also there. You will see from one or two notes I have given you that the age of 18 to 19 is the one which is most prolific for all criminals except those for embezzlement. With girls I took the particulars of thirty thousand cases of a certain character, and I found that 19 was the perilous age. I mention this now to show why I am rather emphatic about the age of separation.

1560. When are you going to publish this?—It is a question of time, but these are 2,000 cases that came under my notice during one year—the year before last.

(The paper was handed in, see Appendix III.)

The proceedings were adjourned until Tuesday, 17th of July, at 11.30 a.m.

Rev. G. P. MERRICK recalled and further examined.

Rev. G. P. Merrick.
17 July 1894.

1561. (Chairman.) Have you anything that you wish to correct in your evidence?—I thought I might have amplified a little more my remarks about the "Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society." If you will allow me to add that to the correction of the proof, I shall be glad. It is only to show that we meet every case, and that we do everything that can be done for our prisoners. I think I only specified the work of three societies, and I did not state in what way they worked. It is not really altering what I said, but amplifying it.

1562. I think the Committee would prefer that you should make any statements upon that now, rather than upon correcting the proof?—It was simply to say that in one way or another through the several societies that visit at Holloway Prison they provide for the men, the women and the children; and in all cases we go into their circumstances; and whatever reformatory or other kind of relief we can give them, we do give; and I think really that perhaps during the last year hardly two cases have escaped our notice. I do not believe that two cases have. I did not state that when I was speaking to you before, but I think that our arrangements cover almost every case and cover all possible cases, and we do help them.

1563. You are speaking now, of course, of your own experience at Holloway?—Yes, since I have been there; and I may say the same with regard to Millbank, and to the time when I was at Wormwood Scrubs.

1564. You would not necessarily include in your remark the local prisons generally in the country?—No; I only speak of that which comes within my own experience.

1565. That is all you wish to add on that point?—Yes. I may say with reference to what you have now said that I think there is a Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society attached to every prison in the kingdom. I have reports from nearly all the authorities, and I take it from those reports that they do very much the same as we do.

1566. The names of those societies are in one of the appendices to the Commissioners' Report?—Yes.

1567. Last Thursday, speaking of young prisoners, you said that you found that boys did get very much more criminal after they were 16 than before?—Yes.

1568. That, of course, no doubt is borne out by figures and statistics; but it is a very serious fact, and one of the principal facts that we are now dealing with. It is not a necessary result, is it, of human nature that it should be so?—I think to a certain extent it shows increased knowledge on the part of the person of the ways of life and the methods of earning money, and in that way it is a phase or feature of human nature.

1569. But it really shows, does it not, the development of either a criminal instinct or criminal habits?—I should rather say criminal habits.

1570. Then the question we want you to deal with is the best method of eradicating those habits?—So far as the prisoner is concerned I think it should be by separation, and judicious separation. First of all, of those offenders who are under 16 from those above it; and, secondly, of those who are relatively innocent, or comparatively speaking, innocent, from those who are certainly very vicious in tendency, and (in practice), whether the viciousness is hereditary or whether it has been brought about by circumstances, because I should have a sub-division, and that I have always tried for.

1571. I rather understood you to say that you did not think that 16 was a low age to mark a youthful offender by, and your argument seemed to be that after that age the criminal instincts and criminal habits seem to get so confirmed that you did not see your way to approving of a special classification of young offenders over 16?—Quite so, but I may say this, that wherever I have found, irrespective of age, a prisoner is comparatively speaking innocent, I have always suggested to the authorities of the prison that the prisoner should be put elsewhere if his surroundings have been likely to lead him further astray, and they have always assented to my wishes in that respect. I have had people come into prison whose age perhaps has been 50 or 60, and I have asked that they should be put in a part of the prison where they would not be likely to hear anything that was offensive or instructive in the way of evil effect. Certainly with all girls between the ages of 17 and 25 I have been very particular, and if I have found a young man, even up to 30, who was likely to be spoilt or deteriorated in any way by his contact with his fellow prisoners, I have asked that he might be put aside or put to another part of the prison where he would not be subject to contamination; and it has always been done.

1572. Is that an absolute safeguard in the prison system?—I think it is as far as you can go. They are kept apart in the solitary confinement system prevailing at the present time.

1573. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) The prisoner you are speaking of is a long sentence prisoner?—Even down from 1876 that has been so.

1574. And they are always apart?—They are always apart, but I should, even if a prisoner came in for seven days, and I found that prisoner was associated with others older and more criminal, ask that that prisoner should be put separately.

1575. (Chairman.) When you say "associated," do you mean at chapel, at exercise, and in prison generally?—At chapel, at exercise, and in a part of the prison. At Millbank and Wormwood Scrubs the governor practically always allowed about 30 cells to be used for first offenders irrespective of age, and he kept the boys at Wormwood Scrubs always together in chapel, at exercise, and in a part of the prison. At Holloway we do the same. At Millbank we were able to do so even still better, and I must testify to this, that the officers always aided in the matter. If they saw the case of a boy, or girl, or young woman, who was likely to suffer from their immediate surroundings, they spoke to me about it, and I mentioned it to the governor of the prison, who at once had the prisoner put into more favourable circumstances.

1576. Then, although a great deal may be done under the existing system, if the officials of the prison take a special interest in the question and do their utmost in the matter, yet, at the same time, if there were lax officials very great evils might go on in the way of contamination?—Quite. A great deal depends upon the person—himself or herself. I have found with the large numbers I have had to deal with that, as a rule, a girl is not contaminated unless she wishes to be, or unless she has got a curiosity in the direction from which the contamination comes. And a man, even in spite of his miserable surroundings in prison, will keep himself relatively pure. It is only with the weaker ones where there is a tendency to run in the wrong direction, if a wrong direction is open, that that occurs.

1577. What is your opinion of the proposal to have a separate prison and different treatment for young offenders up to a certain age?—I do not think I have heard of that proposition before, but it is one which would meet with my approval. I should like that. We have that done to a certain extent at Holloway where we keep the boys apart in the chapel, in the exercise ground, and in the prison. Then we try to make a sub-division if we find the boys are likely to contaminate others. If, for instance, one of the boys is worse than the others, or a black sheep among the boys, we try to check or isolate him.

1578. Government has already admitted the principle of classification by its Reformatory Acts?—Yes.

1579. And it is only a question really of how far you should carry the classification. I understand you to say that you would approve of separate and special treatment of the class of young offenders?—Yes.

1580. Up to what age would you be disposed to carry that?—I think to about 16. I should rather maintain that age.

1581. But not above 16?—No, though perhaps you might do so under very exceptional circumstances.

1582. Would not it be true to say that young offenders, up to say 20 or 21, are more susceptible to influences than older men?—Oh, yes; I take it that they would be, but I think up to 16 with boys, and perhaps a year later with girls, it is far more the case. Girls at 18 and 19, I think, have had their character more or less formed.

1583. Supposing you had a separate prison, a separate place of detention, for young offenders up to, say, 21, in which you could bring special influence to bear and treat them with a special view to reformation, do not you think that by concentrating them in such a place, you have a better opportunity of saving them from a criminal life than when they take a chance among the rough prisoners in the large prisons?—I do not think that is the case at all after 17 or 18.

1584. But then does not that rather mean a state of hopelessness? It means practically abandonment of those very young persons to crime; or at all events a large proportion of them?—I do not think that the influences of prison are so generally contaminating as is generally supposed. That is really why I am guarded in my answer about that. I do not think they are so contaminating as people imagine. Prisoners are kept apart as much as possible, and unless they have an inclination to know their neighbours and to learn more about crime than they have known hitherto, there is really no facility for it.

1585. Look at it from another point of view. You would admit, would you not, that a lad or a girl who goes to prison under the present system, suffers from that stigma for years; possibly for a life. That would be so?—From the stigma perhaps in one way, very much. Their own conscience would give them a stigma to themselves, and probably their immediate relatives; but it is a nine days' wonder, after all, so far as the outside world is concerned and it is soon forgotten. So far as the young criminal is concerned I do not think that afterwards, unless he has a pronounced disposition in that direction, the influence is very great.

1586. Still you would admit the fact of a lad or a girl having been committed to prison for weeks or months must prejudice them, at any rate to a certain extent, through life?—Yes.

1587. If the fact is remembered or if the fact is discovered it might lead to a loss of situation or prevent them from getting a situation?—Certainly, it must prejudice them in starting; but I do not think later on it does. It has caused them to turn aside and to make them lose friends and certain influences at the moment, but afterwards I do not know that it does, because so many have done extremely well eventually.

1588. But on the other hand you find a great many fall back from one cause or another?—I have not the figures here. I wish I had. The fact is I have not been able to go into the matter quite so deeply and thoroughly as I should have liked, but the number of people who come back to prison is relatively very small. Out of those who have been convicted and sent to prison the number coming back is very small. Those who do come back come back very frequently.

1589. Have you worked out the per-centage of re-committals?—No, but I judge from the lists that are furnished to me every day as to that. I have two lists—at least one list divided into two parts—furnished to me. It consists of those who have not been in prison before and those who have been in repeatedly. But supposing we take as an example the number of 30. I find that on the average perhaps six or seven would be absolutely fresh cases, the others not.

1590. I have before me the figures for Holloway. Let us take the men first. Out of 1,105 there are 279 who were re-committed once; then there are 209 who were re-committed twice; 140 who were re-committed three times; 107 who were re-committed four times; 92 who were re-committed five times; 141 who were re-committed six or seven times; 79 who were re-committed eight, nine, or ten times; and 58 who were re-committed over ten times?—And how many for the first time, sir?

1591. These are only re-committals; for the first time it is 279 out of 1,105?—279 out of 1,105 will confirm my estimate.

1592. Then the figures for the women are, that out of a total number of 2,569, the first re-committals are 289. Those re-committed for the second time are 155; those re-committed three times are 116; those re-committed four times are 53; those re-committed five times are 48; those re-committed six or seven times are 367; those re-committed eight, nine, or ten times are 696; and those re-committed over ten times are over 845?—I think those figures rather confirm what I said about one-fifth or one-sixth in number of them having been committed before, but those with come in so repeatedly as regards women are nearly all drunkards.

1593. Taking those figures without reference to the actual per-centage, the numbers are very large; and if one could save from this life of crime, or of continual imprisonment, a proportion of them, it would be worth the effort. Would not you say that it is during the period under 21 years of age that the habits which lead to these continual re-committals are formed?—Yes, and I think the figures with which I furnished you show that.

1594. Then would not it be worth a very special effort to try some new system with a view to laying hold of these young offenders, both boys and girls, and trying to get them out of their criminal habits, and starting them afresh?—I should not at all object to any new system which would bring about that result, but our efforts all round are in that direction at the present time.

1595. But you have not the belief that a special classification in the prison apart, with perhaps special treatment, would be desirable for those over 16?—The subject has not been mentioned to me before, and I have not really thought of it.

1596. You have not really fully considered the matter in this light?—No.

1597. Would you say that imprisonment bears less hardly on the young prisoners than on the old during the time they are in prison?—Do you mean morally or physically?

1598. Both?—I think it bears rather hard upon them physically. I do not think it does morally. I do not think they feel the degradation so much as an older prisoner.

1599. That is what you mean?—Yes. I do not think they feel the degradation so much.

1600. And to that extent prison rather loses its deterrent effect?—I do not think they are quite old enough to estimate fully what is meant by the loss of position.

1601. Then do not these young prisoners, to a considerable extent, rather glory in being associated with the older criminals?—I never found a case of that sort. It is when they get on later that that may occur. If they have come into prison once, and they go out into the world and one comes across them they express themselves in very penitent terms, and speak of the shame and degradation to which they have been subjected while in the prison. I think the day of remorse comes later; and it is a painful day to them, but I do not think the young prisoners feel the degradation so much as the older ones do at the time.

1602. When does the boy's day of remorse come on?—Years afterwards, when they have recovered themselves and got into respectable life, they begin to think of the prison life they have had.

1603. But anything which would induce that day of remorse to come on earlier you would welcome?—Quite; but I do not know how that is to come about save by increased age and experience.

1604. (Sir John Dorington.) You are not inclined to think that the reformatory system could be carried to an older age with advantage. Supposing instead of being limited to 16 you send young offenders to reformatories up to 18, by taking them from the prisons would you recommend that, or would you not?—A great many are kept in the reformatories over that age.

1605. I know that, but that is not my point. At the present moment a magistrate cannot send a boy to a reformatory over 16 years. Do you think it might be advantageous to extend the age to which magistrates might send a young prisoner to a reformatory up to 17, 18, or 19?—They do that with reference to girls in the way of sending them to homes, but otherwise I would not suggest it at all. I do not think it would be beneficial.

1606. On the women's side what is the first-class hard labour for women, which is equivalent to the treadwheel and the crank, and to which they are not subjected after the first month?—Picking oakum.

1607. Picking oakum is the first class hard labour for women?—That is the hardest labour for women.

1608. They do not put them into the washhouse for the first month?—No, but the women would be rather glad to go there.

1609. Oakum picking then is the equivalent to the crank and the treadwheel?—Yes, that is the hardest labour for women. I may mention that there is quite a clamour on the part of the women to go into the laundry. They always cry out that they want to go into the laundry.

1610. You have formed no exact estimate of the number of re-convictions of first offenders. This particular figure which has been given us is about 12 per cent. I see. Every prisoner who is convicted a second time must have been convicted a first time. Therefore in order to find out the persons who come back you must compare the second convictions with the total first convictions. Do you think it is about 12, 15, or 20 per cent.?—About that. That is the average that I gave.

1611. And after second convictions prisoners return in a much larger per-centage?—Yes.

1612. You have noticed that sentences have very much diminished in recent years?—Yes.

1613. Is not that somewhat increasing per-centage (and I think it is an increasing per-centage) of persons re-convicted after they have been a second time convicted partly due to the criminal population being kept in a prison for much shorter sentences?—Yes.

1614. Consequently they present themselves more frequently for conviction?—Yes.

1615. And in that way the number of committals to prison is larger?—Yes.

1616. As to the prisoner with no reformatory treatment at all, would you be at all inclined to advocate longer sentences for those re-convicted prisoners?—Yes.

1617. That is your opinion?—It is my opinion that there should be a cumulative sentence. If a prisoner is not reformed whilst in prison, when he gets his liberty he goes out to prey on society and induces others to do the same, and as a matter of protection to society I should suggest a cumulative sentence after a number of convictions.

1618. Would you go so far as to lay down a rule as to the cumulative sentences to be adopted, that they should be duplicated or triplicated?—Yes, after a certain number of convictions, but I would allow a very large margin. If a prisoner has been convicted ten times, one begins to think that he has made crime his speciality and his vocation, and not only for his sake but for the sake of society I think then a cumulative sentence should be given to him. I think it should be taken out of the hand of the magistrates then.

1619. I suppose you say the shortening of sentences has done a great deal of good so far as regards persons entering upon crime?—Yes.

1620. (Mr. O'Connor.) It has been stated to us that a man feels more than a boy his first imprisonment. Would you say so, too?—I said that just now.

1621. Would you say that the prospects or risk of first imprisonment has a greater deterrent effect upon a man than it has upon a boy, in the average case?—Yes, because I think he appreciates what he will lose, and the shame of the matter, and what he will have to face; whereas a boy does not. It is only a question of moral teaching.

1622. Will you go a little further and say that the deterrent effect of the prospect or risk of imprisonment in the average case is greater with age and less in proportion to the youth of the offender?—Up to a certain point, yes.

1623. Then, would you say that the imprisonment is more valuable as a deterrent for first offences in the case of men over 21, speaking generally, than in the case of boys of 16 and upwards?—Simply on the ground that I mentioned. I fancy that it would be, because a man knows exactly his circumstances, and he knows what he loses by his being imprisoned: but the judgment of the boy is not formed, and beyond the shame of it and what he is told to the effect that it is a most degrading thing, I do not think that he appreciates at all what he is losing by being in prison.

1624. Would your experience lead you to say that of the cases of repeated imprisonment the majority have been first imprisoned before the age of 21?—I should think so; and I should judge rather from the figures that I have furnished you, because the ages under 21 furnish such a large number of criminals, and if you put them in contact with the other figures you will find that is pretty much the case.

Rev. G. P. Merrick.

1625. Would you say that the boy who has been sent to a reformatory has a sense that imprisonment is something a good deal worse or is worse than it really is?—I am not so sure about that. A great many boys who come back from reformatories have entered upon their imprisonment with a great deal of lightness, that is, boys who have been through a course at the reformatory and have afterwards relapsed into crime and have come back to prison.

1626. You are speaking only of those who did come back?—Yes.

1627. Can you speak of those who did not?—No.

1628. What proportion of boys in the reformatory go to prison?—I could not give you that. I have no knowledge of that.

1629. You would say that at any rate the prospect of imprisonment has still a deterrent effect upon a boy who has been in a reformatory?—Yes, but not to such a great extent as one would like to see. I may say this, which is perhaps germane to the question, that boys are extremely reticent about the fact of their having been in a reformatory. When they come into prison a second time they like to conceal it; whether because their names are held up as an example of obloquy, or not, I do not know, but they are reticent about it.

1630. But to go to a reformatory a boy has to graduate through a prison, has he not?—Yes.

1631. Do you think that is a good thing?—I think so. I never could see any objection to it. We have worked upon the boys, and have never found it so.

1632. Then if the deterrent effect is less on the one hand under 21, possibly the moral effect would be worse; would you say that the moral effect of being sent to prison is worse for a boy than it is for a grown-up person?—No; if they are kept apart as they are I do not think so.

1633. I thought you told us that in the case of repeated imprisonment the majority appear to have been of the class committed to prison earlier?—They could not go to prison frequently unless really they had commenced early in life.

1634. What would you say to the suggestion of having the age made of committal to a reformatory higher than it is now?—I should not object to 16, particularly with reference to girls. I find that there are many girls who are put down as 16 that really have not the intelligence and strength of girls of 13 or 14; and, of course, a reformatory for them would be extremely desirable. They are not so precocious in the criminal sense as boys are.

1635. If the reformatory age was raised so that some now sent to prison early were sent to a reformatory instead, would you look for any substantial diminution of the prison population?—Not very much.

1636. From your experience would you make any classification of prisoners according not to the length of their sentences but to their moral obliquity and with regard to the character of the crime committed?—We have done that to a certain extent.

1637. I do not speak of your administration in a particular prison, but as between different prisons?—That which we have done I should like to make the rule generally, because I think it has worked well.

1638. Would you go as far as to propose that for burglary with violence and repeated forgery there should be a more severe system of treatment than for offences of less moral blackness, such as mere smuggling, or anything of that kind?—I think offences with violence, like burglary, or anything of that kind should be visited very severely.

1639. Would you separate them as regards institutions?—No, I should subject them to more severe punishment in the prison; I should not separate them.

1640. I suppose you would attach very great importance to the influence of religion upon prisoners?—Yes.

1641. Upon what class of prisoners do you find that that influence is strongest—on the young or the older prisoner?—On the young. Those who have been immediately subjected to the influence of religion, who have been taught by their parents to say their prayers and repeat hymns, and who have been taught to attend church and go to Sunday-school, one finds have the religious sentiment very strong in them. I had a case yesterday of a man who until recently conducted himself with very great credit, and used to sing in the church choir, and I reminded him of his church obligations and it seemed to affect him very much.

1642. In what period of a long sentence do you think the influence of religion is the strongest—at the beginning, in the middle, or towards the end?—I rather think at the beginning.

1643. You would think from a moral or a religious point of view, that the beginning of a convict's term was the most important?—Yes, you see that they are then smarting from the sense of wrong they have done and are very amenable.

1644. You have some convict prisoners at Holloway? No, only a few women who are sooner or later transferred from Holloway to Wormwood Scrubs.

1645. You have had experience with convict prisons?—Yes; at Wormwood Scrubs we always had about 350 men and about 50 women, perhaps.

1646. I understand that under the present system some of the convict prisoners are sent to local prisons for the first nine months?—Yes, and Wormwood Scrubs answers to a local prison.

1647. In the convict prisons there are chaplains for all are they not?—There is a chaplain for those who are termed Protestants, and a chaplain for those who are Roman Catholics, but if, for instance, there be a great number of Presbyterians, the Presbyterian minister is allowed to come in. Of course the Jews have the Rabbi.

1648. Take the case of the female convicts, where are they; at Woking, are they not?—Yes, that is their final home.

1649. That is exclusively a women's prison?—Yes, and that is the only one; they are going to be removed from there to Aylesbury sooner or later.

1650. Are there chaplains for both denominations there?—Yes.

1651. When they are sent to local prisons the Protestant prisoners have a chaplain, do they not?—Yes.

1652. Does the chaplain give them a service every day?—Yes, that is according to the Standing Orders.

1653. I mean they are under the daily influence of a minister of religion?—Yes; that is to say there are chaplains, and if they asked to see the minister they would do so, because it is not possible for him to see all of them every day.

1654. There is morning prayer every morning?—Yes, but he would not be able to visit every prisoner every day. They can ask to see him.

1655. But there is a church service every day?—Yes.

1656. In the case of the Roman Catholic prisoners is there morning prayer in common in the local prisons?—Not at Holloway. The numbers are so few that the priest comes on certain days which he has appointed.

1657. But there is no church parade every day?—No, but at Wormwood Scrubs there was a daily service.

1658. There was?—Yes.

1659. When?—Every day.

1660. In all the local prisons is that so?—I think it depends upon the numbers and the convenience of the Roman Catholic priest.

1661. But there is not a Roman Catholic priest attached to it?—Yes, there is. There is a Roman Catholic chaplain at Wormwood Scrubs, and there is a daily service at Wormwood Scrubs. The numbers are not enough to make it the case at Holloway, and I do not think they have it there, as the numbers are not very large. I think the number of services depends entirely upon the discretion of the Roman Catholic priest.

1662. But whatever the number of the Protestants who are there, they have a church service every day?—Yes, every day.

1663. And the chaplain sees those who wish to see him?—Yes.

1664. In the convict prisons the Roman Catholic chaplain is appointed just as the Protestant chaplain is?—Yes.

1665. Therefore in the convict prison for the first nine months those who are doing their nine months' probation —— ?—No, pardon me, the nine months' probation is done in the local prison, not in the convict prison.

1666. In some cases is not the nine months' probation done in the convict prison?—No, they are in the prison for a time, for six months, I think, and they are kept prisoners at the first local prison to which they are removed after they are sentenced.

1667. That makes it more serious still, then. For the first nine months, as I understand, during which the ministrations of religion are most important, the Roman Catholic prisoners are sent to local prisons, where, unless they reach a certain number, they do not have daily ministrations?—It depends on the discretion of the Roman Catholic priest. There may be a daily service for all Roman Catholics, but I am speaking of what I do know at Holloway. There was one regularly at Wormwood Scrubs and one at Millbank. At large prisons I think there has been a priest and a service generally. I should not like to answer for the service being daily, but I am under the impression that the rule which prevails at Holloway prevails elsewhere. However, I am open to instruction upon that point.

1668. Have you ever had complaints from prisoners that after they went out of prison and made a bonâ fide attempt to do well they were harassed by the police?—Yes.

1669. And from what you have heard do you attach any importance to that statement—do you think there is any ground for it—do you believe it?—I think there is sometimes ground, but I think, generally speaking, not so. I have questioned the prisoners on the fact, and I think that the police have not been watching them unless they have been associating with their old bad companions, and loafing about the streets, and doing things which suggest to the police that they are not practically earning their living, but are resorting to their old method of living. I, of course, have heard the complaint a thousand times, but it has, I think, to be accepted with a great deal of salt.

1670. Then you said you had caused prisoners who were being contaminated by their surroundings to be removed?—Whom I thought would be contaminated by their surroundings.

1671. Yes; would you mind telling us how you arrive at a conclusion that a particular prisoner under certain circumstances is being contaminated?—Is likely to be contaminated?

1672. Yes, is likely to be contaminated?—I should know who his neighbours were in the prison; I should see in the chapel who his neighbours were, and one of the officers who attends me would say perhaps that that man or that woman was being talked to by another prisoner, and if that was the case he would make a report to me for my own observation and would tell me a little about it. I should act upon that and talk to the prisoner himself or herself.

1673. Does "neighbour" mean juxtaposition with regard to cells?—Yes.

1674. Are those who are in neighbouring cells in juxtaposition at work?—Not at work, but in chapel and at exercise; one may be a carpenter, for instance, working at the carpenter's workshop; another may be working at a loom in his own cell.

1675. Then in church, in cell, and at exercise, the neighbourhood of prisoners is constant?—Yes.

1676. You do not shift them?—You do sometimes; sometimes it is found convenient, for instance, to put all the laundry women together, and it is found convenient to put men employed on the works, as it is termed, together.

1677. Is the cell in prison often changed?—Not often, I think. Some men have the same cell during the whole of their imprisonment, and they get attached to that particular cell.

1678. Briefly, then, you, speaking as an experienced chaplain, would say that it is of the utmost importance to have religious influences brought to bear early during the period of imprisonment?—Yes, I say that for both men and women, most undoubtedly.

1679. (Dr. Bridges.) Then when you speak of prisoners being isolated in their cells, you would not say that the isolation is complete?—No.

1680. Even while they are in their cells there can be a certain amount of communication?—Between whom?

1681. Between the inmate of one cell and the inmate of the next cell?—They do manage to telegraph by knocking a little; but I do not think that the communication is there. I think it is when they are going out to exercise and before they assemble in chapel and after it. I do not think the contamination could take place at any other times unless they were working in association, and then they would be working under supervision, and they would not be able to communicate.

1682. I gathered you said that you thought it sometimes desirable to isolate the inmate of a cell when you knew that the inmates of the two next cells were undesirable companions?—Yes; I meant by "removing him," to put the prisoner into another cell.

1683. That does imply the possibility of some communication between a prisoner and the inmate of the next cell?—Yes.

1684. Then, with regard to the communication in chapel, there is no screen, I think, between individual prisoners in chapel?—No, they are all sitting as in an ordinary church.

1685. And during the service it would be possible for a man to speak to his next door neighbour?—But if he did, the movement of his face would be quite sufficient to expose him and cause him to be reported. The officers would see that. I may say this, that a more orderly congregation during divine service one does not see anywhere than in a prison. Whatever communication takes place takes place when they are standing together.

1686. You mean before they get into their places?—Yes, while they are going into the building and making their way to their seats and sitting down; that is when the communication takes place.

1687. Then the communication would not necessarily be with a man's next door neighbour in chapel but with other persons?—He sits next to his neighbour.

1688. But on going into chapel he might come into contact with others?—He would not have a chance, he would follow in a line, and those beside him would be his immediate neighbours.

1689. The communication takes place while they are in file, walking in or out?—Yes.

1690. So that from what you have said I gather there is a sufficient danger of communication to make it desirable, even in the case of people between the age of say 18 and 25, to move them to another part of the of the prison?—Yes.

1691. Can you insure that these persons between the age of 18 and 25 in so removing may not also be exposed to mischievous communications from other prisoners?—Of course the circumstances are very much the same in both cells, but the neighbours are not; and, therefore, they would not be subject to the contamination.

Rev. C. P Merrick.

1692. When you so remove those older persons, do you classify them according to whether they are first offenders or not—is that your principle of classification?—We generally try to put the first offenders apart, and to keep them apart from the others. One does not, perhaps, exercise the same care with the women between 35 and 40, whose character is formed, and who are not likely to be influenced one way or the other; or with men 50 years of age and upwards. One would not be so particular there, because one would know there would be nothing to gain on the part of the persons who tried to contaminate them, and they would have no interest in the lives of others, their own position in life having been settled.

1693. Let us then suppose that without too great cost and administrative difficulty (I leave that for the moment entirely out of the question) it were possible to provide for these younger first offenders a completely distinct prison. Let us suppose that that could be done; would not the isolation of these persons from the rest be much more complete than it is at present?—Not more complete than it is at Holloway Prison; there we keep them absolutely apart. Nothing could be better than it is there. At Millbank we made them exercise apart, though we need not have done so, and I think to a certain extent the present prison arrangements could effect nearly all that is necessary. That is only from my experience and knowledge of prisons.

1694. I think you said sometimes administrative considerations enter into the way in which the prisoners are grouped. For instance, I think you said that the laundry women were sometimes placed together for the convenience of administration?—Yes.

1695. But these laundry women would be of very different characters, would not they?—They would be a rougher type of women. I do not think there are any first offenders among the laundry women. I would not say so absolutely, but I am under the impression that there is not now a first offender amongst our laundry women. I speak subject to correction in that matter, but I think not.

1696. I suppose that you have seen some rather hardened prisoners of a very young age, have not you?—Yes.

1697. Do you recognise what is sometimes spoken of as "moral insanity," that is to say, do you recognise a certain class who have either no moral sense or in whom the moral sense is very weak indeed?—Yes, undoubtedly. There are some girls at the present time under my control who have no moral sense whatever; none at all.

1698. As far as you know would that be congenital, or would it be the result of surroundings?—I think in one case it is rather the result of surroundings. In the other I can find no other reason for it than that it is congenital. I learnt about the parents that the parents transmitted to the child very weak mental power. In the other case it is a case of the surroundings and training.

1699. I did not quite understand whether you were speaking of two individuals or of two classes?—Of two individuals who will represent the two classes.

1700. You have seen several instances of either class?—Yes, hundreds.

1701. Do you mean you have seen hundreds of persons in whom, as far as you can form a judgment, the defect in moral sense was transmitted to them by parentage?—Yes, undoubtedly, and some from the training which they have received; that is to say, that they have never been taught anything, that they have never been taught to read or write, and that they have never been taught any religious truths, and have never been taught that there was anything right beyond the gratification of their own personal will; there is nothing to appeal to in those cases.

1702. In those persons with whom the criminal disposition was, as far as you can tell, innate or congenital, has your attention been drawn to any physical peculiarities in their cases in the conformation of head or of body?—I have noticed that the head has been very square, the eyes have been small, and they have seemed to possess a lot of cunning and a certain amount of intelligence. They always have large ears a square head, and very small eyes. Their furtive glances are very remarkable; they never look you straight in the face, but the eye always seems to wander about in the most uneasy fashion.

1703. You have, at Holloway, a great number of persons who are sent to the prison as being mentally deficient, in order that they may be kept under observation?—Yes, we have, that is after attempts at suicide, or something of that kind.

1704. Have you not a large number who are sent from the police courts as being suspected of being mentally very feeble?—We get a large number; perhaps not so large a number as you might expect. I could not tell you the figures, but undoubtedly the large majority are sent for attempting to commit suicide, and they are remanded for observation by the doctor and myself.

1705. I mean you have, from your experience of other prisons, a much larger number of those cases at Holloway than you have had at other prisons?—Very much more so.

1706. Out of all those persons a large number are sent, I suppose, to the asylums, are they not?—A great number are.

1707. And some are sent back to the police court?—In many of the cases they are sent back to the police court. The report of the medical officer is such that he could not say that they are insane. But they could not be dealt with otherwise than the law would direct. But they come back eventually, and then they get certified.

1708. With regard to those who are not certified as being fit for asylums, but who remain in the prisons, have you a considerable number of what you would call weak-minded persons?—Not a considerable number, but we have got some few.

1709. Would you say that you had a considerable number who were below the ordinary standard of intelligence?—Probably out of our population at the present time we have about a dozen.

1710. Not more than that?—Not amongst the women.

1711. I am speaking of the women?—Yes, as to the women I can speak more decidedly and correctly about them. I do not think there are more than a dozen. There are about that number, I should think, but not more. They are certainly very weak mentally.

1712. You said also that they were undergrown, I think?—Yes.

1713. And that a girl of 16 in many cases appeared to be not more than 13 or 14?—Yes, but that would have nothing to do with this particular case. I mentioned that I would raise the age of the reformatory limit so that girls might be sent at a later age to a reformatory, because many of them are not developed mentally and physically when they are 16.

1714. You find you have a considerable number of girls who are undergrown and somewhat deficient in development?—Yes, I should think probably a dozen would cover that. One girl is 19 that I am thinking of, and she has been under my care for the last four years; she has been sent to us repeatedly by the magistrate. We have placed her in several homes, and she is not sufficiently insane to be certified, but she is not sufficiently sane to be at liberty; therefore she is in prison.

1715. With regard to those cases with regard to whom you are doubtful whether they should be in asylums or in prisons, what sort of difference is made in their treatment?—They are continuously under the medical officer's observation. We supply them with books, and we do not put them to any labour more than we think they can undertake; and if they do not perform their labours they are not punished, if they are inclined to be flighty, as one girl is who is always running away and running about the place. We have to exercise her alone, so that she shall not disturb the others or cause a quarrel with them.

1716. What sort of employment are they put to in cases of that kind?—This girl does needlework in the cell.

1717. Do you consider that for weak-minded cases of that kind being shut up for a great part of the day in an isolated cell is the best thing for her state of mind?—I would say first of all that in a case of that kind we do not shut them up in the cell, but we get them out as much as possible. We make all kinds of excuses to get them out and give them all kinds of employment. We do not keep them so much in the cell as we should an ordinary prisoner.

1718. And is it not better for a girl like that to do needlework in an associated room rather than in a cell?—In many cases we open the cell door, and the prisoner sees all that is going on. That is quite enough. But if the doctor sees that being shut up in a cell is likely prejudicially to affect the patient's health, the patient is at once removed to the infirmary, or placed under observation, and then employed in any way the prisoner likes.

1719. The doctor has full discretion in all those cases?—Yes, and there is an officer to look after the case nearly all day. The case is submitted to medical observation, and anything at all peculiar is reported to the medical officer.

1720. You have a great number of persons who are sentenced, and who come back frequently?—Yes, a great number.

1721. Supposing those persons are sentenced to a period of seven days they are put upon No. 1 diet, are they not?—Yes.

1722. When you speak of their coming back repeatedly, do you mean that they would come back in the ccurse of six months two or three times?—To-day I have not any doubt there are in the prison 20 people who were discharged on Saturday, and who have been taken up again. Of course I am speaking without my books, and I shall not have my books for this until to-morrow; but I know that some were taken up on Saturday night who were discharged on Saturday morning.

1723. Then with regard to those cases, it would follow, I suppose, that the No. 1 diet was practically either continuous or nearly continuous?—Yes, practically continuous.

1724. Have you ever seen any effects that you think physically undesirable from that cause?—I am a little doubtful about that. I do not object to those who have come in being put on No. 1 diet, because they come in for drunkenness, and I think it does them good. I never heard them complain about it, but if they happen to commit themselves by breaking the prison rules, and are subjected again to a further period of low diet, I think restraints should be put upon them instead of punishing them through their stomachs.

1725. You think the repeated use of the low diet punishment is less desirable than some other form of punishment?—Yes, I think so. It makes them very irritable, and less inclined either to listen to the rules of the prison, or the exhortations of the chaplain. I am afraid I have peculiar views on the subject, and others do not sympathise with those views, but it is just my impression from what I have seen.

1726. I should think your views can hardly be quite peculiar to yourself, because I observe that many of the medical officers put them on a higher scale of diet in consequence of the repeated short sentences. Is that done in Holloway sometimes?—It would be done according to the medical officer's direction. I see when I pass the cells how various the diets are, so that I take it that it is done as liberally as elsewhere.

1727. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I think nearly all the questions I wished to ask you have been asked, but I do wish to ask you one question. Have you any strong view with regard to the desirability of visitors of a certain class coming to prison?—What class do you mean?

1728. We will say of the class that Mrs. Fry was—to influence the prisoners for good?—The circumstances of a person were so different then to what they are now. They were terrible, and Mrs. Fry was sui generis. She was the one Mrs. Fry. I may say I have always been an advocate for the visiting of ladies to the prison, and we always had a staff. We have a staff at Holloway. There was a staff of four at Wormwood Scrubs, and a staff of five at Millbank, but I never found that the result was commensurate with what one supposed would be the result. I do not think that up to the present time I can say that they have gained cases that were not gained otherwise for reformatory purposes, but they have helped in strengthening one's hands. There are an immense number of ladies who are extremely good and gentle and nice whose influence would be beneficial to the prisoners, but they have not the tact which is requisite, and it is just an office to which people want to be born. I do not think they can be made to it, and out of the number of lady visitors I have had I cannot say, though they may be extremely useful and desirous of doing good, that they have ever rendered me much assistance.

1729. But you would not discourage it?—No. If the chaplain really does his work, and if he has got an able schoolmistress or an able agent in the place to help him, I do not think there is much work for a lady visitor.

1730. I would not confine you entirely to lady visitors, but men of the class that are now called missionaries?—I have yet to learn that outside help of that kind renders any benefit to us. We have strangers coming in, clergymen sometimes, to see prisoners and I always allow it; and also friends interested in the case of prisoners; but we do not find the influence of those visits is worthy of notice at all. They do not know how to deal with cases which really require a special training. We throw open our doors to every lady who comes, and are only too glad to do it. I want my hands strengthened, but honestly I cannot say that outside help is worth much.

1731. I suppose there is no person in the gaol who comes more constantly in contact with the officials, as well as the prisoners, than you do?—No.

1732. It is a part of your duty by the rules, is it not, to at once report any abuse or impropriety coming from where it will?—Yes.

1733. And a part of your duty also would be to enter it in the Journal?—Yes.

1734. Do you find that you have had many cases where you have had to report abuse or impropriety on the part of anybody?—No.

1735. And you think the work of the staff is satisfactory?—Yes, of course in a large staff there would be some who would not be faithful and good servants, and who would be foolish and indiscreet, but taking the staff as a staff I have nothing to say but that which is to their credit.

1736. And you are very seldom called upon to report any abuse or impropriety?—Anything like gross abuse or impropriety is not seen at all. It is only a trivial matter, which is contrary to the discipline, and I have drawn attention to it when it has occurred.

1737. (Miss Orme.) I think you said that the women are more apt to commit prison offences than the men?—Yes.

1738. You are aware that the statistics show that in the whole prison population it is just the other way?—Yes.

1739. Then it is peculiar to those prisons which you have been in?—I take it that there is a great deal of latitude allowed to the women. They lose their tempers, and I think it is remembered in their favour that they have behaved very well before, and if they are very industrious it is not registered as a prison offence.

Rev. G. P. Merrick.

17 July 1894.

1740. So that the statistics really do not give us the facts?—No; with men it is different. With men there is no latitude at all allowed.

1741. Among the offences in Holloway, is a frequent one connected with the picking of oakum and stuffing it into the ventilators?—It means they have not done their work, and they do that to hide the oakum they have not picked.

1742. Picking oakum is not at all popular with them?—No.

1743. Have you ever recommended that something else should be given them; for instance, sack making or some simple work of that kind?—Yes.

1744. Is it at all adopted now?—It cannot be. The trade unions outside so interfere with prison labour that we cannot do it.

1745. For instance, you are aware they are making sacks at Wormwood Scrubs now?—Yes.

1746. Why could not they be done in the same way?—We do it so far as the order is given to us.

1747. You have no associated work for the women in Holloway?—Yes, in the laundry.

1748. But beyond that you have none?—The cook-house.

1749. In your past experience in other prisons, have not you found that withdrawing the women from the associated work is the best punishment for any disorderly conduct?—No.

1750. It does not affect them?—I would not say it is the best punishment, as I do not think it has affected them very much.

1751. You do not feel the want of that much at Holloway?—Neither did we at Millbank, nor at Wormwood Scrubs.

1752. Amongst the female convicts you have at Holloway, how many are there, who could do associated work under prison regulations, if it were there to do?—We have not any convicts; we have only two now waiting for discharge, and I think one or two convicts to go on to Wormwood Scrubs. They are a different class of person. They are not the ordinary local offender.

1753. But how many women have you at Holloway who could work in an associated room, if you had the opportunity. Supposing, for instance, you had a large workroom?—A hundred.

1754. And they are working in their cells because there is no associated workroom where they could work?—I should think the number there who could work in association is a hundred, and that would include those now working in the laundry and in the cook-house

1755. I want to know how many are working separately in their cells who might work together if you had a large workroom?—I think half our number. Before I answer that question really, I must know the sentence. I do not know, for instance, how many we have now who are under sentence of 14 days.

1756. But approximately you would say there are several who might be in an associated workroom if you had it?—Yes.

1757. Have you ever recommended the establishment of a room of that sort?—No.

1758. Do not you think it would have a good moral effect on these women?—No.

1759. You would be opposed to it?—Well, I have seen so much reason to object to it. At Wormwood Scrubs, where the supervision is admirable and the officers are good, useful officers, I have seen conversation between women which I know is of an extremely hurtful character. To-day, before I came down, I had to settle a case with a woman who was placed in association, and four very rough characters were waiting from the East End to take her away. We shall discharge her to-day, but if her mother does not come for her, I am going to send an officer down to Reading with her, and save that.

1760. Then it is your opinion that you have at Holloway as much association as is wanted for the moral good of the women?—I cannot go so far as to say that it is a moral good for the women to work in association. They have not ever said they wanted it themselves. I may say neither women nor men have asked to work in association. They have asked to work outside the cell. They do not like the monotony and irksomeness of the cell, but if you give them intelligent labour, so long as they are outside the cell they are satisfied.

1761. I thought you said they clamoured to go into the laundry?—That takes them out of the cell.

1762. That is what I call working in association?—They would be glad to work in the laundry, if it only consisted of one tub.

1763. You do not think it is for working together they desire it?—No. I may say it is not my opinion, but it is the testimony of fact that I have heard hundreds of women say they did not like to work in association. Many women have said that they have come to prison because they did not like the workhouse, as in the workhouse they said they heard a good deal of bad language, and one of the advantages of the prison was that they were kept from hearing bad language and the quarrelsome people they met in the workhouse.

1764. (Chairman.) There are just one or two points I should like to put to you. Have you any view upon the classes from which it is desirable to select warders?—I think that the more educated the warders are the better it is. For instance, taking the women, those who have been pupil teachers and governesses are far better than others. They have moral influence, they understand the meaning of discipline, and they have greater influence over prisoners than those who have occupied other posts in life. With the men warders in the same way I would like to get superior men. I would like them of a better social status; but I find the men who are better educated, and who have occupied a better position in life, are better warders than those who have nothing better than their moral character, which has been excellent, to recommend them.

1765. How do the warders who have been in the army compare with the civilian warders?—That depends very much upon circumstances. I have not drawn any distinction that way. I have had warders who have been sergeant-majors in the army, and I have had some who have been schoolmasters, and I have found them better than those who have been taken from the ranks. The better intelligence the man has got, the better educated he has been, the better warder he has been.

1766. Of course the character of the warder is of immense importance with regard to the prisoner?—Of very great importance.

1767. Do you think that the hours of warders and prison matrons are not too long?—I think they are rather long. The work is extremely trying.

1768. Have you observed that working the hours they do has a prejudicial effect upon the warders or the matrons?—I think it has in the direction of what I may call their spirits, and so on. It makes them depressed, and makes them, perhaps, in many cases not so zealous as they might otherwise be; but I think the performance of their duty is untouched by that.

1769. Are you speaking specially of the warders or of the matrons now, or of both?—Of both. It affects the matrons more. I think their spirits are more depressed by a long stay on duty.

1770. Do you think they get sufficient holidays or intervals away from the prison?—I think if the hours could be reduced in any way it would be better for them. I do not think it is the going away so much.

1771. With regard to what you said in connexion with classification you limited yourself with regard to separate treatment to offenders under 16, but you would be disposed to extend that separate and special treatment to first offenders under a certain age?—To a certain extent we have always done so. That has always been done.

1772. Therefore, with regard to the first offenders, you would be prepared to approve of a system which kept them in a different prison, possibly with a different treatment?—Yes. Some reference must be made to their antecedents, because sometimes a first offender is an extremely bad offender. Discretion must come in there.

1773. In your experience have you found, more particularly with regard to women, that after repeated offences against prison discipline they can really do the matrons and the authorities and obtain a certain relaxation of treatment?—That depends very much upon the strength of mind of the matron. I have seen matrons and prisoners in antagonism, and I have sometimes seen a prisoner gain the point, and sometimes the matrons gain it, but I think, in a large prison, in a place like Wormwood Scrubs, or Holloway, that is not the case. Where in a small prison female labour is very much valued, I think that sometimes the prisoner has the benefit.

1774. It was said, I think, by Sir Joshua Jebb, that "male convicts must be treated in masses rather "than according to their individual character. In- "dividuality must be more regarded with female "convicts." Do you agree with that?—Yes, I think I should lay that down as a general rule all the way through.

1775. Have you observed any special effects of isolated, associated, and unproductive labour upon the prisoners?—They express themselves very strongly in a large number of cases. They do not mind what the labour is, but they would like the labour to be that which involves an exercise of their minds as well as their hands.

1776. Do they express themselves in particular against the unproductive labour?—Yes, it is not that which taxes them physically at all; but it is unproductive, and it does not demand any exercise of intelligence on their part.

1777. Still, would they draw any distinction between the unproductive crank and the water or corn mill?—No.

1778. You would be all in favour of giving them employment which would exercise their mind?—Yes, I think that would be beneficial in many ways.

1779. And I gather from what you said that you strongly disapprove of the cessation of the prison industries, such as mat-making?—Yes.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Miles Joseph Walker called and examined.

1780. (Chairman.) You are the governor of Liverpool Prison?—I am.

1781. How long have you filled that post?—At Liverpool since the 23rd of December last.

1782. Where were you before?—At Preston.

1783. You were governor at Preston for how long?—For three and a half years.

1784. And before that?—I was at Leicester for eleven years.

1785. As governor?—Yes.

1786. And before that?—I was at Norwich.

1787. In what capacity?—As governor.

1788. Have you ever been in any other position except that of governor?—Yes, I started as a warder at Coldbath Fields; and then I was deputy governor at Worcester; then I was governor at Cambridge; and then I became governor at Norwich.

1789. You have had considerable experience in different parts of the country?—Yes.

1790. Were you appointed under the county?—Yes.

1791. Where were you when the change took place?—At Norwich Castle.

1792. May I ask you at the outset whether you think that change has operated well?—Yes, I think so.

1793. In all respects?—Well, I may say so, certainly. Of course, I am an old county man, and one sticks to one's old efforts.

1794. But you think that, both with regard to economy and the discipline of prisons, and the effect of the present treatment of prisoners, the results of that transfer have all been satisfactory?—Yes, they have.

1795. With regard to association cells, do you approve of Rule 26, which enables the prison authorities to associate not less than three prisoners upon the advice of the medical officer?—Yes; but I think an officer must be put with them.

1796. You do not approve of putting three or more prisoners together, and putting them alone in their cells?—I do not, without an officer is with them.

1797. An officer should be present?—Yes, the object of association should be where one, at all events, of the three, if not the whole, are liable to fits, or something of that sort. Therefore, there ought to be an officer with them, to see that he is properly attended to if he has a fit in the day or night time.

1798. In point of behaviour or discipline, do you think it is desirable that there should be a warder with them?—Always where there is association. I do not think I should have association without a warder. In the first place, it would prevent contamination. One of the three might be worse than the other two, and he might contaminate them by his language, and so on. The presence of the officer stops that.

1799. Then so far as your own experience is concerned, have the associated prisoners always had an officer put with them?—Yes; we do not associate in Liverpool much; the doctor does not. We have observation cells, and the prisoners are put in those cells mostly, and an officer is always outside day and night with the trap down, so that he can see them every minute nearly.

1800. Do I understand these are association cells?—No, I say we rarely associate in Liverpool. They are in a corridor, but there is a great means of observation, and there is a special officer who constantly patrols in front of those day and night.

1801. You would not approve then of any practice in the prison by which three or more prisoners were associated, even on the recommendation of the medical officer, unless there was a warder present?—I think it is better to put a warder with them.

1802. Have you any special view upon the present practice under which a prison with more than 700 is to have a deputy governor?—I have not got a deputy governor myself, and I have got over 1,000.

1803. Then you have a deputy governor?—No, I have not.

1804. When you are away, who is in charge?—The chief warder.

1805. And is your average 1,000?—Yes, and over 1,000.

1806. Does that include both men and women?—Yes.

1807. What is the proportion?—Well, the women are between 300 and 400, and the men are about 700.

1808. Do they ever rise above 700?—Yes, always, or nearly always.

1809. They are always over 700?—Yes, we are a little over 1,000. I have had 1,100 odd in the prison, and then the proportion was about 740 to 400, as far as one's memory carries one.

Mr. M. J. Walker.

17 July 1894.

1810. Who acts under you with regard to women prisoners?—The matron.

1811. The head matron?—Yes, the matron. We have a matron, chief warder, and so on, on the female side.

1812. Does the matron then stand much in the same position as the deputy governor?—No, she only takes charge of the female prisoners, but under my direction entirely.

1813. Does it ever happen that both you and the matron are away at the same time?—It never has within my memory, but such a thing would be possible.

1814. Then who would have charge of the women prisoners?—The chief warder of the female prison, under the direction, of course, of the chief warder of the male side, who would be in charge of the whole prison.

1815. Do you find that, according to your ideas of prison management, you can deal adequately with 1,000 or more prisoners?—I think I can. I have no complaints.

1816. At the same time you cannot get the same personal acquaintance with the prisoners that you would make if you had a less number to deal with?—Undoubtedly that is so.

1817. And it follows that if you had a deputy governor you and he would be able between you to have a more complete supervision of the prisoners passing through the prison?—The chief warder acts as deputy governor; he does exactly what a deputy governor would do.

1818. Without the pay?—Without the pay.

1819. Do you know of any other case of a prison with so large a number of prisoners in which there is no deputy governor?—Yes, at Strangeways, my adjoining prison.

1820. In Strangeways was the proportion between men and women much the same as it is in Liverpool?—I think so; perhaps there are 50 or 60 women more there on the average, but we are practically the same; we do not vary much.

1821. With regard to Liverpool, what is your average daily number of men?—In the last year for which that return is based, I think it was 985.

1822. Of men?—No.

1823. The total number?—I am afraid I must consult my book. There are 660 men and 324 women, but we are a little higher than we were then. It is on page 52 of the 16th Report of the Commissioners.

1824. 660 men and 324 women is the average?—That is the average up to the date when this report was made. I see Strangeways was 1,061 last year; that was made up as follows, 741 and 320.

1825. Do you think the rule is advisable by which, where there are over 700 male prisoners there should be a deputy governor?—Assuming that you have a good chief warder, I should say that answers every purpose. I am very well satisfied at present. I have got a very efficient chief warder, a very good man indeed.

1826. Then with regard to the practice of appointing a chief warder to the charge of a prison with less than 100 prisoners, do you agree with that practice?—No.

1827. Why not?—I think I ought to qualify my answer somewhat, and say, "No, unless you get a good man."

1828. But perhaps you will think that you cannot always get a man who is of a perfect stamp?—I am afraid that is so.

1829. How would you meet that difficulty?—By raising the tone of the service and getting better men into it.

1830. But meanwhile would you propose to alter the rule and fix a lower number, say 50, prisoners of which he should be in charge?—Yes, that would be a very good step in the right direction, certainly.

1831. In what particular way do you think the chief warders are deficient?—In education very often, and in tact.

1832. Do you find from your own experience that they have difficulty in hitting it off with their colleagues, the chaplain and the medical officer?—I think there is a little jealousy between them. There might be. The chaplain is a gentleman; the chief warder is not, probably.

1833. You do not think the present system is altogether satisfactory?—Not in that respect, except you get a good man.

1834. Are you quite satisfied with the present rules regarding visits to prisoners and communications with them, and letters?—Convicted or unconvicted?

1835. Convicted?—Yes. The stage system operates very well, and that regulates the visits and letters.

1836. You think that the rules are not too hard and fast?—I think you might relax them a little.

1837. You would agree that anything that tended to raise the mind of a prisoner would be desirable?—Undoubtedly.

1838. And that if he could get mental or moral good from receiving a visit, or receiving or writing a letter, it would be desirable to give him that facility?—Unquestionably.

1839. At the same time I suppose you would find it useful to have a definite rule?—Yes, and to work through the stage. The stage system induces men to go on better.

1840. Would you like increased discretionary power as governor to grant leave for interviews, or writing and receiving letters?—Yes.

1841. You would?—Certainly.

1842. Do you think the governors have not sufficient discretionary power now?—I think not.

1843. Would you be disposed then to modify the present arrangements?—Yes, in that way.

1844. What is your system with regard to representatives from the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society?—The chaplain acts as the secretary of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, and the magistrates as a body the visiting committee, deal with all the cases that are recommended to them. They come before them, and they see them sometimes at their own instance. In other cases on the recommendation of the chaplain, either Protestant or Roman Catholic, whichever it may be.

1845. I see by the Commissioners' Report that there is only one society attached to Liverpool?—That is so.

1846. The total number aided in 1892–3 was 581?—Yes.

1847. Out of what number would that be?—From 20,000 to 22,000, I should think. I am speaking from memory, but our receptions are from 20,000 to 22,000 a year.

1848. Would that include re-committals?—That is the total admission during the year.

1849. Then it would include re-committals?—Certainly.

1850. Does 581 strike you as a large number aided out of the total number you receive?—No, it does not, but that is in a great measure regulated, as I have before stated, by the two clergymen and by the prisoners themselves upon their applications.

1851. Let us take the case of the Salvation Army, which has got a prison rescue society wherever they have got their organisation at work. Would they have any status in seeing a prisoner before release?—They would be allowed to do so if they made the application; but I should state that in addition to this Prisoners' Aid Society, which we have working, so to speak, inside the prison, there is also a society just outside the doors of the prison, where they have a mission room, and meet the prisoners every morning when they go out.

1852. What society would that be?—It is the Church of England Temperance Society, I think, but the mission branch of it. It is a very large affair at Liverpool.

1853. I rather understand that the duty of deciding on this question really rests on the chaplain?—The chaplain and the prisoners themselves, because everybody who wishes to see the visiting justices have their names put down to go before the society, and they see them each time they come.

1854. The prisoner is not supplied with a list of the societies?—No, but a notice is put up in his cell to say that he can see the visiting justices if he wants any assistance from the society.

1855. Then he makes his application to the visiting justices?—He makes his application to the warder, and his name is put on the list, and each prisoner is taken before the visiting justices singly.

1856. Do you see any objection to allowing each prisoner to see, if he wished to see it, a list of societies or agencies which are willing and anxious to help prisoners?—None whatever. It is a very good thing to do, I think.

1857. Now with regard to the prison offences and punishments. To what extent do you take evidence from prisoners?—Fully, entirely. I always thresh everything right out. I take it that you mean if a prisoner says he has another prisoner to corroborate him I send for the other prisoner, undoubtedly I do.

1858. Would you send for that other prisoner and take his evidence?—Undoubtedly; and the same remark would apply with respect to officers. If a prisoner denied what one officer said and another officer was present, I would send for the officer and thresh it out.

1859. Would you examine him in the presence of the accused party?—Undoubtedly, before the officers who make the report.

1860. You hold practically a judicial inquiry?—I do, in every case.

1861. And if you think that any prisoners can give evidence, would you call them?—Undoubtedly, in every instance.

1862. Are you satisfied with the present arrangements with regard to prison punishments?—In what respect?

1863. Do you think that the system of regulating prison punishments, as a rule, works well?—Yes; but I should like to see a little more discretion given to the governors—not to intensify the punishment at all.

1864. But in the way of relaxation?—Yes.

1865. I think one of the standing orders is that the Prison Commissioners say that "experience seems "to show that lighter punishments succeed"?—They do in some cases.

1866. "Experience shows that discipline is not "better maintained by resorting to severe punish-"ments, which should be reserved for use when "milder means have been tried"?—That is so. That is quite true.

1867. They go on to say at the end: "The Com-"missioners will look with satisfaction on any efforts "the governors may make to reduce the amount of "prison punishment, while at the same time pro-"moting industry and maintaining the discipline of "the prison." You quite agree with those remarks?—Yes, and adopt them.

1868. Do you approve of flogging?—I do not approve of it per se, but I think we must have it as a deterrent. It is only adopted in very few cases when everything else has failed.

1869. Do you think, as a rule, visiting justices punish with discretion?—With very great leniency in Liverpool, and always with discretion in every prison I have had to deal with. They are always very careful in investigating these matters.

1870. And you personally would not be inclined to differ with the sentences they have passed?—No, I think not.

1871. We had a proposal from a witness last week to substitute the handcuffing of female prisoners as a prison punishment in lieu of putting them upon dietary punishment. Would you approve of that?—Certainly I would. I do not like punishing women with dietary punishment at all, if one can help it, and with the very bad characters one gets in Liverpool I think handcuffing is a very good thing. It does not do them any harm, and it is a great deterrent, because one removes them as soon as possible; that is, as soon as they express their sorrow, or anything of that sort.

1872. Then how long would you keep them handcuffed?—Not many hours; a day perhaps.

1873. A day at the outside?—Yes. They nearly all come round in that time.

1874. Why do you object to dietary punishment?—The women, as a rule, are a low class, and I do not think they can stand much dietary punishment. They feed badly outside, and some of them are not in the best of health, and therefore I do not think you ought to pinch them too much.

1875. It reduces their stamina too much?—Of course in time it would. Of course the surgeon watches them very carefully, and we never punish anyone until he has certified in writing beforehand that they are fit for it.

1876. I suppose you say with regard to the discipline of the prison a great deal depends upon the governor?—Largely it does.

1877. Could you say in which prison with which you have been connected you have had the greatest difficulty in maintaining satisfactory discipline?—I have had no difficulty anywhere.

1878. But have you noticed a difference in the class of prisoners in different counties?—Yes.

1879. Are not some more amenable than others?—Undoubtedly. For example, the class of prisoners you get at Preston are very indolent, and the class of prisoners you get in the Liverpool female prison are mostly very ignorant. They are mostly women who sell oranges or matches, or newspapers, or who sell lemons, or fish, and they do not work. Therefore they are indisposed to work in prison.

1880. In Norwich you would have an agricultural population?—Yes, they work very well there.

1881. Would you say on the whole they were a more orderly kind of prisoner?—In the sense, that they work more.

1882. But are not more amenable to discipline than, for instance, the Liverpool prisoners?—Yes, I think so, especially amongst the females. The old hands amongst the females at Liverpool are not at all amenable to discipline.

1883. You have nothing to say with regard to the mark system?—I think it is a very good system.

1884. It works very well?—It works very well indeed.

1885. Would you be in favour of applying the practice now in use in convict prisons by which prisoners can earn a remission—would you apply that to local prisons?—No, because the sentences now passed are very short.

1886. Take the case of a sentence of 18 months or two years?—They are very rarely passed now.

1887. And you would not be in favour of enabling a prisoner in a local prison to earn remission?—No, I think not, because the sentences nowadays are too short.

1888. Do you think that military warders are as satisfactory as warders who are taken from the civilian classes?—No.

1889. You prefer civilians?—Of course some military warders are very good; but I think, speaking as a whole, I would rather have civilians.

1890. Is that because taking the average they are better educated?—Well, they understand civil life more.

1891. Would you say that the difference is at all marked?—In some cases, certainly.

1892. It is conceivable [that the army may make a man more efficient as a warder?—It may. On the other hand it may not.

Mr. M. J. Walker.

17 July 1894.

1893. You think you get a better average from the civilian classes?—That is my experience.

1894. With regard to the hours of the men and women warders, do you think they are about the right thing?—They are very fair indeed now.

1895. You do not think there is any danger of undue strain upon them?—I think not now. They get a great deal of liberty as compared with bygone days.

1896. They are longer hours than would be worked by the police?—They are, but a policeman is always upon his feet and a warder does have relaxation in that respect. He is not exposed to weather as the policeman is. As a rule he is inside a building which in the summer is cooled and in the winter is warmed.

1897. On the other hand there must be a considerable strain from the constant succession of prisoners under his charge, and from the nature of his occupation?—Yes.

1898. And less variety than in the case of the policeman?—Yes, that is so.

1899. And at any rate there are some parts of the year in which it is pleasanter to be outside in the streets than inside the prison?—Undoubtedly.

1900. However, you do not think there is any real reason for complaint?—There is no real reason now, I think, for complaint. Of course if we could get a little less hours for them it would be a very good thing for the men themselves, only it would require an increase of the staff to do that.

1901. What proportion of your prisoners are put to work on associated labour?—Not a large proportion.

1902. Have you a workshop attached to your prison?—Yes, a number of workshops.

1903. And how many men can be employed in those workshops?—That depends on the men we get fit for the work; sometimes a larger number, sometimes a less. For instance, if we have not got a carpenter we cannot put any to work at carpentering. We teach some of the long-termers as much as we can in the time, if we can find a handy man to instruct.

1904. But do you think it is desirable to have that class of work?—I think it is a very proper thing under proper supervision.

1905. Given the proper supervision, you would employ in associated labour as many prisoners as you could?—Undoubtedly.

1906. You do not think that serious evils are to be apprehended from communication?—There are no evils at all to be apprehended if you have proper supervision.

1907. Still, of course, the nature of the work necessitates communications between prisoners?—Very lightly.

1908. Two men working at a forge, for instance?—But if an officer is standing there they will not speak.

1909. But you cannot put an officer to every two men?—No, but we should have more than two.

1910. But assuming the supervision is adequate youare in favour of extending it?—Yes.

1911. Are you in favour of maintaining the use of he unproductive crank?—No.

1912. You do not approve of it?—No.

1913. For what reason?—Because it is unproductive; I think they might be put to something more productive.

1914. Do you think it has a bad effect on the mind of the prisoner also?—Undoubtedly, to think they are working for no good has a bad effect upon them.

1915. Do you draw a distinction between a prisoner working on an unproductive crank and a prisoner working on a mill?—Yes, undoubtedly in some minds.

1916 You would be in favour of the abolition of the unproductive crank altogether?—Yes.

1917. I assume that you disapprove of the change under which mat making and other industries have been withdrawn from the prison?—Oh, no, not at all, because other work could be easily found for them.

1918. Then you may be in the happy position to be able to supply the work at your prison?—No, but I have no doubt by proper inquiries some other work could be produced; for instance, in Liverpool, we have discovered an industry of making sacks.

1919. For whom?—For the Bootle Jute factory. A question was asked about that in the House of Commons the other day.

1920. Is not there a strong opposition from the union concerned in that industry?—I am not aware of that.

1921. You are aware there has been a very strong opposition against mat making?—Yes. I have no doubt there is an opposition to this Bootle Jute Factory, but the price we get is very small, and the work is work you could put nearly everybody to, and it does not affect many people outside if we do not do it.

1922. At any rate you are strongly in favour of finding adequate industrial employment for the prisoners under your charge?—Yes.

1923. Do you allow prisoners to read as much as they can without of course interfering with their prison duties and prison labour?—Certainly.

1924. With how many books do you supply prisoners?—With one at a time. You are speaking of reading books; not of devotional books.

1925. No, I am speaking of reading books?—One at a time, and when that is done the schoolmaster will change it.

1926. As soon as the prisoner has read it?—Say one for three days and another for three days, with educated prisoners.

1927. You do not make a hard and fast rule of say one a week?—That depends on the prisoner and the size of the book. Some prisoners are more highly educated than others and read the books faster, but once a week is the rule.

1928. If a prisoner wants a book, as soon as he has done with one he has another?—Yes, upon application.

1929. Have you made any observations on the mental condition of prisoners of late years. Have you seen any increase of insanity?—No; on the contrary I think in my experience we have very few insane cases in prison, and those are immediately dealt with by the surgeon, who is very careful about them.

1930. And they mostly develop soon after admission?—Directly after admission as a rule.

1931. You have not observed that prison life has any tendency to develop insanity?—No, rarely. I do not remember a case. I can believe it possible in the case of some weak minds, but I have not observed any.

1932. Are you in favour of any different classification of prisoners?—In what respect?

1933. More particularly with regard to young offenders and first offenders?—They are kept entirely by themselves.

1934. Young offenders under 16?—Yes.

1935. I am speaking now of prisoners from 17 to 21?—It would be a very good thing to adopt a rule with regard to first offenders.

1936. Would you say that young prisoners are more amenable to efforts for their reformation than older prisoners?—Undoubtedly.

1937. At the same time you find very often very hardened criminals under 21?—Yes, sometimes.

1938. As bad a class of prisoners as any you have?—Yes, sometimes.

1939. Would you be in favour of treating young offenders and first offenders as a class apart in a different building?—I think they ought to be kept away from the others for fear of contamination.

1940. By the present system you cannot carry that beyond a certain point?—No; but there is very little contamination now.

1941. And you have got to apply the same treatment to the young offender that you do to old and hardened offenders?—You are speaking of between 16 and 21?

1942. Yes?—Yes; below 16 they are kept entirely distinct.

1943. Is not it desirable that these young offenders should be kept as a class apart, with special supervision and special treatment in many particulars, from the ordinary prison discipline, in order to win them from habitual criminal tendencies?—Undoubtedly that would be a very good thing to do.

1944. Has it been your experience that great danger to young prisoners in particular arises through recognition outside the prison by older and more hardened offenders?—Well, that is sometimes the case no doubt. I have heard of that.

1945. And these younger men get pulled back into crime?—They do occasionally, undoubtedly through the bad influence of others.

1946. That would be one bad result of associating prisoners together according to the present system?—That is so.

1947. If they were kept apart so that old offenders could never get to know by sight the younger men, it would not matter if they met outside?—No, they would not know them.

1948. So that there would be no danger of undue influences?—No.

1949. You see no objection then, except perhaps on the ground of finance, of setting up a different class of prisoners?—None whatever.

1950. I suppose you would admit that between the ages of 17 and 19 there seems to be a strong tendency to crime, if a lad or a girl, as the case may be, has been in bad surroundings?—Yes, that is the time.

1951. That is the critical time?—Yes, it is a very critical time.

1952. And if you treat these young girls or lads in the same way as you treat incorrigible offenders there will be a very great danger of their slipping out of hand altogether and falling back into crime?—Yes, they do as a rule.

Adjourned for a short time.

1953. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You said that the change from the old system to the new has been advantageous. What change took place in Norwich in 1878?—I left there very shortly after the prisons came into the hands of the Crown.

1954. You did not bridge over the change?—Just and only just.

1955. Then you really cannot say?—No.

1956. You do not know whether the dietary was altered?—It was, I am sure of that; the dietary then used at Norwich was not the same as that used now.

1957. Was it more or less generous?—I cannot say off-hand.

1958. Then I will not ask you any question on that point. In Liverpool you said prisoners requiring the help of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society always go before the visiting justices?—Yes, assuming the visiting justices know when they are in prison: otherwise the chaplain, or the priest, or I, in consultation with the chaplain, carry out their wishes, as the case may be, and then we put it before the visiting committee at their next visit, and they endorse what we have done.

1959. The visiting justices are not the only mode; but the two chaplains and the governor act in the absence of the visiting justices?—Yes, there is in addition the "Prisoners' Aid Mission" outside; they are all met when they go out and taken in to breakfast.

1960. On your first statement I rather gathered that the visiting justices were the only means of assisting them, but that is not so?—No. They endorse what we do; so that it must absolutely go through them at the end.

1961. It is their fund, I suppose?—Yes, it is their fund; they and their friends subscribe to it.

1962. It is not a prison charity?—Not at all.

1963. With regard to the discipline over the women, you object to dietary punishments?—Yes.

1964. I see you had only five cases of women in irons during the last year; which, I suppose, means handcuffs?—It does.

1965. You must have a good many more punishments to inflict upon the women of some sort than five in the course of the year?—You mean to put them in irons?

1966. No, not to put them in irons?—Yes, a great many more than that.

1967. It has been suggested to us that irons, that is to say handcuffs, would be a better punishment for the more ordinary offences that women commit than anything else?—I agree with that, because it would then prevent the dietary punishment.

1968. In fact, although it is called "irons" it is not a very severe punishment, and would be a better punishment than some of those that are adopted?—Yes, better than dietary punishments.

1969. You agree to that?—I do.

1970. I suppose if that were the case you would rather like an alteration in your rules, so that you should not be obliged to enter it in the serious way you do now?—I should not object to entering it if it were approved.

1971. But you probably would have to enter that there were 300 women put in irons during the course of the year?—I should not object to that at all.

1972. It might convey the idea that your prison was in a bad state of discipline?—But on examination it would show that it was not, and the dietary punishments would sink in the same proportion.

1973. It would lead to misapprehension in the public mind?—That could be dispelled, because the duration of being in irons is not long.

1974. Your dietary punishments are enumerated now, I think?—Yes, all punishments are enumerated.

1975. You said your sentences were very short?—Yes.

1976. But you have a proportion of sentences exceeding three and four months?—Yes.

1977. As there is now no practical difference between a sentence of penal servitude and a sentence of imprisonment, both being carried out by the same staff which forms part of the general prison staff, and as there is a system of remission for penal servitude, might not you have a system of remission in your local prisons in respect of sentences of imprisonment?—I qualified that, and said that the disposition of the age was to pass very short sentences, and the sentences being short, I did not think you could reduce them. Supposing a sentence was long, for instance, two years, which is equivalent to three years' penal servitude, it might perhaps be an inducement.

1978. You think it might possibly be a good scheme for sentences exceeding four months or six months that a similar remission should take place in those sentences to what is effected in the case of penal servitude?—With much longer sentences than that.

1979. At what period would you commence remission?—It is rather difficult to define that.

1980. I have mentioned four months as perhaps marking a distinction between a short sentence and a long sentence?—Quite so.

1981. But what I would ask you is, at what point you would be inclined to commence a period of remission of the sentence?—It is rather difficult to answer that; but certainly, speaking off-hand, I do not think a remission ought to operate on a sentence of much less than 12 months.

1982. Is there no reason why such a distinction should be made as is now made between a sentence of penal servitude of three years and a sentence of imprisonment for two years?—No.

1983. A sentence of penal servitude of three years means, for a well-conducted prisoner, two years and three months?—Certainly.

1984. Well, the sentence of imprisonment for two years means two years neither more nor less?—Exactly.

1985. In your experience with regard to the discipline of prisons, and also in respect to producing an effect on the character of the prisoner, might the system of remission, which is now given to penal servitude prisoners, be extended to long sentences of imprisonment?—Yes, I should think it might; but I say, as a rule, the long-sentence prisoner does not require any inducement held out to him to conduct himself well in the hope of remission. As a rule, a long-sentenced male prisoner is a very well-conducted person. If that is what you mean by the remission you propose to give him, you give him remission to induce him to be well-conducted in prison. That, I take, to be your object.

1986. That would not be my sole object?—But that would be one object which would enter largely into your idea.

1987. At the present moment you have a system of marks?—Yes.

1988. What purpose do you mean to arrive at by your mark system? Is not it an inducement to your prisoner to behave well?—One very large reason is an inducement to him to work well and to be industrious, and to gain an amount of money which will assist him when he comes out of prison to tide over a few days, or a week or so until he can get employment.

1989. Of course this is simply a question of opinion; I am asking you as an expert whether you think the system of remission now applied to penal servitude might not be applied under similar conditions to sentences of imprisonment?—I have said so.

1990. Which would save the cost of some imprisonment?—Undoubtedly it would have that effect.

1991. But you are not prepared to mention a period at which it should commence?—No, it requires thought.

1992. It is clearly not applicable to sentences of a month?—No, that is what I want you to understand, that I do not think it would be applicable to short sentences at all. Therefore, the thing to determine is at what period this ought to begin. Of course I should call a sentence of 12 months a long sentence.

1993. At the present moment you would be rather inclined to say that for sentences exceeding 12 months some system of remission might be adopted?—That is it; that is the substance of my view.

1994. With regard to imprisonment of boys, do you get many boys imprisoned in Liverpool for three months?—No, very few; we have very few boys in at all for anything.

1995. Your average of boys between 12 and 16 is apparently 20?—Yes, and that is very low for a large population.

1996. Are those mostly for 10 days or six weeks?—Not for six weeks; very rarely for that time.

1997. They are all short sentences?—Yes, of days. It does not go into months at all; it is either seven or 14 days as a rule; say even less than that. We have a great many two or three day sentences in Liverpool.

1998. Could you suggest any other mode of dealing with those boys than sending them to prison?—Yes, birch-rods.

1999. The law does not permit that now?—It does in certain cases.

2000. But in the majority of cases it does not?—No, but it might be extended with great advantage, I think.

2001. As to boys who are in the habit of being beaten at home—and I am afraid that is the case with a great many of these boys—would a birch be desirable for them?—I think so; I think it would have a deterrent effect.

2002. You think they are not so habituated to being beaten but that the being beaten officially would be useful?—That is it; it is the official beating, I suppose, that makes the difference.

2003. You would hardly say that no boy should be sent to prison, and that whipping should be used in all cases?—I do not think the magistrates are inclined to send boys to prison now without trying every means they have at their disposal, and they let them off a good deal, I believe, before they send them to prison at all.

2004. They only send them to prison as a last resource?—Yes, that is so.

2005. Do you think any harm is done to boys by coming to prison?—No, I do not think there is, because they are kept by themselves.

2006. Do you think any good is done?—Yes, I think it has a deterrent effect upon some minds, not on others.

2007. Are boys of 15 or 16 frightened at it?—No; smaller boys sometimes are.

2008. They do not like it, you think?—No, I do not think they do; they do not like it at all.

2009. I suppose it is rather the purpose of imprisonment, is it not, that they should not like it?—Yes, some boys having begun go on, but in a great many instances they never come again.

2010. That leads me to another point; of all classes of all ages that come to you for the first time do you think any large proportion return again?—Yes, undoubtedly.

2011. Of those who come a first time?—Yes, and come again.

2012. Is there any large proportion?—Yes, a good large proportion, I think.

2013. Ten per cent?—I could not say offhand; but a good large proportion.

2014. Of those who have come a second time or a third time a very large proportion return again?—Yes, a large proportion.

2015. A good part of the population of your prison is composed of persons who are repeatedly convicted?—Yes, that is very much the case in Liverpool.

2016. Do you think, with regard to those classes, any different treatment could be adopted than what is now adopted?—I am afraid I have not thought that out.

2017. Longer sentences so as to prevent the opportunity of crime recurring so frequently?—That is the only thing you can do; it prevents them from having the opportunity to do wrong.

2018. You would not express an opinion on that?—I cannot. Long sentences would prevent a man having the chance of doing wrong again, that is all.

2019. Your boys are allowed no communication, of course, with the adults?—No, nor yet with one another.

2020. Could a section of the prison be specially apportioned to boys with advantage?—No, I think not. It would want structural arrangements and alterations.

2021. A boys' prison, as it were?—We used to have it years ago. Of course it could be done by structural arrangements.

2022. Would it be advantageous?—Undoubtedly it would, because then you would isolate them completely.

2023. You think a boys' prison might be useful?—Undoubtedly.

2024. In fact by building off one of your wings it might be done?—Yes, shutting it off, and telling off a special staff to look after them.

2025. Do you think that would be advantageous?—Yes, that would isolate them completely.

2026. With your young offenders, those over 16 and under 20, do you think that the reformatory treatment might be extended to those ages?—Yes, with advantage.

2027. You think up to 18 the experiment might be tried?—Yes, even as far as 19, because that is the time they are rather apt to lapse into crime.

2028. If the Reformatory Act was extended so as to allow sentences to a reformatory to be passed for those ages, that would be useful?—Yes.

2029. (Mr. O'Connor.) The chief warder who is fortunate enough to be under you is an exceptionally good officer, is not he?—Yes.

2030. Is he a civilian?—Yes.

2031. He might be entrusted with a prison as chief warder in charge?—He might.

2032. Or even as deputy governor?—Never as deputy governor. We have never had one promoted from chief warder yet.

2033. He is such a man as might be entrusted with the duties of deputy governor?—Yes.

2034. He is acting for you now?—He is doing the work.

2035. Is your experience of chief warders generally such that you would take them to act for deputy governors?—No, it is not.

2036. Even in small prisons of 100?—Yes, my remark applies to them too.

2038. And he is a good administrator?—Yes, but one can hardly say what sort of a man he might turn out when left to himself.

2039. When you go on your holiday is he in charge?—Yes.

2040. How long does that last?—Probably a month.

2041. I suppose that where there is a governor alone without such a chief warder as you have, the sense of sustained responsibility is very great, is it not?—Upon the chief warder?

2042. No, upon the governor?—Undoubtedly. You always have the responsibility when you are on leave, even when you have a good man, but of course there is a greater comfort in knowing you have a good man as compared with a man who is somewhat weak.

2043. Is there any limit which you would lay down for the size of a prison in point of number of prisoners?—No, my view is that there ought to be a governor in every prison.

2045. Then you would not lay down any maximum, assuming it were a well-conducted prison?—No, not within 100 or 200.

2046. Would you say 2,000?—No.

2047. Or 3,000?—No.

2048. Would you put it as low as 1,500?—No; I should not go above that. You want to keep in touch with your prisoners.

2049. For 1,500 you would require a deputy governor?—Yes.

2050. And if you had not such a chief warder as you have, would you consider that the 1,000 that you have in charge would justify or require a deputy governor to assist you?—Well, you must have adequate assistance either from a deputy governor or from a chief warder; either one or the other.

2051. What staff have you?—Somewhere about 100 in round figures, really 106.

2052. Then you have a rather larger proportion of staff than in most prisons?—I am quite speaking from memory. You mean the disciplinary staff, but I include everybody. I have 53 male warders, &c., nine principal warders, a chief warder, and 10 clerks, including the storekeeper. Then I have a compounder.

2053. I mean your disciplinary staff?—There are more than that, but not what is absolutely described as disciplinary. Those are principal warders and chief warder. In addition to that we have a compounder, a night nurse, &c.

2054. How many female warders have you?—24 female warders, a chief warder, a principal warder, and a matron.

2055. I notice that the total number of your prison population was males 10,441, and females 8,829. That is about 19,000 or 20,000 in a year?—Yes.

2056. But your average population is only 657 males and 320 females, so that the average sentence would be some 16 days for males and about three weeks for females?—I did not know that. I know it is very low.

2057. Then you have a very rapidly flowing stream of people passing through your prison?—Very.

2058. Under those circumstances, do you find that your staff is in all respects adequate?—Yes, I think so. We have had it increased of late somewhat.

2059. The more rapid the stream the more you want?—Yes; the greater the pressure upon the staff the greater the necessity for increasing it somewhat.

2060. What do you do about Saturday half holidays? Have your men that privilege?—Every other one.

2061. What time do they go off?—At dinner time, at a quarter-past 12.

2062. Do they all get away at a quarter-past 12, or are some of them kept until 1 or 2?—No. Those that are off go at that time.

2063. Do they have evening work every third day?—No, about one night in six.

2064. And do you have Sunday exercise for the prisoners?—No.

2065. The prisoners have no exercise on a Sunday?—None.

2066. Why?—We have not got the staff to do it, and we have not got the time. We have to have four services, because the Catholic chapel is the Protestant chapel, and the Protestant chapel is the Catholic chapel.

2067. But they have no exercise?—None whatever.

2068. But you say this is because you have not sufficient staff?—And because we have not sufficient time as well. It is both.

2069. Do the services last longer than the labour asts in the week time?—About the same time.

2070. Then, in point of time on Sundays, it is the same as in the week time?—Yes; I am speaking of the morning service. Then we have an afternoon service.

2071. Four in the morning and four in the evening?—No, two in the morning and two in the evening, and it takes a long time to get them into chapel and out of chapel also.

2072. Is not there just as much time, as far as the 24 hours go, for exercise on the Sunday?—Yes, but those in for the night must have two hours' duty off in the afternoon. Half the staff is away every Sunday.

2073. Because you have only half the staff on Sunday you have not time for exercise?—Exactly.

2074. And the reason you do not have exercise on Sunday is that your staff is not adequate?—Exactly. That is so.

2075. I notice that you have children from 12 to 16—20 males and 3 females in the year, or rather on the 31st of March 1893, that was the number. Do you think it is a good thing to send children under 16 to prison?—I do not think it is a good thing to send any children to prison at all, if it can be avoided.

2076. And between 16 and 21 you had 121 males and 39 females?—An average of that, or total numbers?

2077. That is the absolute number on the 31st of March?—Just so.

2078. Thirty-nine females under 21?—Yes, a good many.

2079. Do you find that prisoners are very much as the rest of men, and that they will behave very well if they are treated properly, and will be restive if they are not?—That is so, especially with respect to males; but, as I have before remarked, my remark does not apply to females.

2080. I do not understand you?—With respect to males, if they are treated well they behave very well—I am speaking generally—but a certain number of females, old offenders, will not behave well at all.

Mr. M. J. Walker.

17 July 1894.

2081. But the generality of them?—Undoubtedly that is so.

2082. Have you any reason to suspect, in your experience, that needless regulations create offences?—No, I do not think I have.

2083. When these people are brought in and put upon No. 1 diet and get out of spirits and ill-tempered, I suppose they are very liable to be irritated sometimes by warders?—Yes, I think one generally hears of that.

2084. A judicious warder will probably have to report prisoners less often than one who is less judicious?—Certainly.

2085. It is not always the fault of the prisoner where there is a report?—No.

2086. And you, as I think you have told us, will accept the testimony of another prisoner?—Undoubtedly. The investigation must be complete.

2087. Prisoners are not all bad?—Oh dear, no.

2088. Perhaps there is as much weakness as badness in some of them?—In some cases undoubtedly.

2089. Are you inclined to think that if the general administration of prisons was made less severe for the generality of prisoners there might be a beneficial result?—The regulations are not severe now. Assuming the class you are dealing with, for well-conducted prisoners the regulations are not very severe upon them now. You might ameliorate their condition by allowing them to see their friends a little oftener.

2091. What proportion of long-sentence prisoners have you now?—I cannot tell you the proportion.

2092. Is it a small number?—Yes.

2093. Have you any penal servitude prisoners?—No, we send them away in a few days.

2094. You would not approve of having penal servitude prisoners in your local prison for the probationary nine months?—At any rate I have none. I had them in the Midlands, and, speaking generally, they were a very well-behaved body.

2095. (Dr. Bridges.) How do you employ the boys under 16?—At some cellular employment, mostly picking oakum. In Preston we had cotton picked.

2096. The boys in prison are, for the most part, I suppose, on very short sentences?—On very short sentences; for days as a rule.

2097. Therefore it would be impossible to employ them in any other way?—I think so for such a short time.

2099. Could not you employ a somewhat larger number in digging?—The ground is cultivated now up to the hilt.

2100. About how many men are employed at one time on that?—About a dozen.

2101. I am speaking of your average?—The average would be much lower, but in certain seasons it would require more. For instance, recently the weeds have been growing very fast, and the potatoes want hoeing; but when that is done there is nothing to do, and they must go away.

2102. For what class of prisoners do you use outdoor labour?—For that labour only?

2103. Digging labour?—Yes.

2104. For what class do you use that; are they first offenders, or are they any particular class?—No, they are no particular class. They are people who get into the stages, and are available to go out.

2105. Is it regarded as a privilege or otherwise?—Yes, undoubtedly it is.

2106. It is regarded as light labour?—Yes, as light labour, and as a privilege, because they get work out of their cells.

2107. Have you remarked whether or not it has a good or bad effect upon their health?—Well, their health is very closely watched by the doctor, and if he saw anybody going down hill at all, he would perhaps recommend outdoor labour for them, and they would go to it.

2108. You would consider outdoor labour was more invigorating than indoor?—Undoubtedly.

2109. Do you think it might be used to a somewhat larger extent than it is used at present?—With more ground, undoubtedly it might.

2111. How many of that class do you think, supposing you had ground available for the purpose, might be employed properly in digging?—A great number.

2112. That is a kind of labour which would not be resisted by trades unions outside?—No, it would not be.

2113. Because it could not compete in any way with their labour?—Not at all. Of course you would require large grounds for the purpose.

2114. Would you require a great increase of staff for that purpose?—Well, I was just going to say that—unless you enclosed your ground. Then you would require an increased staff, but not so large as at Dartmoor or Portland.

2115. Supposing the ground were enclosed you would require an increase in staff?—Yes, but not so large as if the ground was open.

2116. Can you at all estimate what proportionate increase of staff would be required for that?—That must depend on the number of people employed upon it.

2117. One warder, for instance, could superintend how many prisoners?—Well, I think one warder ought not to superintend more than about a dozen at the outside, because they would be put in rows a little apart and so dig the ground or till it, or whatever was required.

2120. How do you estimate that?—The work would have to be done in the prison, such as cleaning, inspecting, and looking at cells. Whether the men were in or out of their cells we should have to get that done.

2121. I am supposing that such an employment as this was substituted for oakum-picking. Supposing you had 100 people taken away from oakum-picking and put to outdoor labour, could you at all say what increase of warders that would require?—Not offhand, but the warder in the building who has, we will say, 30 or 40 prisoners picking oakum under his charge, would have 30 or 40 prisoners in the cell. If you took him away from the cell, and put him to outdoor labour he would not be able to manage 30 or 40 prisoners, because inside he has got them each one in a cell.

2122. And you think one warder in outdoor labour, such as I have been speaking of, could supervise about a dozen?—Yes, about a dozen he could supervise with efficiency.

2123. You have a great many prisoners who are in and out cases?—Yes, a great number.

2124. Who are in one week and in again the next?—Yes, that is very probable.

2125. Those prisoners are as a matter of course on admission put upon No. 1 diet, are they not?—Yes.

2126. I will call your attention to the last quarterly report for September sent by your medical officer, which would be, I think, just before your appointment at Liverpool?—Yes.

2127. From this report it appears that in that quarter 129 prisoners were put upon extra diet for various reasons, amongst which were "repeated short sentences"?—Yes.

2128. That, I suppose, still goes on?—Yes, very largely.

2129. So that the No. 1 diet has to be repeatedly modified?—It has.

2130. On account of that class of case?—Yes, that is so; the surgeon invariably puts them on a higher class when they come in that way; he almost invariably raises their diet.

2131. Has it ever struck you that No. 1 diet requires modification?—I think it does, and the surgeon invariably does it.

2132. I am speaking generally, apart from any particular case the medical officer may deal with?—Yes, I think it is quite low enough.

2135. You have had experience, I think, at Norwich?—Yes.

2136. Was there any difference between the Norwich prisoners and those of Liverpool in respect of that stir-about dinner?—Yes I think they ate it more frequently there than they do here.

2137. More frequently at Norwich?—Yes.

2138. The dinner is made, I understand, of equal parts of oatmeal and Indian meal?—That is so.

2140. Then the complaint was a well-founded one?—Undoubtedly, only it occurred before my time.

2141. Another complaint was that the cells were sometimes filled with a noxious vapour from the heating apparatus?—That was so, I understand, but that has been remedied.

2142. That has not occurred since your time?—No, but I believe it was so. The apparatus was somewhat wrong, but it has been remedied, I understand.

2143. (Mr. De Rutzen.) What cell accommodation have you got at Liverpool?—Off-hand I cannot say, but I should say about 1,300 accommodation total of all sorts. I am speaking purely from memory.

2144. Have you ever found any pressure as to finding room on any particular occasion?—Never since I have been there. I think there has been such a thing before.

2145. You have heard of that?—I think there has been such a thing, but it has not occurred in my time.

2146. Would cases of prisoners who are undergoing the nine months' probation previously to going to penal servitude be sent away from Liverpool?—on the order of the Commissioners.

2147. But is that due to the want of room at Liverpool?—I do not know that, but it is the custom to have what they call Receiving Prisons or Collecting Prisons. In Leicester I was the Receiver of Convicts for Nottingham, Derby, and Lincoln, and my own county of Rutland.

2148. But you have heard there was pressure prior to your going there, though since you have been there there has been none?—No.

2149. But you have heard there was some difficulty about accommodating them on occasions?—Yes, when I was at Preston, I believe, I got an order from Liverpool to receive some prisoners, so that that would indicate it.

2150. Is there any prison in connexion with Liverpool where they could send any surplus prisoners to?—No. Of course the Commissioners could transfer them anywhere, but there is no other prison in Liverpool. We have closed Kirkdale.

2151. You have had great experience, having been the governor of so many prisons, would there be any difficulty, as Sir John Dorington was just saying, in enclosing off a part of the prison if it were deemed advisable that it should be made a prison for some particular class? Is there any prison that you have been in where there would be any difficulty in doing that? Structurally, of course, it might require alteration?—Leicester, perhaps, might have been the exception, because there really would not have been the room.

2152. But it would not take more room?—It would have to be built over it.

2153. With the exception of Leicester in the many prisons you have been at there would be no difficulty?—None whatever.

2155. At Leicester there would not be much difficulty, would there?—Not much, I think, by pulling down some buildings that are not wanted.

2156. If it were really considered necessary it would not be difficult?—No, the only thing is you want as much air as you can get, and by putting other buildings in there you are rather confining your space; it is only in that sense I speak of it; the grounds happen to be small, and with no chance of extension.

2157. (Miss Orme.) Do you approve, generally speaking, of associated work for women?—Under proper and adequate supervision, yes.

2158. You have no form of outdoor work for women at all?—None whatever.

2159. What do you find are the favourite occupations?—Whitewashing.

2160. Not amongst women?—Yes, it is; they love it.

2161. And cooking?—They do not cook; it is all cooked on the male side.

2162. And do you employ them in the laundry?—Yes.

2163. Have you any other trades or handicrafts you teach them?—Knitting and making up clothes for themselves and other prisoners; we do that largely. We have recently made mail bags.

2164. But do women make those?—Yes, some of them do.

2165. Do you take the advice of any persons conducting those homes to which women go as to what sort of work would be useful to them when they come out?—Do you mean the persons conducting the homes.

2166. I mean have you received any suggestions from outside as to the best lines on which to teach them?—No.

2167. You judge entirely for yourself?—Under the lines laid down by the Commissioners.

2168. What on the whole have you found the best kind of employment for them?—I think on the whole the best employment is knitting, which seems to be a very favourite employment of theirs—I wish we could make it more extensive—and making clothes.

2169. Do any of them pick oakum?—Yes, a good many.

2170. You said you had a large number of receptions in one year; what would be the largest number on the women's side in one day?—That I cannot say; I had 144 total on one day, but I should say probably of that the women would be about 60 and the men the remaining 80.

2171. Do they come in late in the day?—From 4 to 6 is our big receiving time; we are a long way from Liverpool, and the vans take a long while to come up.

2172. Then your matron will come on duty at 5 minutes past 6 in the morning, I presume?—Yes, sometimes.

2173. How long will she be at work on a heavy day like that?—I could not say.

2174. But about?—She would not be done before 8 I should think.

2175. Eight o'clock in the evening?—Yes, the women are classed and put away, but she has got her writing to do. She would not be on duty the whole of the afternoon; she might go to her house, but she and the chief warder would do it. She is a very active woman.

2176 Do most of your warders live at the prison or outside?—I think 12 live in quarters outside, but the others live in the angles.

2177. Do they take their share in the night duty?—There is no night duty. Do you mean off night duty?

2178. I mean in the female corridors?—After 10?

2179. Yes?—No we have no officer on the female side. Every cell has an electrical arrangement to it and in the guard room two female warders sleep. If a prisoner rings the bell it rings an electric bell where they are sleeping.

2180. And they would get up and go to answer it?—Yes.

2181. Do the females who live outside take their share of that?—Yes, they take turn about.

2183. But some of them live outside the prison altogether?—Outside the building, but inside the prison walls.

2184. They none of them go home then?—No, there are quarters in the prison, but not outside the ground.

2185. Then none of them go home?—No.

2186. Do you happen to remember whether your matron is in the habit of taking her full holiday; does she go away for her full six weeks?—I cannot say. I have not been there long enough.

2187. Do you know much of the head female warder who is under her, who would be in charge when she went away?—Yes.

2188. Is she a competent woman?—Yes.

2189. A sort of woman that would enable the matron to go away comfortably?—I think so.

2190. But you have been there only a few months?—That is all.

2192. Does that mean that when a man, from no fault of his own falls ill, he is penalised through not being able to receive marks?—That is so. He does not get them. We mark his card "S" instead of 6 or 8, as the case may be.

2193. Then in the case of a man who is physically infirm, or whose constitution is so delicate that he is constantly in the infirmary, does not that man stand at a disadvantage with regard to the others?—In what respect?

2194. In the earning of marks?—He does not get any money, but if at the time he would have got his full marks if he were well, we should allow him the same privileges undoubtedly. We should allow him his visits and his letters.

2195. Then he would not be under any disadvantage?—Not in that respect; but when he goes out he would not get his 10*s.*, because he would not have earned any marks, and in that sense he would lose.

2196. Do I understand that where a man goes in the hospital because he is very weak you consider what marks he has earned and make an allowance on that basis in respect of the time during which he has been in the hospital?—Always.

2197. So that there is no inequality in the earning of marks as between a strong man and a delicate man? No.

2198. The only disadvantage being in regard to the earning of money?—Yes; he would get his visits and his letters at the same time as the man who was physically fit and who earned his full marks.

2199. Then it goes on to say "A prisoner who has "earned no marks during the week is not to receive "marks on Sunday"?—That is so.

2200. Prisoners do earn marks on Sunday?—Yes, if they have earned them all the week; and of course the "S" would be continued for the Sunday.

2201. If a man was ill the whole week it would be the same?—Yes, he would get "S" on Sunday.

2202. Then he would get no marks during the week?—No, that is so.

2203. (Mr. O'Connor.) I should like to ask one question with regard to the violence of certain prisoners. I see that in 1893 you had 63 cases of violence amongst the males, 61 cases of violence amongst the females. How do you deal with cases of violence?—That was before my time.

2204. It was in 1893; but how do you deal with them at present?—We have to deal with each case on its merits.

2205. What is the punishment for violence?—Bread and water. In the case of males you can flog for it, if it is repeated, but that is a matter for the visiting justices. If the cases are bad ones we take them to the visiting justices, and they use their discretion.

2206. The governor is limited to dietary punishments?—Yes.

2207. You do not use punishment cells at all?—I have not done so.

2208. I notice that for these 63 cases of violence irons were used only twice and corporal punishment six times to males. Then all the other cases of violence would be dealt with under dietary punishment?—I suppose so.

2209. Now, of the 61 cases of females charged with violence, five were dealt with by irons; that is to say there were five cases of violence amongst females against two amongst the males, which shows a smaller number of cases of violence with the males?—Yes, that is so.

2210. Who recommends the punishments on the female side?—Nobody.

2211. When the visiting committee comes, I suppose the governor would have an important voice in the matter?—No. He would take them before the committee.

2212. I mean as to the treatment which is required in the particular case?—If they asked me I should very likely tell them what I thought; but they really go on their own lines.

2213. In the case of females you would perhaps be scarcely so well acquainted with them as with the others?—The same would apply. I should be there to give assistance.

2214. And would the matron and chief warder make any suggestions?—No; she would not be present probably.

2215. Then the visiting committee would prescribe the use of those irons without seeing the matron?—Probably. Probably the matron might not be there at all. If she was not required to give evidence she need not be there at all. At all events she would go out while the committee were considering their decision. She would leave the room.

2216. I understood you to say probably the matron would not be there?—No, she need not be there unless she was a witness against a prisoner. She might come, because she happened to be matron and head of the female prison, but if her evidence was not required she need not be there.

2217. In your experience would a visiting committee take the opinion of the matron before prescribing the use of irons?—No, I do not think they would. They might ask her questions with a view of getting out facts, but I do not think they would. They would be more disposed to take the opinion of the governor.

2218. And the doctor?—The doctor certifies. Therefore they always ask the doctor.

2219. (Chairman.) You said in answer to a question I put to you that on the whole you thought the effect of the transference under the Prisons Act of 1877 was beneficial?—Yes.

2220. From your experience were there great inequalities with regard to prison treatment as between one prisoner and another?—No doubt that was so.

2221. Was it a fact that a prisoner very often used to ask whether he was over the boundary, so that he might avoid Leicester and go into Derby?—That is so. So I have heard. I believe that is common knowledge.

2222. From your own experience do you recall any striking instances of difference in treatment?—Well, in some of the small prisons in this way: the prisoners being low in number must get easier work, I mean outside work, as against a prison with a larger number. Suppose it was a prison with 12 (there were lots of prisons with only 12, years ago) then the whole of that 12 would be required to keep the prison in order, and there would be more pleasant occupation than if a prison contained 1,000 and only 30 of them were allowed out. So that that made the thing unequal.

2223. Was not there considerable difference in the way of discipline and treatment?—Yes, some had cranks, some had no cranks. Some had treadwheels, some had no treadwheels. Then the dietaries were all different. Each county had its own dietary; each borough had its own dietary. All of which were approved by the Home Secretary; but still they were all different. Some two or three, perhaps, might be alike.

2225. That was peculiar to Leicester?—No, I think one or two other prisons in England did the same, but it was done in very few, and it was very rigidly carried out in Leicester, I think.

2226. And you think it advantageous that all those variations in the treatment should be reduced to order?—Yes, undoubtedly.

2227. Have you observed any difference in the discharge of the duties of visiting justices since the passing of the Act of 1877?—Yes, undoubtedly. They do not visit so frequently, nor have they got the same interest in their work; and their powers are very materially modified.

2228. But while that may be taken as a fact, and perhaps as a disadvantage from some points of view, yet there are compensations in the better arrangements for the general management of the prison?—Yes, but I should like the local arrangements maintained, if one could do it as well.

2229. You would not desire to go back to the old system?—No, but I would like to give the magistrates more power.

2230. More power with regard to the administration?—Administration and financial dealings. Such things, I think, might be referred to them, which now have to come to London, and they might have some power in the matter. They have local knowledge, and you can frequently more readily explain a thing to a man verbally than you can in writing.

2231. But still, in connexion with finance, they would have to act under the direction of the Treasury?—Yes.

2232. You mean they should have a better locus standi for the purpose of making recommendations?—That is so.

2233. And do you think they should have full power with regard to discipline?—They have got fairly good powers now.

2234. Would you give them extended powers in any other direction?—With respect to the appointment of officers, warders, and so on.

2235. Would you give them a power to nominate, subject to the approval of the Commissioners?—Something in that direction.

2236. Not an out and out power?—Well, I am afraid that could not be done in Government Departments, but it seems to me desirable, at all events, that local people should know something about the people they are going to employ.

2238. Then when warders are appointed you have to report in the first instance upon all applications?—Yes, on all that come to me; but the warder I get may not necessarily come to me with his application; he may have applied at Birmingham, for instance. A man applies to the service generally. He applies to any prison he likes in the neighbourhood where he lives. He makes his application in writing, and he produces certain testimonials to the governor where he applies.

2239. But you would receive a certain number of of applications?—Yes, undoubtedly for the service generally; not for my own prison.

2240. Then you would inquire into those applications?—They produce a number of testimonials and we deal with them. Then a man is nominated and the Civil Service Commissioners make their inquiries.

2241. Subsequent to that the name of the man goes before the Commissioners?—Yes.

2242. And they may or may not appoint him?—Exactly.

2243. The fact of his having got through his Civil Service examination does not necessarily carry an appointment?—No.

2244. It only qualifies him?—That is all.

2245. Then the Commissioners make the appointment and send the men wherever they think fit?—That is it.

2246. Then your duty is simply clerical. You just receive a man's papers and send them on with any observations you wish to make?—Yes, that is it.

2247. For instance, you would give a description of a man physically?—I describe whether he is smart or not. The doctor, of course, would deal with him if he had any physical deformity, but if a man looked a heavy sort of man, one would simply say, "Does not seem very smart," for instance, if he answered your questions badly.

2248. Do you make any inquiries as to character?—No, I only look at those which are produced. They have to produce written characters covering the period to which the paper alludes. That is all.

The proceedings were adjourned until Tuesday, 24th July, at 12 o'clock.

FIFTH DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Tuesday, 24th July 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN).

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.
Sir JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
RICHARD BURDON HALDANE, Esq., Q.C., M.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.; and
Miss ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Supt. G. E. Smith.

24 July 1894.

Superintendent GEORGE EDWARD SMITH called and examined.

2249. (Chairman.) You are a superintendent of the Metropolitan Police?—Yes.

2250. And you have been some time in that position?—Yes, some years.

2251. At present are you engaged at Scotland Yard?—No, at Vine Street. I am in charge of the C division.

2252. You are acquainted with the returns which I have in my hand, which is "Police Form No. 7"?—Yes.

2253. I should like to know, first, what is the meaning of "habitual criminals"?—It is persons who have been more than once convicted of crime, and who are known to be getting their living by dishonest means.

2254. So that conviction is necessary to the definition of "habitual criminals"?—I think so. As defining an "habitual criminal," that certainly he would have to be convicted more than once.

2255. But suppose the case of a man or a lad who was known by the police to be engaged in crime, but who had not been detected and sentenced, would not he be an habitual criminal?—No, not a criminal, certainly.

2256. That is to say, a man cannot be called a criminal until he has been convicted?—That is my idea of the thing, that a man should not be called a criminal unless he has been convicted of some crime.

2257. But if such a person was once convicted then he would be called an "habitual criminal"?—No, not once. For instance, we might have a boy convicted of stealing apples, or something of that kind, but you would not call him an "habitual criminal," because he had been convicted once.

2258. Supposing you had reason to know, without having legal proof of it, that a man had been engaged in crime—for instance, in robbery and thieving—and then at last he were caught and convicted, would you or would you not call him an "habitual criminal"?—If a man had been engaged in crime for a considerable time before he had been detected and convicted, and then after his release from prison we came to know that he still continued in the commission of crime, I should term him an "habitual criminal" from previous knowledge of him before his conviction, his antecedents before, and his mode of living afterwards.

2259. Then in addition to your knowledge that before conviction he has been engaged in crime, you want also the knowledge that after release he reverts also to crime?—Yes.

2260. And then you would have a full blown "habitual criminal"?—A man habitually engaged in crime and having been convicted.

2261. Then with regard to the Return H., "Number of suspected persons at large," I suppose there is greater difficulty in really defining a "suspected person"?—Are you alluding to the first part of the column as regards the person?

2262. No, I am alluding to the heading of the third schedule. "Number of suspected persons at large"; what is a "suspected person"?—A person whom you have just described now as one that we know to be engaged in nefarious business, and getting his living by dishonest means; but this other column is the persons who have been convicted, and whom we know to be habitually connected with crime. The form here deals more with the houses that we know of and suspect.

2263. I see, "habitually engaged in crime"?—Yes.

2264. But those men under that heading have not been convicted?—Yes, they have been convicted.

2265. What are "other suspected persons"?—Persons who are not guilty of felony, but guilty of misdemeanour of other descriptions—persons who by fraud and other means commit crime.

2266. Then can you give us the totals for the last year under these headings?—No, I cannot. I do not know whether it has been supplied. I do not think the Return has been compiled for the year.

2267. We have them, of course, in the Return?—I do not think they have been compiled for the year yet.

2268. I see that in the Return H. there is a column headed "Numbers under 60 years of age"; that is included in columns 1 to 5?—Yes.

2269. You do not remember the numbers in that column?—No, I do not. I have not seen the Return for the year.

2270. Have you formed any opinion as to the effect of imprisonment on young offenders?—No, it has not been very prominent to my mind. I have not considered the thing much. As far as the prison discipline is concerned we have nothing to do with it.

2271. No; but from your experience with these young prisoners—young offenders—who go to prison, do you think they come out as a rule better or worse? Do you think they give you more difficulty after they have come out of prison than before?—No, I do not think they give us any more trouble. In many cases, of course, it has the desired effect, but those that are trained to habitually give their minds to nefarious habits of course it does make very little improvement upon.

2272. Have you any opinion as to how the older habitual criminals are manufactured?—No.

2273. Do you think it is because in prison they meet with men worse than themselves?—No, I do not think so.

2274. Then how is it a young man or a lad who goes to prison at an early age becomes an habitual criminal? Is it entirely from inherent bad nature and the effect of bad surroundings?—I think that is so.

2275. Do you think that when a man or a lad comes out of prison with some idea of leading a reformed life he is often drawn back again by meeting men that he had become acquainted with in prison?—

No, I do not think so. I think it is more, perhaps, the difficulty, possibly, of getting honest employment.

2276. Then in that case the effect of the imprisonment on a young offender is extremely severe; is not that so?—Well, that is the prison discipline, which I know nothing of.

2277. But I mean in this way, that quite apart from prison discipline the effect of sending a lad to prison stands in his way of getting honest employment afterwards?—Undoubtedly it is damaging to his prospects.

2278. So that the effect of that imprisonment, it may be for one month, or it may be for six months, interferes with him in the condition of his life?—He is heavier handicapped, of course, than the honest boy who has not been to prison.

2279. Do you think that the habitual criminal class is increasing or not?—Of course that could only be gathered from the statistics that are published. I have a short return about the juveniles, I think. I have a Return of the persons for the year that have been arrested, twice, three times, or four times.

2280. Perhaps you will hand that in?—You will get it in the official form as soon as the Police Returns are compiled.

2281. The Metropolitan Police Report?—Yes.

2282. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Over what area does this Return which you have handed in go; is it the Metropolitan area?—Yes, the whole of the Metropolitan Police area.

2283. (Chairman.) It is the Police Return?—Yes, it is already in the form of a return as far as the previous six years go. It is only the last year which has been put in in manuscript.

2284. Do you think that these younger men, whom you look upon either as "suspected persons" or "habitual offenders," live by themselves, or are they associated with older men?—No, they live by themselves or with persons of their own age. I do not think they reside with older men and older criminals.

2285. As a rule the lads of from 15 to 20 would live alone?—Yes.

2286. And form gangs of their own?—Yes, with more of their own age and class.

2287. Do you think that the idea that these young offenders are acted upon by the more hardened and older men is erroneous?—That is my opinion.

2288. That they grow up under evil surroundings, and fall naturally into crime, as it were, and that then these young offenders live really by themselves, and are as much criminals as the older offenders?—That is my opinion. Of course the younger ones, if they were living in a common lodging-house might come then in contact with older men of the same class who are living there, and whether they are not trained by them is very doubtful.

2289. Have you formed any opinion as to the effect of short, as against long, sentences, upon habitual criminals?—No, I have not studied the matter very much.

2290. (Sir Algernon West.) I should like to ask you this. You have told us that "habitually engaged in crime" means men who have undergone two convictions; but in the Return H. which comes before us there is a column for "suspected persons at large." Will you explain to the Committee what you mean by "suspected persons"?—I have endeavoured to do that by saying that in the case of a person who is suspected, for instance, of being a receiver, the house which is used where we know the stolen property has been taken to, yet has not come prominently under our notice in such a manner as to enable us to make an arrest; those persons would be considered in the column of houses which are suspected places.

2291. Are the names of those suspected persons kept in the police books as a record?—We have a list of them.

2292. Do you take evidence at all, or do you act on the suspicion of any constable?—It comes through the C. I. Department principally, that is the Criminal Investigation Department. It is generally received from the detectives.

2293. Are their suspicions about people investigated by any authority?—The only thing that is done is, before the return is submitted the question is gone into. For instance, in my district, and for each district, the officer who has compiled the return is called upon for his explanation, and asked, "Now "who are the people you have described as so-and-"so," and he knows his authority and gives it.

2294. And the superintendent satisfies himself that there is ground for suspicion?—Yes.

2295. You do not yourself know anything, but I suppose you consider what is reported to you?—Yes.

2296. Your duty ceases from the moment a man is convicted. You have got no opinions to give us about the prison discipline and so on?—No.

2297. Your duty ceases when the man is convicted?—Yes, it ceases after the man is taken out of our custody.

2299. Then you watch him?—Yes.

2300. And your duty to an ordinary criminal is past when he is convicted?—Yes. It ceases when they have passed the judge or the magistrate.

2301. You have really nothing to tell us about prison discipline, therefore?—No.

2302. (Miss Orme.) Amongst the women who are recommitted very frequently to a place like Holloway, and especially those women who go out for a few days and come in again, should you say that excessive drinking is common to nearly all of them?—You mean as regards the women who are convicted?

2303. The women who are committed so frequently?—For drunkenness, assault, and so on?

2304. Yes?—No doubt it is common to very nearly all of them.

2305. You say excessive drinking is common to nearly all of them?—Yes.

2306. You have great experience of that class. Are you satisfied with that method of treating them—taking them into prison for a few days and charging them again?—Do you mean whether they should not go to some better place than prison and retrieve their characters, and come out better women than if they go to prison?

2307. Do you think it does them any good to go into prison for a few days, and to come out again, and then to commence drinking and to be recommitted?—I do not know that it does them any good if they come out and commence drinking again.

2308. (Chairman.) A short imprisonment of that class of women, you think, has little or no deterrent effect?—It has no deterrent effect, because they start as soon as they are released from prison.

2309. (Miss Orme.) Suppose that there could be some institution for women of that sort where they could be differently treated and perhaps kept for longer periods, do you think from your experience that it might have an effect upon their ordinary habits?—It might have.

2310. Do you think it would be easy to distinguish that class of women from other offenders; for instance, from women who attempt to commit acts of larceny, or something of that sort, having nothing to do with drink or immorality?—I think they might be separated with advantage. I think the higher we hold them up and the better treatment we give them to show them the folly of their ways the more likely it is to do them good, without crushing them down at once. I think the majority of them are more likely to retrieve their characters in that way than they would be if they found they were oppressed and degraded, to a certain extent, in the prison.

2311. But do you think that that class of women who are so very frequently recommitted could be easily separated from the other class of female offenders?—

Supt. G. E. Smith.

24 July 1894.

No, I must confess I do not see how you are going to do it. That is again dealing with prison discipline. That I know nothing about.

2312. What I mean to say is that when you bring a woman before a magistrate, for instance, would not it be possible to distinguish clearly between those women who are constantly being recommitted and those who commit a crime under great temptation; for instance, larceny; do you think you could distinguish that class of habitual drunkards?—You mean as regards separation and locality?

2313. Yes?—Because they are distinguished before the magistrate. A person who is charged with drunkenness the first time is discharged in the Metropolis. It is the usual practice if a person is once charged with being drunk and is not known, that he should be cautioned and sent away. Then they are generally charged several times before they are sent to prison. There are generally one or two fines before they are sent to prison, so that, as a rule, they are two or three times convicted before they are sent to prison, and it may be more, unless the fines is not paid.

2314. But in the case of these women who are committed so very frequently, are you of opinion that a separate system of treatment would be advisable, altogether different from what is given to women who are committed for such a crime as larceny?—I do not think it would be advisable, but I say it might have a beneficial effect upon them.

2315. Then you say very often young men fall back again into crime from the difficulty of getting employment. I suppose that is the case even to a greater extent with young women who have been in prison?—No, I do not think so, because there are many institutions to which young women can go where places are provided for them where they are not provided for the boys.

2316. Do you think they are frequently received as domestic servants if they have been in prison?—Yes, they are.

2317. In respectable houses?—Yes.

2318. Not merely as rough general servants?—No, many of them would get situations from the homes and retrieve their character.

2319. And those who continue a dishonest life do not work so much in gangs, do they, as young men do; they are solitary offenders rather?—They do not work so much in gangs as the men.

2320. But they are sometimes connected with men, I suppose, in crime, but otherwise they would work by themselves?—Yes, that is so.

2321. (Dr. Bridges.) I see in this return of seven years ago that there are 499 persons recognised as having been in custody twice for felony during seven years. Of those 500, speaking quite roughly and without committing yourself to definite figures, how many have come out of reformatories?—I could not say.

2322. You do not know?—No.

2323. Should you be aware at all of criminals when they were discharged from reformatories; should you know the fact?—No, I should only know the fact of their having been convicted and sent to a reformatory, but after their release from the reformatory I have no intimation of that at all, and unless they were recognised by some officer who knew they were sent to the reformatory we should know nothing about it.

2324. I am speaking of boys discharged from the reformatory and who relapse into crime. You would not know whether they had or not been in a reformatory?—No, unless an officer who knew them happened to meet them.

2325. It would be accidental if there were a recognition that they had been sent to a reformatory?—Yes.

2326. (Mr. O'Connor.) Which is your division in London?—The C Division in Piccadilly.

2327. Is Vine Street one of them?—That is one station.

2328. What number of persons would be arrested there, say, on a Saturday evening?—Well, it varies; I should say on the average about 20.

2329. How many cells have you there?—We have eight cells.

2330. Do you find detention before they are sent to prison ever injures, or is calculated to injure, a person?—It has never come to my knowledge that that has been so.

2331. You keep them from the Saturday until Monday at the police station, I suppose?—If they are charged with felony.

2332. The others are bailed?—The others are bailed.

2333. Do they have a bed there?—No bed; they have a rug and a pillow.

2334. You told us that one of the difficulties a discharged prisoner had to contend with is that of getting constant employment. It has been alleged that the police sometimes unnecessarily give information as to the antecedents of a discharged prisoner. I presume if he does it would be against the rules?—It would be against the rules, and he would of course answer for his conduct.

2335. Is there any distinct rule which you could recall to us with regard to that; is there any printed rule upon it?—I cannot draw it to my mind now, but I think there is a printed rule to that effect, and certainly it is clearly understood amongst the police that that is no part of their business.

2336. How is that understanding disseminated among the police?—By the instructions they are given before being sent out into the streets.

2337. Are those instructions printed?—They are taken from the general printed orders that we have.

2338. But you cannot say from memory that there is a certain specific direction on that point?—I am under the impression there is, but I could not refer you to it at the moment.

2339. Have you ever had occasion to speak to any sergeant, or inspector, or constable, upon the point?—No.

2340. Did you ever know a case in which a man did give the information and was reprimanded for doing so?—I have known a case where a complaint of the kind was made, but I am not in a position to give facts to prove whether it has been so.

2341. Was it within your jurisdiction?—If it was not within my jurisdiction it was within the boundary of the district.

2342. I mean you had official cognizance of it?—Yes.

2343. Was it established?—It was not established, to the best of my recollection.

2344. Do you believe that the police ever do give information?—I do not believe it. My impression is that they do more to assist them, because they go so far as to go to employers and ascertain if they would accept a person who has been convicted and discharged from prison with the idea of retrieving their character. They try to find employment for them.

2345. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You said the fact of imprisonment was damaging on persons. I suppose you would not suggest that they should not be imprisoned?—No.

2346. That was not the intention of your remark?—I think the intention of my remark was dealing with a person after discharge from prison. I said it was damaging to his reputation, and he was heavily handicapped in getting honest employment.

2347. That follows as a natural consequence?—Yes.

2348. But you did not mean to suggest that you would suggest any other mode of dealing with a person than imprisonment?—Of course there are other modes of dealing with young persons. The magistrate can order them to be birched; he can also bind them over to give sureties for their appearance or to come up for judgment again, and it is only after that, if a conviction follows, that they may be sent to a reformatory.

2349. Do you know that they have got voluntary homes?—I do not.

2350. The magistrates often send a prisoner to a voluntary home?—They send them to some established home where there is a possibility of their being taken care of and some employment found for them, but that is apparently for the girls.

2351. Not so much for the boys?—No; sometimes they are handed over and sent to training ships.

2352. They are industrial schools; I was speaking of voluntary homes?—It is regarded as a voluntary home, not a reformatory. It is done where they are sent away to training ships, and ofttimes I have known them to be taken to Dr. Barnardo's homes; and children, when I was in the East-end, have been handed over and taken by him. That is to save a conviction of a young boy or girl, as the case may be.

2353. I wanted to find out from you whether you thought these systems were answering. There are three practical ways of dealing with a boy who is brought up before a magistrate: either to discharge him altogether, or to discharge him, which is commonly done, to a voluntary home, or to send him under sentence to an industrial school, or to send him under sentence to a reformatory school. All those modes are open to you?—Yes.

2354. Dr. Barnardo's Homes would fall under the description of "voluntary homes"?—Yes.

2355. There are several others which are of the same class as Dr. Barnardo's, are they not?—Yes.

2356. Do they work pretty well?—I think so.

2357. They have got a good effect on the children?—I think so.

2358. It is not necessary always to send them to an industrial school; a voluntary home answers its purpuse to a certain extent?—I think so.

2360. The Chairman asked you whether you thought the adult criminal population was recruited from the juvenile population and you expressed your acquiescence in that. The question is, whether we can deal better with our juvenile criminal population than we are dealing with them at present, and whether you could suggest any improvement in the methods of dealing with children than the present methods of sending them either to voluntary homes and industrial schools or a reformatory school?—I do not know any other means of dealing with them.

2361-2. A large proportion of children from reformatory schools never fall into crime again?—That is so.

2363. Would you say the same of the industrial schools?—I think so.

2364. And of the voluntary refuges?—And the voluntary schools as well.

2365. You think they are all producing satisfactory results?—I think so.

2366. This return of yours shows some very remarkable results—that only 18 persons in seven years were convicted more than four times of felony in the Metropolitan area?—No; I think that return is compiled from an early return. I think that is the persons who were recognised as being twice, three times, or four times in custody in the separate years there.

2367. For instance, recognised as having been in custody four times. Then in the year 1887 there are none. In the year 1887, no one is convicted who had been previously four times sentenced?—No, that is in 1887.

2368. So that in those seven years, only 18 persons in the whole were convicted, having been four times convicted before for felony, and there was no one in 1887. They were three in 1888, four in 1889, three in 1890, two in 1891, three in 1892, and three in 1893, making a total of 18. Do you think that can be correct, that only 18 persons in the Metropolitan area were convicted of felony, having been previously convicted four times?—No; I think the return is compiled for each year, and it is the number of times they were recognised in custody during that year.

2369. You mean to say that this is a return of persons in 1887, showing that in one particular year those three persons had been four times convicted of felony in that particular year?—No, recognised as being in custody four times in that particular year.

2370. Therefore, only 18 persons in the whole were convicted in the Metropolitan area of felony?—We recognised them as being four times in custody in one of the years.

2371. That only 18 persons were recognised as having been previously convicted four times in seven years?—That is what the appearance of the report seems to imply.

2372. Do you think your recognitions can be at all correct?—It does not seem feasible that there should only be such a small number, but still it may be correct. It is four times in custody, you see, in a year.

2373. If it is true it is a most satisfactory result?—Yes, but the return referred to deals only with persons recognised as being in custody more than once in a year and not to convictions.

2374. (Mr. O'Connor.) I suppose a person might be convicted four times, and yet only be recognised as having been convicted once or twice?—That might be so.

2375. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) I will ask you this general question. I have no doubt this return is true numerically according to the belief of the persons who made it out, but does it seem reasonable to your understanding of the criminal classes, that only 18 persons in seven years could have been convicted more than four times?—It does not.

2376. In that case the return probably does not accurately state the facts?—No, I was of opinion that it was only those who were recognised during one year; but then it would be hardly feasible that one person would be convicted four times in a year.

2377. It is not reasonable that anybody would be convicted four times in a year, and it is not reasonable that only 18 persons should be convicted in seven years having been previously convicted four times?—No, it was only dealt with, as I understand it, as being recognised in each separate year, and not to go back to any previous years.

2378. (Mr. O'Connor.) With regard to girls who get into custody, does any considerable or noticeable proportion come from laundry girls?—I have not recognised that.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Henry Rogers called and examined.

Mr. H. Rogers.

2379. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) What are you?—I am Assistant Inspector of Reformatories and Industrial Schools.

2380. How many schools have you under your inspection?—We have altogether of reformatory and industrial schools, 227.

2381. How many of those are reformatory schools?—The exact number is 51 reformatory schools.

2382. And the remainder are industrial schools?—I will give it you exactly. There are of industrial schools, 140; of truant schools, 14; day industrial schools, 22; total 227. I will give you the different numbers for England and Scotland. There are of reformatories in England, 42; in Scotland, 9. There are of industrial schools in England, 106; in Scotland, 34. There are of truant schools, only in England, (there being no truant schools in Scotland, at present) 14. Of day industrial schools (and this completes them) there are in England, 19; in Scotland, 3. That gives 181 in England, and 46 in Scotland, which makes up the 227. Besides that we have nine working boys' homes which are certified under the Home Office.

Mr. H. Rogers.

2383. Omitting the day industrial schools and the truant schools, with which we have not got much to do for our purpose, I would ask you, do you recognise much distinction between the reformatories and the industrial schools where the boys are sent under magistrates' orders for long terms?—Well, of course there is a very great difference in the criminal status of these boys. In the reformatories they are all convicted or have been convicted two or three times or more, and consequently we find that in the reformatory schools we have to deal with more vicious boys and girls. They certainly are more contaminated than the boys or girls we meet with in the industrial schools.

2384. And in your inspections do you see there is a distinct difference as between the two sets of boys?—Especially in the older cases, that is to say, we meet with boys in the reformatory school at the age of 16, and we have kept them up to the age of 20 and 21; in some cases at any rate we meet with a certain class of boys in reformatory schools at the ages of 16, 17, 18 and 19; but in the industrial schools the limit of age is 16. After the age of 16, we cannot keep a boy in an industrial school.

2385. A casual observer would notice this distinction between the reformatory and industrial schools, that the boys in one would be of greater age than the other?—Of greater age and size, and in many cases criminal status, criminal contamination, and knowledge of vice and crime.

2386. That would not be apparent to the ordinary observer?—No; in many of the cases there is not much difference between them in appearance, but if you had to deal with them from day to day then you would find a great deal of difference, because in the one case you have to deal with determined vicious boys who know everything, in the reformatory. In the other case, in industrial schools, you may have to deal with a less vicious boy, and in many cases not a vicious boy at all.

2387. Do you think you get many boys sent to the industrial schools who are so far criminal that they ought to have gone to a reformatory school?—We have had many instances of bad boys, and vicious boys, who ought to have been sent to the reformatory school instead of being sent to the industrial school.

2388. Do you think that is due to a desire not to send them to prison?—I think it has been due to an indisposition simply on the part of the magistrate to send a boy to a reformatory school, principally owing to the previous imprisonment.

2389. You think the necessity of sending a boy to prison interposed a barrier against sending boys to a reformatory school?—Most decidedly that has acted as a barrier to sending a boy to a reformatory school to which place of detention he ought to have been sent. I know that in many instances, especially in Scotland.

2390. That feeling is very strongly held by magistrates engaged in the reformatory management in Scotland?—Yes.

2391. But in England, reformatory managers are not so strong upon it?—Not to the same extent.

2392. They are on the whole, against it?—They have not been on the whole so averse to sending a boy to prison in England as they have been in Scotland.

2393. Putting aside the indisposition of the magistrate to send to prison, do you think the prison is undesirable for a criminal boy who is about to be sent to a reformatory, and who, being bad, has presumably been sent to prison before?—Not always, but in some cases. I am inclined from the whole length of my experience to think it extremely desirable at the present time to omit that sentence of previous imprisonment. I appeal now to 40 years' experience in these schools, and I was gradually brought up in the belief that the reformatory sentence was necessary, and that you could not possibly get on without that preliminary imprisonment, that it tamed a boy, and brought him to a better condition to adapt himself to the milder discipline of the reformatory school when he got there. But of late years my opinion has been absolutely changed, and I think there is a very general feeling, entirely so in Scotland, and very universal now in England, with English managers and superintendents, that we could very well do without the previous imprisonment.

2394. On what grounds have you changed your opinion?—On the grounds that we find that from our knowledge of the bad boys who have been to industrial schools we have got on perfectly well without imprisonment, and the general feeling of the superintendents themselves who have related their experience to me is that the time has come now to do without imprisonment.

2395. That is to say you have changed your opinion because you have come to the conclusion that you can do just as well without imprisonment as with imprisonment?—Precisely. I have changed my opinion, I admit, in the course of time, but it has now been a conviction in my own mind for many years. I began with that idea 30 or 40 years ago. I learnt my work under the Rev. Sydney Turner, a most distinguished man and a great thinker on this point, and who was the originator of the movement, and he was most decidedly in favour at that time of the imprisonment, and considered it brought a boy to his senses; but the boys are not so criminal nor so difficult to deal with as they used to be.

2396. You think the boys are less criminal now?—Certainly they are.

2397. Is that due to the gangs being broken up?—Yes, we do not have the same education in crime that we had. It is useless to attempt now to educate juveniles for a criminal career.

2398. You go back 40 years to the origin of reformatories?—I do.

2399. And you are aware that in those days there used to be regular training gangs of boys?—I am quite aware of it.

2400. And that in a very few years they entirely disappeared?—We have entirely broken up the gangs by the reformatories. The trainers say, "Oh, it is no "use training boys now the gangs get broken up;" and they say, "What is the good of our training boys that "will be sent to a reformatory; we have to begin over "again; it is of no use." It is within my experience that there was not a railway station in London where trained juvenile thieves did not attend when the ladies came up with their pockets full of money and there were three or four of these trained boys always there. The lads have related to me their experience over and over again, and they said: "We have only just to dip "our two fingers into a lady's pocket and out used "to come five, six, or seven sovereigns." But we hear little of that kind now; we have broken up that system entirely. You can see even from the experience of everyday life that the newspapers do not report cases of pickpockets now; a few years ago there was nothing heard of in the police court but "pocket dipping," as they called it, with the two fingers.

2401. You are inclined to think that the adult criminal population is not produced from the juvenile criminal population?—No, I do not think it is. I think we have thoroughly stemmed the tide of that system. We have thoroughly raised an obstacle in the way and the supply is not from the same source.

2402. What is the source, then?—Many boys escape the sentence of detention and the magistrates will not deal with them effectually. They let them off after three, four, five and six convictions, and then the child escapes you altogether. He gets beyond the age of 16, and then he becomes a full-fledged criminal, and we cannot deal with him any longer.

2403. Do you think the age for admission to reformatories might be extended from 16 to some other figure?—I most certainly give it as my feeling and conviction that we might deal with a great many juvenile offenders who come into the criminal ranks at 16 by dealing with them in reformatories up to 18.

2404. Would you like to see that age put up to 18?—Yes, for particular schools, not for general transmission into our reformatory schools; but in special cases I should like to see the age extended from 16 to 18.

2405. If such an alteration of the law was made it would be necessary to classify the schools and specify those that were capable of dealing with these cases?—Indubitably so.

2406. You would probably say that the smaller children should not be associated with other children over 15?—Certainly.

2407. And, in fact, that schools should be licensed to retain children not beyond 15. A school which has children of 12, 13, or 14 years of age should not have children in it of 17 and 18?—I do not say I go quite so far as that. I say that to those places to which you admit young children you must not commit new cases of the age of 16 and upwards.

2408. You would not suggest, I suppose, that a reformatory should be established to take only cases of 16 and upwards?—Yes, I would. That is exactly the point. I would have reformatory schools to deal with such cases where not a single child under 15 is committed.

2409. But the child who was committed at 15 may be 19 before he is discharged?—Yes.

2410. You will not object to keeping a young man of 19 in the school where a child of 13 is?—Not when he has grown up in the school. We very rarely keep the boy up to 19 if he has been there three years and a half or three years. Our system is to deal with the child effectually in a period not extending over three or three and a half years.

2411. Of course you know Redhill?—Yes, perfectly.

2412. There they have got a number of houses?—Yes.

2413. There they are able to classify the boys?—To a certain extent. There is only one attempt at classification, and that is in one house where they take the junior boys; but it is only within the last few years that that has been attempted, and, so far, the system has been very successful.

2414. And they pass out the boys from that house as they grow up into the other houses?—Yes, there are five or six houses altogether.

2415. So that they do keep a house for the exclusive use of the young boys?—That is so.

2416. In most reformatory schools there is only one house?—Only one house.

2417. And those houses, although you see no objection to boys being there from 12 to 18 or 19——?—Excuse me interrupting you; not generally. For instance, if a boy comes in at 12 we try to get him off about 15 or 16. We do not think it desirable to keep a boy from 12 to 18, and if he is 15 we like to keep him two or three years to get him into habits of decent behaviour.

2418. Perhaps we had better clear up the question of the licences at once. It is customary in most reformatory schools to make considerable use of the licence system, I think?—Yes.

2419. Under which boys may be sent out on licence after 18 months?—Yes.

2420. And that is largely used?—It is considerably used; not so largely as it should be. There is a tendency to keep the child longer than there is any necessity for.

2421. The practice in the different schools is very different?—Yes, very different.

2422. Some schools discharge early, and some keep them?—Yes, some try to keep the boys as long as they can.

2423. At Redhill I think they rather keep them?—They are rather disposed to keep the boys too long. There are some houses at Redhill filled with boys of 17, 18, and 19 years.

2424. So that they would represent pretty well what a reformatory school would be to boys who were committed over 16?—Quite so. There would be no difference between houses such as one or two of those at Redhill, and those houses which we contemplate for boys up to 18.

2425. And to houses of that class there would be no objection to sending boys on their being sentenced?—I do not conceive there would be any practical difficulty in sending those boys to a well-established institution like that at Redhill—to one of their separate houses where more of the older boys would be permitted to locate themselves.

2426. How many reformatories are there in England where there are more than one house?—Only one or two. There is one at Calder farm near Mirfield in Yorkshire.

2427. That would be the only reformatory in which a system of classification could be perfected other than at Redhill?—But I may say that many of the existing schools would not be averse to dealing with the older boys solely.

2428. That is supposing by the conditions of their licence they were restricted from taking boys under 14, we will say?—Yes.

2429. They might very well then take boys up to 18?—They would gladly take these children if there is some possibility of committing them at the age of 16. They would gladly deal solely with that class then.

2430. Do you think that would be a desirable change?—Most desirable. At any rate the experiment ought to be tried. A great many young people of 16 become criminal for the first time in their life and they have no chance for reformation. But conceive now the case of a lad of that kind, a lad of 16, who as his first offence steals a watch, or is led into some criminal act, if he comes out of prison again he is lost, unless he is sent to a reformatory school.

2431. You would not send such a case as that to a reformatory school at 16?—Yes, I would at 16.

2432. On his first conviction?—Yes, at 16 I would, and never give him another chance until he had come to discipline. I know the views of Mr. Berwick Baker on that subject, but if you find a boy of 16 committing a criminal act you must take hold of him at once.

2433. If a boy of 16 has had a criminal character, although not previously convicted, and he had committed an offence of sufficient gravity to send him to a reformatory on first conviction?—I would.

2434. And if he had no previous criminal history would you send him then to a reformatory school?—I would at that age. I would not mince matters with that boy. The only thing to do with him is to lay hold of him.

2435. As the law now stands; because the next week he might have passed the age and could never be sent to a reformatory school; but supposing you could send up to the reformatory school boys of the age of 18, would you then send to a reformatory school a boy who, not having a criminal character and having committed only one offence and being 16 years of age?—Of course that must depend on association and the kind of society he is mixing in when this offence was committed, and if has taken to a criminal career and has bad surroundings and has no good friends to influence him, I would not mind about its being his first or any offence, but I would lay hold of that boy and take him out of the criminal ranks. It would depend on his surroundings, but that of course would have to be a matter of previous investigation. As a general rule I say if he has any criminal surroundings, no matter whether it is his first conviction or not, and we are to save him, we must take him in hand early; and at the age of 16 we can deal with him for a couple of years or more and certainly influence him for good. I have not a doubt about it.

Mr. H. Rogers.

2436. In the reformatory schools?—Allow me to mention one fact. I was at a reformatory yesterday, one with capital surroundings, and nothing better. It was in Hertfordshire. The school is about half full; they cannot get boys sent to them; they are pining away for want of children being sent to them. I said, "Would you be inclined to deal with these elder boys?" They said "Certainly we should." I said, "Should "you have any fear or apprehension that you could "not deal with them?" They said, "None at all."

2437. So that you say if there was a change in the law there would be no difficulty in licensing certain schools, so as to take hold of the older boys?—My opinion is there would be no difficulty in dealing with them or finding a place to receive them.

2438. At the reformatory schools industrial occupations are more taken into account than educational work, are they not?—With the older boys, of course, we must devote more time to the industrial training than the education, but we should never lower the educational training.

2439. And the amount of educational training they get is satisfactory?—The amount of training they get in our reformatory schools is perfectly satisfactory. It is not so much an educational question altogether. The great question is the moral good we can effect in those boys' inclinations and feelings.

2440. And as a matter of fact a very large per-centage of reformatory boys have done well?—I think they have answered our expectations altogether. At the lowest estimate we recover 70 per cent., and in our best schools we go up to 80 or 90 per cent. who do not appear in the criminal ranks again.

2441. And that official statement is made over a period of three years after the sentence has expired?—It is so.

2442. At which time they may have been three, four, or five years practically free?—Yes, it is so.

2443. So that really the per-centage is more a per-centage over five years than over three?—It is so.

2444. And if a young man behaves well for five years, you may reasonably conclude that he is likely to lead an honest life afterwards?—We have reasonable expectation of his turning out a decent man.

2445. Beyond the end of that three years you know nothing except from general reputation?—A great many boys after the three years supervene keep up a connexion with their schools.

2446. Some of them are rather proud of their schools, are they not?—They are very proud of it. They are not at all ashamed of their schools, not the slightest. It is very strange, but in these reformatory schools neither boys nor girls are afraid of their schools. They bring their wives, husbands, and their children to see them long afterwards.

2447. The Government grant at present is 6*s*.?—It is 6*s*. for reformatories.

2448. Supposing an older class was taken, would it be necessary to raise that?—I think it would; 10*s* to 12*s*. or so per week per head. We must have a sufficient force to deal with boys of 18. We could not deal with them effectually if we were underhanded. We do not want to resort to violence, because it is not by violence the reformatory system is kept up; but still we must have superior power.

2449. As to the change which took place last year, limiting the age of detention to 19, do you approve of that?—Entirely.

2450. Do you think that the reformatories were unduly using their powers in keeping them until 21?—Utilising these boys for their own benefit, without thinking of the boys' interest.

2451. You think, then, that the legislation was rather correcting an abuse in management?—I think it was becoming an abuse to keep these boys too long. Mr. Sydney Turner, my predecessor, said, "If we "cannot do some good for the boys in three years, "or three years and a half, we had better give the "business up altogether."

2452. Was not the system before 1891 a very useful simple control over the boys?—We retain the power of supervision still.

2453. No, not that?—You mean we could not bring the boy back?

2454. Yes, you have lost the power?—No. It is not much use to bring him back to a reformatory school at 19. I do not think there is any good in that.

2455. Were a considerable number of boys detained in reformatories after the age of 19?—Far too many, and that gave rise to that change, and showed the expediency of adopting it.

2456. Can you give an an idea of the numbers detained over 19?—I cannot tell you at the present time, but it had grown to this extent that in a large school like Redhill, with 200 boys, the licences were reduced to 7 or 8.

2457. At Hardwicke, do you know that school?—Yes.

2458. Did you find any boys there over 19?—Yes, occasionally, too many. The licence system has hardly been used at Hardwicke.

2459. You say they hardly used the licence system at Hardwicke, but in the last return I see there were 70 boys under detention?—Yes.

2460. And 24 were on licence?—They did not came before us as on licence.

2461. That is your own return in 1892?—If I could fetch you the return from Hardwicke and show you the licence bill, you would find there were a great many boys let out that were not properly on licence. They are let out and have gone off the books, but they do not come under the licence system.

2462. But when a boy is sent from a school licensed to a farm in the neighbourhood, the Government grant is no longer drawn for him?—No, but there is a licence allowance, and that licence allowance at Hardwicke you will find is of the mildest description.

2463. How is it the returns are not checked, and that in the Government returns you say there are 24 licences?—It might have been the number at that moment.

2464. The next page of the return gives 59 boys under detention, three on licence?—What school is that?

2465. Glamorganshire?—That is a very small school.

2466. It is 59 boys, three on licence?—It was only at that particular moment we visited the school. That would be the numbers on the day of our inspection. I think I am not exceeding the bounds of truth to say that the system is not used as liberally as it should be.

2467. Then at Hampshire 87 boys, one on licence?—That is a school where it is hardly in existence. They keep the boys as long as they can, and they send them into the army a good deal. They are very fine lads. They do not use the licence system.

2468. I think it was boasted rather at Hardwicke that they passed such an immense number of boys through the school as they did owing to the large number of licences. Then there is Akbar, which is a large ship, where there are 168 boys under detention and 85 on licence?—Those are boys who go to sea. You will find a large number go to sea from the ships, and they are on licence. They let them go when they are qualified.

2469. In North Lancashire there are 124 boys in the school, 60 on licence?—Yes, they get the boys through the school very rapidly.

2470. At the Birkdale Reformatory there are 192 in detention, and 39 on licence?—There are some very big boys there, and they keep them as long as it is expedient.

2471. At Redhill there is no return of boys on licence?—I should be glad to supply you with a list of boys on licence. It is very much decided in this way. We reduce the allowance from 6*s*. to 4*s*. when the boy has been three years in the school and is 16 years of age. Therefore we see at a glance in our quarterly accounts how many boys are upwards of 16 years of age and have been three years in the school, because they are reduced from 6*s.* to 4*s.* at that age.

2472. When a boy is on licence they no longer draw any money?—They draw a licence allowance, and that is what I complain of.

2473. How much is it?—2*s.* a week for 13 weeks, and 1*s.* a week for 26 weeks beyond that. For 39 weeks we make a kind of Treasury allowance for boys on licence, and it is that sum I speak of in the return of the boys from Hardwicke that I complain of. However, that is a matter of detail we can settle.

2474. You have no power to order boys to be discharged on licence?—We have no power whatever, only delegated powers from the Home Office. We have no powers to order boys to be placed out on licence.

2475. The only power you have is to withdraw licences from a school?—The real power we have is to report that the school is not going on well, that it is disobeying the rules laid down for its management, and therefore we recommend that the certificate be withdrawn; that is the only power we have and the only power the Home Office has.

2476. The power of reporting, and the power of withdrawing the certificate if necessary?—Yes, the power is simply of interest in connexion with the Home Office; the schools are all voluntary schools.

2477. Do you think the system works satisfactorily as a system of voluntary schools?—Admirably.

2478. Better than if it were put more under official management?—It is not to be named in comparison with it.

2479. You would not suggest official management at reformatory schools?—I should despair of doing much good under those circumstances.

2480. You want more power?—No, the power is enough.

2481. You do not want the power of ordering the boy to be put out on licence?—The managers are willing enough to obey the regulations of the Home Office. I have rarely found any reluctance on their part to do what is reasonable.

2482. But you say they are keeping them too long?—There is a disposition to retain the useful boys instead of consulting the boy's interest and put them out as soon as possible. It is reasonable enough, but it wants perhaps a little more official interference.

2483. You think the boys are not detained for their own good, but for the good of the managers?—For their utility as trained hard-working boys bringing in a little.

2484. (Sir Algernon West.) I want to ask you how are these boys maintained if the grant is only 6*s.*? The temptation, I understand, is to keep the boys because they are bringing money into the schools. Is that so?—Yes, to make a little money for repairs and so on, but the 6*s.* is always supplemented by a grant from the committing authority. At Redhill, for instance, they receive from the county of Somerset, but they never admit a boy unless they get 2*s.* or 2*s.* 6*d.* a week besides, so that it makes it up to 8*s.* or 8*s.* 6*d.*

2485. It would not be enough by itself?—No, the cost of the boy is about 22*l.* per year.

2486. Are there voluntary subscriptions also?—They have dropped off lately.

2487. Are any of the reformatory schools stinted in consequence of a lack of subscriptions?—Yes, they are very much tempted to keep a boy as much as possible for his valuable ability to get a little money together; for instance, they let out the boys at harvest time, and and a few of the big boys are of the greatest utility to them; and in every respect, whatever branch of industry you speak of, whether it is the tailor's shop, the shoemaker's shop, or the carpenter's shop, the big boy is a valuable workman, who has been thoroughly trained, and there is a disposition to keep him as long as they can.

2488. Have you ever known an instance of a certificate being withdrawn by the Home Office from a reformatory?—I have known it in one or two cases from an industrial school, but I do not recollect any case of that kind in a reformatory.

2489. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Was not there a case of an outbreak some 30 years ago in the north, and it was intimated to them the school had better be closed?—We had a school rebuked a short time ago, but the Home Office has dealt very gently with these schools, and there is very little necessity for it.

2490. (Dr. Bridges.) Of course you are familiar with Feltham?—Yes.

2491. Is Feltham still a school in which reformatory and industrial boys are mixed?—Yes; under the Middlesex Act, a great many criminal boys are sent as well, and mixed up with the industrial boys.

2492. What, in your opinion, is the result of Feltham?—The thing is disastrous to our whole system. I should like to see it discontinued with all my heart.

2493. I mean, do you form that opinion on the experience of Feltham?—Quite so; the tone of Feltham does not please me, and I think it has very much deteriorated in consequence of that intermixture of the criminal children at Feltham with the industrial boys, which ought not to have been allowed.

2494. You are able to point to something like substantial proof that harm has resulted from that?—I do not wish to say anything on the system there, but if you ask my opinion, I think that the result of mixing up criminal children and industrial children together is disastrous to the general object of the school.

2495. You do not form that from a general opinion that you have, that it is a bad system, but you form it also from what you have observed in Feltham?—It is from observation and full knowledge and experience of the system carried on there. All the inspectors who have ever been there come to the same opinion that it is most expedient that that system should be abolished and that we should not commit criminal children to that school and let them mix up with industrial school children. It is not fair nor right.

2496. Is there a very great difference between one reformatory and another, so far as its results are concerned?—Yes, it would vary very much indeed.

2497. I observe that from your last return the total per-centage doing well (I am speaking of Protestant Boys' Schools in England) is 85 per cent.?—Yes.

2498. But that in one reformatory the proportion goes down as low as 61 per cent., while in another it mounts up as high as 94?—Yes.

2499. Do these figures in your opinion represent generally the difference between one school and another as to the general character of the school? I mean, does the statistical result give you a fair idea of the difference between one school and another morally?—I do not think that fully indicates the excellence or want of excellence in the school, but there are a variety of circumstances attending the disposal of the children where the per-centage is so great which brings it to that figure, which looks, of course, rather damaging to the management of the school. I could name a Catholic school where the per-centage is very low, but in dealing with Irish Roman Catholics coming from a place like Liverpool circumstances must be considered, they are very well qualified when they leave the school, but they go back to a place like Liverpool and are surrounded by old and degrading associations, and there is not a chance for them. It is these circumstances that bring out the figures.

2500. Coming back to the Protestant schools in England, I observe that the total re-convicted is 10 per cent.?—That is a fair average per cent.—7, 8, or 10 per cent. of re-convictions.

2501. In addition to that you would have to make some allowance for those who absconded?—Yes, and were not recovered.

2502. And also for a considerable number with regard to whom there is no knowledge?—No knowledge; unknown—and I think you may take it as a general average that with such 7, 8, 9, or 10 per cent. are re-convictions, and I may state that those re-convictions are put down very rigidly, even only 21 days for being drunk or disorderly being recorded; but I do not believe there is a relapse into crime of more than 7 or 8 per cent. at the most.

Mr. H. Rogers.

24 July 1894.

2503. Here it is 10 per cent.?—A great number of those re-convictions are for very trifling offences, and some calculation has to be taken against that, even of 2½ or 3 per cent., because you would not have a return of more than 5 per cent. to criminal courses.

2504. I think you expressed an opinion just now in favour of those schools in which there is structurally the means of separating one group of children from another, as in Redhill?—Yes, that is very important indeed. In industrial schools many of our schools now have that separation. We find it of the greatest advantage to separate younger children from the older, even in an industrial school.

2505. In the reformatory school you would say it is advantageous to have more buildings than one?—Certainly; the more they can be separated the better.

2506. In the school at Feltham, which was originally built on the barrack-system, they have met that, have not they, to some extent by putting partitions between different portions of the building?—Yes, they have made their groups into 150, which makes the separation system fail altogether.

2507. Have you formed any opinion as to the limit of size there should be in a reformatory school?—Our most successful schools have always been the farm colonies or farm schools of not more than 50 or 60 boys. If you are going to do anything for the improvement of wicked vicious children you must not have them in large numbers.

2508. With reference to the employment of those children; you have spoken of their instruction, by which, I suppose, you mean reading and writing?—Yes, the school instruction.

2509. Which is the least important part of the matter; but what about the industrial employment of boys, dealing with them first? What is the best form of industrial employment both morally and physically for them?—Anything that gives the boy some technical knowledge is the most valuable to have. We employ a good many of our boys in tailoring and shoemaking, and of late years we have introduced technical instruction in the shape of woodwork with tools.

2510. What do you say to outdoor work on the land?—That is invaluable, but it is not of much use to town boys. If they go back to the towns what is the use of agricultural training to them.

2511. I would like your opinion on the effect of agricultural employment for the town boys from the point of view of their health?—The last few years we sent a great many boys right off to the coast of Norfolk, at Buxton, near Norwich. It had the best effect on the Birmingham boys, and they turned out the best of agricultural labourers; but they went back to Birmingham.

2512. They might go back to Birmingham better physically qualified to do unskilled labour?—They were well physically qualified. I would certainly have the reformatory school in the country rather than in the town.

2513. Do you consider any of those boys when they are released from the reformatory follow the same trades that you have taught them in the reformatory?—Well, in many cases they do. I do not say it is general. Of course, we have too many tailors and shoemakers, and they do not always follow their trade; but if you teach a boy to be a hedge carpenter or a smith, he generally follows his trade.

2514. A tailor's and shoemaker's trade is not the trade best qualified to strengthen the boy's physique, is it?—No, it is the worst thing possible. We have had great success with our technical instruction of boys of late years.

2515. Speaking of the employment of girls, I suppose laundry work is a great part of it?—What is specially valuable is a good training in needlework and knitting; we find needlework of very great use. We also give them machine work.

2516. Apart from the employment of boys or girls, is much done to strengthen their physique by drill?—Of late years we have introduced into all our schools musical and physical drill, which has been of great advantage to the girls, and set them up most beneficially.

2517. And also to the boys as well?—Yes, we have had it invariably in all our schools for boys of late years.

2518. (Mr. O'Connor.) Has the Act of last year had any effect in respect of sending boys direct to reformatories without going to prison?—For the last few months of last year there was a great influx of boys sent to the reformatories in consequence of the non-imprisonment.

2519. Has anything been done to draw the attention of the magistrates throughout the country to the fact that that Act has been passed?—I think the influx has fallen off again. Several of our reformatory schools have been obliged to resign their certificates because they cannot get enough.

2520. You spoke of a school at Hertfordshire?—At Chapmore End, near Ware; they have only had two boys for the last few years.

2521. A great object of industrial schools is to fit these boys, when they do go into the world, to get a decent livelihood?—Yes; we do not do our work unless we do that.

2522. You say the reformatory and industrial system on the whole has been very successful?—I should wish to give my opinion after long experience, which is, that I think it is one of the most successful movements ever introduced into this country.

2523. Do you think it would be so successful if the boys had been sent to pick oakum or turn a crank?—No. I conceive it to be our duty to give useful training and occupation under a liberal system.

2524. You would not have sedentary occupation for them?—No, none at all, if I could avoid it.

2525. You would not limit the sedentary occupation to people under 21, would you?—No, the greater the age of the boys the more attention I should pay to the technical instruction. I could not approve of the schools being established unless we had good technical instruction for the older boys.

2526. Is the food given where the schools are sufficient? Do you make an inspection as regards the food given at the schools?—Yes, every detail of it.

2527. And it is ample?—Yes; bedrooms, food, dietary, and everything else is inspected. It is all under our supervision. We do not govern the schools, but we institute a most minute inquiry into the system of management and care.

2528. In the schools which you propose, some being for entrance under 15 or 16, and others over that age, would you have the same system of administration in the two classes, and the same arrangement as to the severity of work and occupation?—Very much the same; we have already dealt with it as regards our bigger boys.

2529. What punishments do they have in reformatory schools?—Corporal punishment, but mostly we carry on our discipline by a system of marks and rewards for labour.

2530. Does the Home Office make a careful inquiry as to the treatment of boys with reference to punishment?—Every punishment is registered.

2531. Have you ever had any complaint of cruelties in the way of punishment?—Occasionally.

2532. Of boys being sent to walk 30 miles round the playground in one day; have you ever heard of that?—No.

2533. Or of boys having to carry each other alternately round the playground for hours?—No. I should not object to a limited time for pacing instead of play; but if any grave abuse or irregularity came to the knowledge of the Home Office they would not allow it to pass without giving the Inspectors ample instructions to inquire into it and set it right.

Mr. H. Rogers.

24 July 1894.

2534. (Chairman.) Have you formed any opinion upon the subject of the influence of lodging-houses upon the class of boys that come into the reformatory?—Not of late years, but in former years when we began, we had a very large acquaintance with that sort of thing. The lads as they came in to us gave us their full experience in these matters, and I have always believed and understood that the influence of those houses where these boys concentrated was the most demoralising thing possible. Our boys have come to us in former years, not so much in later years, utterly demoralised. There was not a grain of virtue left in them in former days; it was terrible.

2535. Do you get any boys you look upon now as incurably vicious and bad?—A very small per-centage. The number really is extremely small of those who are able to resist our efforts; there are more girls than boys of this character. There is a certain per-centage of them, but not sufficient to discourage our efforts at all.

2536. Do you find that the vicious boys and girls are more amenable to reforming influences when they are young or when they are growing older?—I think every man who has dealt with both classes will say that the industrial school boy is a more hopeful child than the reformatory school boy; but the industrial school boy gives us the more trouble. The reformatory boys are more vicious, but they behave themselves well enough. As the children grow older, they become, as a rule, more steady and thoughtful.

2537. Supposing you got a lad of 16 who goes in with a very bad character indeed, do you find that a lad of that kind continues apparently bad and vicious two or three years and then is got hold of and reclaimed, or is the reclamation done when he comes in and in his earlier days?—The process is gradual with such a lad as that. We understand there is a great deal to do, and we are obliged to be very watchful and careful with him; but the boys who are the worst outside seldom give us much trouble inside. They fall into the usual way, and we bring good influences to bear on them. First of all we begin to trust them (you know what that is); we put the boy into a position of influence, and he begins to feel he is somebody and of some use in the world, and we gradually get round him like that. We can do nothing with punishment. It is the influence of a good man and a good matron, decent, honest people trying to do their very best and taking the greatest possible interest in those children, that brings our efforts to a successful issue.

2538. As far as the reformatory is concerned or indeed any school you are in favour of giving no punishment, wherever it is possible to avoid it, but would you go further and say you would have light punishment where you are obliged to punish at all?—I would not go to the length of saying we can do without punishment, but I will only add to that remark this, that in our best schools with the best management and best instruments we have the least punishment.

The witness withdrew.

Captain E. Schuyler called and examined.

Capt. E. Schuyler.

2539. (Chairman.) You are deputy governor of Wandsworth Prison?—Yes.

2540. How long have you been in that position?—Three years and two months.

2541. Has that been your first experience in the prison service?—Yes.

2542. With regard to the question of overcrowding, have you any information to give us as to the working of section 17 of the Prisons Act of 1865?—Yes. I am of opinion that it does not work, because during some years past at Wandsworth, on several occasions, we have prisoners in association and we have had to draft them to other prisons. We show in our return a certain number of cells. For instance, we show 1,160 cells, but in that number we include, first of all, the separate accommodation, which is shown as 1,034. Then we add on to that, 50 reception cells, 32 debtors' cells, 8 hospital cells, 11 punishment cells, 8 epileptic cells, 2 padded cells, 3 itch cells, and 12 corner rooms.

2543. Those are the rooms which are turned into association?—Yes. They show them there as 12 single, or 36 in association if you put three in each. That makes the total number 1160.

2544. You have only eight hospital cells?—There are eight cells which are shown in the occupation return as separate cells which could be used for prisoners, but we give them to the hospital, so that really strictly speaking, they cannot be used in the ordinary way. They are in the E wing and are used by the doctor for putting prisoners in that he wants to watch and who are not quite right, but at the same time they are shown as separate accommodation that we can utilise at any moment in our prison.

2545. I have got a return moved for by Mr. Morton, and I observe that on the 1st of August 1893, there were 1,134 prisoners in Wandsworth?—Yes, I daresay it would be about that.

2546. That is 100 more than is provided by the separate cells?—Yes.

2547. How would that extra 100 probably be accommodated?—Well, in this way, that they take into account the 50 reception cells and they take the debtor cells, and by a per-centage being in hospital—though by Act of Parliament those 32 cells are supposed to be set apart in a separate part of the prison and utilised only for debtors—but as a matter of fact we use the debtor part for surety and criminal prisoners.

2548. What is your average number of debtors?—About eight or nine. We could not accommodate more than 19 in our room. They must have a separate room for association, and 19 is the limit passed by the doctor.

2549. Then have you always criminals in the debtors' cells?—Well, we have very few. Down below in No. 1 there are five cells, and they have always got criminals in them. Then above on the next landing we have the surety prisoners. Then on the top we keep 19 or 20 cells for the debtors, and on the corresponding side in the landing we keep surety prisoners. We utilise a great deal of the debtor side for criminal prisoners.

2550. Then to remove this congestion have prisoners ever been put in association who otherwise would not have been in association?—Yes, they have. And it comes about in this way, in my opinion, that instead of keeping the 50 reception cells and the debtors' cells totally separate except for the few debtors there are, we show those cells as available at any moment to put prisoners into; and in the event of our numbers running high on the average of what we can possibly have in the prison, and our having a large number of receptions or a series of a large number of receptions, and a corresponding low number of discharges which we cannot control (at least we cannot control the receptions, and we can only control discharges within five days), and we suddenly find we have no room, then comes the association, and we must put the criminal prisoners into association, not the reception prisoners; then we have to associate them or suddenly apply to the Prison Commissioners for an order to send them away to other prisons.

2551. Then I understand that you are obliged either for the time you are under pressure to ignore Rule 26——?—We are decidedly.

Capt. E. Schuyler.

24 July 1894.

2552. Or to construe it in a very liberal way?—We are, and we certainly construe the debtors' portion of it in the wrong way. The Act of Parliament decidedly lays down that the debtors' portion is to be kept entirely apart for debtor prisoners, but we are bound to use it or we should be in a fix at times. It is the Prisons Act, 1865, Sec. 17. 4. which tells you it must be set apart, and ours is set apart as far as being barricaded off. It is section 17, I think.

2553–5. You are speaking of the 1865 Act?—Yes.

2556. Then with regard to the actual association, are you of opinion that any direct evils result from it?—Yes, I say that the result of associating is detrimental to discipline, injurious to the prisoner, and by suddenly transferring a number of prisoners away we throw the entire working staff out of order, and throw a tremendous lot of work on the prison officials, and it costs a great deal to the country.

2557. By the drafting away where there is pressure upon one prison?—Yes, because a large number of our prisoners, in fact nearly all of them, are from London districts; and if we send them, say, to Winchester, and such places as that, when their time is up they have to be fetched back.

2558. You think there are very serious evils arising from contamination?—I do.

2559. And would you like to see the association abolished altogether?—Only as far as the cell accommodation goes; decidedly so.

Adjourned for a short time.

2560. With regard to the general practice governing visits and communications, have you any views as to whether relaxation should be made?—Yes, I would like to tell you first of all the relaxation we make in our prison. There is a form called the "L. P. C. 3."* It is the "Local Prisons C. 3." That is really a transfer return, which is only supposed to be used when a prisoner is transferred from one prison to another. But we adopt the system at Wandsworth, which I do not believe is laid down; but it is done; and when a prisoner applies when he comes in to let his friends know something about his business, such as his cart and horse being left without anyone to look after them, or any business matter, he applies to the governor to write a letter, but the governor has no power to do that for 12 weeks; but he has one of those forms and we send it on, and we find that acts very well. We do that also at the end of his imprisonment.

2561. But the governor may write for a prisoner?—The governor may communicate anything to a prisoner which his friends send for him, or he may write and communicate if he likes.

2562. And he will do so frequently?—No, I do not think he does so frequently. He allows this form to go.

2563. As deputy governor, have you the same power in this matter as the governor?—Yes, exactly. I am in charge now of the prison, as the Governor is away.

2564. Then it would not happen that you would frequently write for a prisoner?—No, we do not, only on something very special; but we allow them to send this notice form, which is a great gain. It is not done, I believe, in other prisons. It was not done at Wormwood Scrubs, where I was for a time.

2565. Are you in favour of going beyond that and altering the general regulations?—Yes, I am; and the suggestion I would make is that a prisoner is constantly applying to the governor. Supposing he has had his letter, something occurs where he wishes to write specially, and the governor says, "I cannot grant "you power to write an extra letter. You must "apply to the inspector when he comes round." Supposing the inspector has just been round, it may be six weeks before he comes again. He may go on well into the next month before he comes again. Then the prisoner cannot have his special letter unless he gets the governor to write to the Commissioners for power. I would grant therefore the governor of a prison a discretionary power, in case of a special letter being wanted, to allow it.

2566. You would not say, I suppose, that all prisoners should have the same privileges with regard to letter writing or receiving visits—I mean all classes of prisoners, whether they are well behaved or badly behaved?—No, I am not in favour of altering the present system.

2567. But still you would give a larger discretionary power to the governor?—Yes, for special letters.

2568. What you say about letter writing you would say about visits?—No, I do not think he wants the extra visits if he times them well. It is only in case of his wanting to write something special about business that the governor need have a special authority.

2569. You think the regulations as to visitors work satisfactorily?—Yes; if a prisoner knows the ropes, so to speak, and waits his time, he can work it so that he sends, first, a letter, then has a visit, and then a letter; so that really every six weeks through his period when he becomes entitled to write a letter he can get his letter and visit alternately.†

2570. With regard to the agents of Prisoners' Aid Societies I think you have some views?—Yes. You refer, I see, to the recent Home Office circular. I cannot find it myself, but the only thing I can do is to tell you what we do. I do not know what is referred to in that Home Office circular.—(Circular handed to witness.)—I know that one. It is headed "Assistance to Prisoners on Discharge"; but we have a minute which came out in September which says that where a prisoner wishes to see the agent of any society on an application to the governor he is allowed to see him; but if an agent of a society wishes to see the prisoner he cannot do so unless he applies to the Prison Commissioners in the first place, that is so by the Inspector's Minute, which is dated the 27th September 1893.

2571. What is an inspector's minute?—There is a book kept there, and the inspector who comes constantly writes an order.

2572. The inspector of prisons?—Yes; our inspector comes down twice a month, and anything he has got specially to note for the governor to carry out he writes in the book, and the governor issues the order accordingly.

2573. But surely the inspector of prisons has not got power to give orders on his own authority?—Well, he does it; that is the authority we work on. If he comes and issues a minute like that, we do not question where it came from.

2574. But are these minutes by the inspectors in the nature of suggestions?—No, not as suggestions at all. It is an order put down that we are to carry out. It does not give any reason for it.

2575. I put some questions to Captain Stopford, and I asked him whether the functions of the inspectors were to report to the Commissioners. He said, "Yes." Then I asked him whether they had any power beyond reporting, and he said, "None, whatever"?—Well, I can only say that the inspector does come to our prison, and he writes certain things in a book which is brought to the governor's notice the next morning. It is sometimes in red ink, and the governor in his own Order Book copies that in for the benefit of the prison, and from that the orders are carried out.

2576. What was the date of this particular inspector's minute?—The 27th of September 1893. Then another circular came out with reference to this again on the 1st March 1894 referring to the one of 11th December 1893, which would be the one headed "Assistance to Prisoners on Discharge." The purport of it was that the rule should be placed in prominent places throughout the prison and in cells, but governors were asked to draw the attention of the visiting committee to it, and ask whether they approved of it. The governor of our prison brought it to the "Surrey Aid Society," which is our chief society, and they disapproved of it entirely being placed in the prison. I will only speak from what I have reason to believe was perfectly true, but the reason they gave was this, that at present they were inundated by prisoners with applications for assistance on discharge, and if it were posted up all over the prison, every prisoner in the place would want it. Of course I am speaking only of what I have been told on that. The governor has put a minute under it that the Surrey Aid Society expressed a distinct objection to it. I have seen it in the governor's own handwriting.*

* See Appendix V.; and Col. Garsia's Evidence, 11,694–5.

2577. That is that particular "Prisoners' Aid "Society"?—Well, that is our chief one. It is the "Surrey Aid Society."

2578. That acts with the central "Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society"?—Yes.

2579. Do you know that they object to it?—Only on that ground. I should think it was a good deal a question of funds.

2580. Supposing there are other societies which are quite capable of doing very good work to help prisoners;—let us say the Salvation Army—supposing the Salvation Army has power to help the prisoners, is not it right that some facility should be given to that society for so doing?—Yes, and that is my suggestion that in contradistinction to that inspector's minute I would not only grant a prisoner power to apply to those societies but I would allow the societies to help the prisoners without reference to anybody except the governor of the prison. The more help you give prisoners the less likely are you to get them into prison again.

2581. Then you would allow any society which you have reason to believe was a bonâ fide society for helping prisoners, or its agent to go to the governor and say, "I am interested in a particular prisoner, and "I wish to see him," and you would say that the governor should have discretion to grant that interview?—Certainly.

2582. Coming to prison offences and punishment, have you any suggestion to make on that head?—Yes, under that first head, where you ask who are the first offenders, and at what period, I would state that the chief offenders are those within three months and under. It is chiefly amongst prisoners who are on first-class hard labour, and on oakum picking. That would practically be within the first month. The reasons which I would give for that are that they are probably in a great measure in many instances at once brought under discipline for the first time; they are ignorant of the work they have to do; they are dazed at being in prison; they are sullen; they have a distaste for the work, and have not realised what committing an offence means, like the habitual does. There is no doubt the unproductive crank work has a good deal to do with prison offences, about which I will explain more later on.

2583. Do you agree that the habitual offenders are well behaved?—Yes, as a rule; simply for the reason that they know the prison well, and they know that if they don't behave themselves well at the beginning they will not get work in the prison, and will be shut up more (and the great ambition of every prisoner is to get out), and that if they misbehave themselves when they are out they will be put back in their cells and not be employed out again perhaps for a considerable period.

2584. Do you think the governor has a sufficient amount of discretion with regard to punishment?—Yes, I think so, quite; I think we have ample power.

2585. Would you approve of the present system of punishment by the visiting justices in the way it is carried out?—Well, I think it is a little too severe.

2586. The nature of the punishment, or the frequency?—No, the nature of it. For instance, I think that 14 days on No. 1 punishment diet is very hard upon a prisoner. Probably when he gets that punishment he is on very low diet to begin with, and if he is ordered 14 days' punishment diet No. 1, it means practically being shut up in a punishment cell with only small eyelets to let the light in; and then at first he has three days upon bread and water, and then three days upon stirabout, which is practically very little better than bread and water; then he goes back to three days' bread and water again, and so on; and according to the stage he is in at the time, it depends whether he gets his bed, so that it is a very hard punishment on a prisoner.

2587. Then that would come before the visiting justices?—That has nothing to do with the governor; he has not that power.

2588. But have you any alternative punishment that you would suggest?—For the visiting committees?

2589. No, for the dietary punishment which you just mentioned?—Well, I cannot say that I have.

2590. What do you think the chief evil resulting from it is?—I think it lowers the man; I think it makes him disgusted and sullen. That is my chief reason for it.

2591. Then have you any remark to make about the system of earning marks?—About the maximum and minimum, do you mean?

2592. Yes, or the general system?—Of course by the present arrangement a man can only earn the full marks, that is the eight marks if he is doing hard labour; but if he is in hospital he does not get any marks at all, except towards his privileges of writing and visiting. He gets no chance while he is in hospital of earning a gratuity, because he is not doing any work.

2593. But when a man is in hospital for a week I have understood that he gets marks allowed to him?—Only towards his visits and letters; his stage privileges, as they call them.

2594. But he only loses in regard to the gratuity on his discharge?—Yes, he is allowed his stage privileges but not his gratuity.

2595. You think he ought to be allowed that?—Yes, he is not in hospital through any fault of his own. He has been in prison for a month, say, and the prison régime and diet has perhaps upset him. He is is only in prison for a certain time and he loses all gratuity during the time he is in hospital.

2596. But if an allowance is made to him with regard to visits and so on, the same allowance should be made with regard to his gratuity?—I would not give him full marks, I would only give him six.

2597. Why not?—He is doing no work, and the order is that no man is to obtain marks for gratuity unless he is doing hard labour.

2598. But still it is not his own fault?—No.

2599. Ought not he therefore to be allowed the marks on the same scale as he was earning when he was well?—Yes, if you did not wish to make a distinction. The only evils against that would be that it might be open to malingering. If men knew that they would get them if they were in the hospital, they might try to get round the doctor and to be always getting into hospital. That is the only objection to that.

2600. Do you think that the system under which warders are appointed and their hours of labour are satisfactory?—Well, of course you mean in the way of selecting candidates.

2601. We have had evidence on that, and I think we are acquainted with the details, but I should like to have your opinion as to whether you can suggest any defect in the present system or whether it is desirable to do anything to get a better class of men if possible?—Well, of course, as we draw ours chiefly from the military and civilians—and the majority from the military—my opinion is (and I have had the selection of the candidates during all the time that I have been at Wandsworth, and they all have to pass through my hands, and some at Wormwood Scrubs), that the present civilian that we get now is not up to the standard that we used to get, that he is in my opinion illiterate and inclined to be rough, and is suited for certain prison warders' places like a labourer's, but he is not suited for a wing officer; that is, the officer who has to act more in connexion with the prisoners. And, I think, the reason for that is that the present civilian finds that he gets better wages and his Saturday afternoon, and his Sunday, and his evenings; and he certainly gets as good pay as the officer gets to begin with; and he is not subjected to any discipline, and is not shut up within walls. And I think the present military officer that comes is educated, because my experience is that we get so many non-commissioned officers who have all had to pass an examination both in a military point of view and a civil point of view. The private that comes has had to pass his education certificates, and therefore he comes half-trained to the prison to begin with, and he is used to discipline. I consider him the better officer myself.

* For Col. Garsia's evidence on this point, see 11,698–700.

Capt E. Schuyler.

2602. Do you think that the present hours are not too long?—I think they are too long. I have three returns here of a principal warder, a warder, and an assistant warder, which show exactly the number of hours they are employed throughout the month. Take it for one month and it comes out on an average, taking a principal warder, that he is on duty on an ordinary day for 10 hours; that is leaving out the meals, he is actually on duty 10 hours at least, and when he sleeps in, which comes about three times a month, he is on for nearly 23 hours.

2603. That is he is liable for duty?—The idea is that he is not on duty because he sleeps in the prison throughout the night, and I contend that he is on duty because he is liable to be called up, and the principal warder has to make visits during the time. For that he gets off next day, they say for a day and a half, but he does not get it because he contends that he could have gone off at 6 o'clock the next evening if he had not slept in, that he really only gets off from eight the next morning until six in the evening, and therefore the hours are excessive. What applies to a principal warder really applies in the same way to a warder and an assistant warder. My opinion is that all these long hours are apt to affect the prisoner by making the official irritated and inclined to vent his long hours, shut up within the walls, upon the prisoner.

2604. Do they complain much?—The officers complain of their long hours very much.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. J. H. Stone.

Mr. J. H. STONE called and examined.

2605. (Chairman.) You are chairman of the visiting committee at Birmingham?—I am.

2606. And you have long experience in that capacity?—Not as chairman. I have been chairman for about two years, and for about seven years I have been one of the visiting justices.

2607. Had you any practical experience of prisons before the Act of 1877?—No, I had not. The chairman previous to myself had many years' experience. That was Mr. Alderman Manton. He was on the prison committee for about 30 years, and I succeeded him as chairman two years ago. My knowledge of the previous working of the Act is more from hearsay.

2608. I understand he formed an opinion, which is very strong, that the transference by that Act was very unfortunate?—Yes. Mr. Manton has a very strong opinion upon it. My opinion is not so strong as his, but I daresay you have had a letter from him which is a very strong one, now my own feeling is that it has not been an advantage to the prisons.

2609. Of course we rather want to hear your own opinion, and from what you have experienced from your own knowledge, you say you do not form so strong an opinion as he does?—Well, I am very much disappointed with the Act. I anticipated very considerable improvements from it, and my own feeling is that there has been no improvement under that Act at all; that in limiting the local authority, the visiting justices, there can be no improvements in the prisons. Locally all interest is gone, with all power.

2610. Are you speaking from the point of view of Birmingham only, or as to the whole of the country?—No, I will say only as to Birmingham; and I feel that in Birmingham, if we had the power the visiting authorities had before, we should make considerable improvement in the ordinary working of the prisons.

2611. Then you speak from a Birmingham point of view only?—Yes.

2612. You will admit that looking at the question widely, for instance, from the point of view of economy, there has been a very large saving in consequence of the Act?—My own feeling was when the Act was passed that there were great abuses existing which, by that general Act, and the amending Acts, would be amended; whether that was right I cannot say; but I think locally, and as referring to Birmingham, it has not had that effect. The saving to Birmingham has been so small that locally we should not care about it. I believe it has been a general saving to the country; but Birmingham would not have felt it materially.

2613. May we take it that the Birmingham prison was always in a satisfactory condition?—I cannot say that every prison was, but I believe it to be so.

2614. If they were in a satisfactory condition prior to the Act of 1877, of course, however excellent the Act is, it could not effect much change with reference to Birmingham?—Well, we should have gone on making improvements and alterations.

2615. If the old system had gone on, what improvements would you have made?—Are you referring now to some suggestions of mine?

2616. Yes. You say that you would have effected the extension of the privilege of association, as now practised in chapel?—Yes, I think we should.

2617. What do you mean by that?—Association in labour, mat-making and any other industries the prisoners may have. We believe the working together has a good effect upon the prisoners.

2618. Do you think you would have been above the difficulties which the Government has been subject to in the agitation by the trade unions?—I think we should have ventured to oppose them. I think we should have tried it. You can take my opinion for what it is worth, but the Government would have a much greater difficulty in contending with trades unions than a local authority. It is a very wide question when a Government takes it up.

2619. What authority would you be under now. You would be under the Birmingham Town Council, I suppose?—Yes, or perhaps now, a Committee consisting of the Town Council and some from other districts. You see we now receive prisoners from other districts, and two-fifths of the prisoners in the Birmingham gaol are prisoners from outside Birmingham. We should very likely form a joint committee with those outside bodies and govern in that way rather than under the council alone.

2620. But the blame, if blame exists, with regard to the cessation of mat-making and other prison industries must rest on Parliament and not on the Prison Commissioners?—I am not blaming anybody.

2621. But you are pointing out where you would have done better than the prison authorities, and I suppose that you are aware that all prison authorities, from the Commissioners and the governors to the subordinate officials, are strongly against the restrictions imposed upon them in regard to prison industries owing to outside views?—I can understand that. I know it has been still greater in America; but I think we should have risked that. It does not matter what industry you commence if you add to the industries, and I think they should be added to. The same difficulty would have to be got over.

2622. Then you are in favour of the alteration of the rules referring to visiting and correspondence?—Yes, in our own gaol the governor confines himself strictly to the rules laid down, but there are cases in which I think it would be very advisable that the governor and the visiting justices should have power to relax at times.

2623. An alteration as to the plank bed regulation?—Yes, I cannot speak very strongly about that myself. That is a suggestion of the governor's at the last moment. He said, "would I answer that." The governor of the gaol thinks the plank bed is used too long. He thinks the old system of hammocks being given as a reward to prisoners would be of advantage. His idea is that you could relax that.

2624. I am afraid we must adhere to your own evidence?—Yes, I want to explain that.

2625. We had better have that from the governor. Then I think you have something to say with reference to the mark system?— Yes; the mark system seems to act rather unfairly. I will just give one instance of it. In the case of a man sentenced to penal servitude he works part of that time off. I think he can get relieved in about two years and three months, and at the end of that time he has a gratuity of nearly 3*l.* or 4*l.*, whereas a man sent into prison for two years hard labour can only earn 10*s.*, and he earns that 10*s.* if he behaves himself properly in the first six months. For the other 18 months he has got no sort of encouragement to go on behaving properly. We get convicts back into the gaol who tell all these things, and it is rather a discouragement to the men. There needs a revision of the mark system to make it fair between the two systems.

2626. You would be in favour of a local prisoner having power to earn remission?—Up to the very day he leaves.

2627. I mean of his sentence?—No, I think I would put it the other way, and rather give him power to earn more than 10*s.*

2628. Convicts have the power to earn a remission of sentence?—Yes.

2629. Would you apply that system to local prisoners who are under long sentences?—I think that would perhaps encourage them and do them good; but I looked at it only from the money point of view, that it would give a man a little more money when he went out of prison. If he has been there two years he is only able to take 10*s.* out with him, but if he was able to take 2*l.* or 3*l.* to start him in a little business, it would be an encouragement to the man in the end; I look at it from the money point of view only 2630. Then you are in favour of extending the power of visiting justices with regard to punishment?—Yes, I think if the visiting justices had power to extend the sentence for anything done wrong in the prison, it would have an effect on the unruly class. I should prefer it to flogging. Flogging is one of the powers which is left to the visiting justices. It is not much resorted to with us. I think last year only once and the year before not at all. I think if we had the power to say, "If you are guilty of any serious offence "we have power to detain you another month" that it would have a very deterrent effect on prisoners.

2631. Do you think severe punishments are necessary in prison?—The punishments in the Birmingham prison are always very light, and I say there was only one case of flogging in a year; but I think in these small cases, such as doing damage to the cell, and any matters of that sort, which are now dealt with by the justices giving seven days' punishment—the Governor only gives three days—but if I could tell a man "You will be kept in prison for another seven "days," I think it would be useful, because they are very anxious about the day they go out, and if they knew they could be kept a longer time, some of these unruly prisoners would be well-behaved.

2632. That would give considerable power to the visiting justices?—Well, you give them the power of flogging, and I think that is a much more serious matter than giving them an additional seven days detention. I believe the objection is that the justices try them in a secret court; it never comes before the public, but the question of flogging never does either. It is heard in a committee room, and the man is flogged, and you have power to give him 36 lashes with the cat, which is a very serious matter indeed. I would rather give a man an extra month's imprisonment than 36 lashes with the cat.

2633. You are aware that a great many people are against flogging and would take away that power altogether?—Yes; I do not think it will be taken away entirely.

2634. I suppose by some people an additional imprisonment might not be disliked so much as flogging, but still it might not be right?—We dislike flogging. In two cases I have had to do with a man has said, "It did me good. You have done me a great deal of good by it."

2635. In the Birmingham prison the punishment is very light?—Yes.

2636. You keep very well within the margin of your powers?—Yes, both the governor and the visiting justices do.

2637. And under those powers you are able to inflict much more punishment than is actually given?—Yes.

2638. And I suppose you would agree that the less punishment you give the better?—Very much so; but we believe with unruly prisoners the power of the visiting justices to have the keeping of them in prisor longer would have a very useful effect indeed. I should like also to abolish the dark cell punishment altogether.

2639. That is abolished, is it not?—No; there are only just a few holes in the window shutter, and that has been only lately altered. I think the punishment of a dark cell for a week is a barbarous punishment.

2640. Then I understand that you would be in favour of extending associated industrial work?—Yes, I should.

2641. To what extent can you give associated industrial work to prisoners now?—Very little. For mat-making we have no cell that would hold more than three men; but I would propose in mat-making twenty together, or something of that kind.

2642. Have you any shops—carpenters' shops or anything of that sort?—Yes; in the carpenters' shops six or eight men work, in the blacksmiths' shops three or four.

2643. How many men can you put to that kind of work?—About six in carpentering.

2644. But with the blacksmiths' shop and the other kind of work?—Well, I call the stoneyard associated labour; and we have generally from 60 to 80 working there.

2645. Then what proportion of your number would be employed in associated work?—We have about 430 or 440 men generally, and not more than 100 men I think are on associated work. There are 60 or 80 at stone breaking, and the others would not make more than 100.

2646. Do you approve of isolated work for short sentences?—Yes, for short sentences I should make them feel the want of liberty, but for long sentences I think association has a good effect.

2647. Do you use the crank in the cell?—The wheel we call it. We do not use a separate crank in a separate cell. The crank system is not what we call work in association; it is an ordinary treadmill.

Mr J. H. Stone.

24 July 1894.

2648. Is that what is called "unproductive"?—Well, we can grind corn or pump water with it. It is not understood amongst the prisoners that it is altogether unproductive.

2649. You do not have any unproductive labour?—No, sometimes the crank labour is unproductive, but that is seldom the case.

2650. Do you approve of that class of work which is unproductive?—Not at all.

2651. Do you think it has a bad effect on the prisoners?—It has not a good effect upon them. They tell you they do not like to pump wind.

2652. I think you have something to say about the appointment of deputy governors?—Yes; my feeling has for long been against a warder being promoted, and being chief warder.

2653. Deputy governors are not necessarily warders?—No; it really in Birmingham comes to that. Our chief warder is really deputy governor, and we consider him not a man of sufficient standing. He is really over the medical officer and the chaplain.

2654. Technically, he has not got the position of deputy governor?—No, he has not got it in name, because he is not of sufficient standing for such a position, but he has got it in practice.

2655. You say you have 420 prisoners?—Altogether. On the male side we have had over 500 at one time within the last year. The prison is built for 450 males, and on one day last year we had 510 males in. We have cells for 110 women, but we never have them full.

2656. But do you think that for all prisons with an average, say, of 500 or 600, you ought to have both a governor and a deputy governor?—Yes, and the deputy governor ought to be a man who is fit to be the superior of the chaplain, the medical officer, and others of that class.

2657. You are speaking now only with reference to Birmingham?—Yes. I understand there is the same feeling elsewhere, and I am speaking now from my own knowledge of the feelings of the officials in that matter.

2658. Taking Birmingham, the governor is not very often away?—No.

2659. He would be away for his holidays sometimes?—Yes, and he has had sick leave lately. He has been away for several weeks.

2660. Then the prison is in charge of the chief warder?—Yes. Just now at Birmingham, that chief warder is a new officer who has been with us not longer than 12 months. The old officer was with us for many years, he was only a promoted warder, and had been a warder in the gaol.

2661. Quite apart from any difference in status as between himself and the other officials of the prison, do you consider that he is not qualified to take charge?—Mechanically, I think he is qualified. He is doing his work well, but I think it would be better for the general management of the prison, if in the absence of the governor there was a man superior to the medical officer and the chaplain. He becomes their superior officer, and it causes dissatisfaction amongst these officers when they have to go to an inferior man to be controlled.

2662. Then you are in favour of a better classification of warders. Will you explain what you mean by that?—Well, they are called assistant warders now. It is a small matter, but they like all to be called warders and to have no distinction of class amongst them. It is a very small matter, but it would give rise to a better feeling amongst these men, for all to be called warders, their classification only depending upon their pay and seniority. I think that would be better than calling them assistant warders. I have only put those down as alterations we should probably adopt ourselves if we had the authority to do it.

2663. Do you think the hours of warders are too long?—No, I have never heard any complaint about it; I think both their holidays and their hours are very fair.

2664. You say that the justices are never consulted with reference to alterations or additions to the prison?—Yes.

2665. And sometimes those are of the most objectionable and discreditable character?—Yes, I know these are two very strong words, but take the first one. We had an alteration three years ago of the visiting cells in the visiting room. That was done without consultation. I suppose they considered their own way best, and so we were not consulted, but the result was that the visiting justices had to complain in consequence of the ill-feeling amongst the prisoners themselves. The arrangements were so altered that every visitor could see every prisoner on the other side, the result of which was that respectable prisoners—men committed for embezzlement, men who occupied a good position—were placed so that all the regular habitual criminals could see his wife when she visited him, and there was a very great deal of ill-feeling arose in consequence. The man said, "I am here for the first time, and I do not want "all these scamps to know my wife when she goes "out; and I want to know why these were altered." They were all altered back to the old system where every prisoner can only see the visitor that comes to see him; and it removed the dissatisfaction at once; but it was a matter that cost 20*l.* or 30*l.* to do; and five or six minutes conversation with those who knew about it would have prevented that outlay. In the other case the prison was built by the Birmingham authorities in something like prison architecture. On one side was the chaplain's house, on the other stood the gardens in front, making it as ornamental in that road as a prison could be. On the other side are a very respectable set of workmen's dwellings. In the last two years two rows of warders' houses have been built up, half the chaplain's garden has been taken away, and fitted up with the warders' houses; half the governor's garden also, and the houses built there are of the most wretched appearance. In the next 10 or 15 years, when the Birmingham smoke has worked into them, there will not be a worse set of houses in the whole of Birmingham. It injured a number of houses in that street which was fairly respectable, and many of us think that the local council, who were responsible for the street, might have been consulted. As it is the council and the borough surveyor think that the street is totally spoilt in consequence of the look of the houses that have been put up. We did feel rather strong about them.

2666. You think that you ought to be consulted more, and do you think you ought to have more discretionary power allowed you?—Not in those cases, but we think, as a matter of courtesy, it would have been well to talk to us about them.

2667. But as regards the various points of prison management, do you think the visiting justices ought to have more power?—Yes, the majority of the visiting justices say they ought to have the powers they had before, and that it would be wise to repeal the present Act and revert to the old system, or something near it.

2668. I suppose you hold those views, because you would say that every locality has an interest in its local prisons, and is desirous to look after them to the best of its ability and to do what it can for them?—Yes, we know the local prisons of the district, and the local character of the prisoners themselves.

2669. I think you say that the visiting justices retain their position in the belief that the Prisons Act of 1877 will be repealed?—Yes. I think otherwise you would have a difficulty in making up a committee in Birmingham at all to carry out the duties of that Act. Five out of eight men are there because they are connected with reformatory and educational work. It is a link between the two. Men have to be reformed, and they want to do something in that direction, but I do not think otherwise you would make up a committee. The position of visiting justices now is that of unpaid servants of the Prison Commissioners, and they do not accept the position.

2670. How many visiting justices are there?—Eight, and five out of those eight are men that have been connected for years with reformatory work, and still retain their position on the committee really out of a philanthropic feeling.

2671. Were any of them in office before the Act of 1877?—Yes. I do not know how many, but the last chairman was, I think, for 20 or 30 years.

2672. Have you formed any views with regard to the better classification of prisoners, and more particularly with regard to young prisoners?—Well, I do not quite agree with some of the members of my committee on the reformatory question. Mr. Alderman Manton, our last chairman, is really the author of that last Bill which was brought in by Lord Leigh and Lord Norton against sending young children to prison first.

2673. I am speaking now more particularly with regard to young prisoners in prisons. Do you think that any alteration is wanted of the present system under which there is a hard and fast treatment, both for young and for old prisoners?—I do not think it would make very much difference if you prevented children coming in under 12 years of age. It depresses me terribly sometimes to go into a cell and find a couple of youngsters there, between 9 and 10 years of age; I think that ought not to be allowed. Children ought not to go to prison under a certain age, say 12 years of age, and above 12 years of age I do not think it matters much about classification.

2674. Take, for instance, the case of a lad of 16 who falls into bad habits, and gets caught and committed to prison. There he is more or less associated with every sort of criminal. Do you think that is the right way of treating a lad of 16, and treating him just as you would treat a hardened offender?—That depends upon whether it is his first offence. Some of those lads of 16 in large towns are as criminal as others at 25. Do you mean sending him to a reformatory afterwards, or a prison only?

2675. Whatever the arrangement may be, do you think that the present system is satisfactory?—If he were to be sent to a reformatory afterwards, I would not raise the age beyond 16.

2676. I am taking the case of a lad who comes to prison for the first time. You would agree, I suppose, that the imprisonment acts in two ways upon him. First of all, there is the punitive side of it, the detention; then, in the second place, there is the fact that his having been in prison goes against him perhaps all his life?—Yes.

2677. Is that the kind of punishment that ought to be awarded to a lad of 16, for, say, picking a pocket?—No; it is so serious a matter that I do not know what to do, unless you have altogether separate prisons and call them by some other name than prison. You will have to punish the lad in some way to deter him from doing it again. In a large prison you might make a separate department of it altogether, and I would not say it would not be advisable. I have not thought much about that; but as far as the reformatory school goes, I would not raise the age to 18 in that case. I think a sentence of less than five years in a reformatory is no good. My experience is that a sentence of three years is not of the advantage it should be. I have been a manager of Stoke Reformatory at Droitwich. We keep them there for three years and get them out at farm work or trade work for the next two years. That is the responsible part of the sentence, and we are responsible for their doing their work well. That is the reason I advocate never less than five years for a reformatory.

2678. Would you make it compulsory on the managers to keep them five years?—Yes. In my own experience five years is not too long.

2679. You would not let them out on licence?—Yes; at the end of three years I should, but if they do not do their work they are still our prisoners. They are only detained in the reformatory for three years.

2680. You have rather a strong opinion, I think, about short sentences for habitual offenders?—Yes; my own feeling about them is that they do not do any good at all. If a man is habitually coming backwards and forwards to prison I think society should be protected, and no consideration given to him after he has had his chance. I might state as an instance of that, an old warder was talking to a Birmingham burglar, and he said, "5*l.* a week you "can manage to steal at any time." He replied. "20*l.* a week does not keep me when I am out," and that man was in and out of prison always.

2681. You say that you think insanity in the Birmingham prison is very rare?—Very rare indeed. Our returns of insanity are about ·02. We have a mere nothing of it.

2682. And those cases that you have come in you do not think have been affected by prison?—Sometimes it is the result of delirium tremens, that is really in the system before they come in.

2683. You have no reason to think that the prison discipline acts upon them?—No. I have very carefully watched them, and I have had a large mass of figures got out to produce to you if you want them, but it is not 1 per cent.; it is not a quarter of 1 per cent., and we have 8,000 prisoners who went through the gaol last year.

2684. (Mr. O'Connor.) What amount of visiting does your visiting committee do?—There are eight magistrates, and two of them take a fortnight, the next two a fortnight, and so on.

2685. One visit a fortnight?—Yes, every prisoner is supposed to be seen every fortnight, and as chairman I am there myself continually.

2686. How long would you give punishment diet for?—The governor now has power to give it for three days; we have never given it for more than seven.

2687. You are in favour of mild punishments?—Yes, very mild punishments. I think that is a mild punishment. As a rule the bulk of punishments are for less than three days.

2688. Do you ever take any notice of the books the prisoner has?—Yes, I have done so.

2689. Is it a rule in your prison that no prisoner is to receive other than religious and school books until he has served two months of his sentence?—Well, I should relax that.

2690. But is it the rule?—Yes, I believe that is true. I am often in the library with the man who has charge of the books, and I look over his books and take an interest in them.

2691. I take it a great many of those religious books are nothing but maudlin stuff?—They are what you would get in an ordinary place.

2692. They are not likely to do a man any good?—I do not think they would. They are something for them to read, but as far as the library is concerned it is a very general library. I have been a chairman of public libraries for a good many years, and I say the books are a very fair selection.

2693. When the attention of the visiting committee is drawn to a case of misbehaviour which it is beyond the power of the governor satisfactorily to deal with, how do you arrive at a decision as to the particular punishment to be meted out?—It is very much as ordinary punishments are given from the bench.

2694. Take, for instance, the female side of the prison. If a woman requires to be punished, do you take the opinion of the matron?—Not as to the amount of punishment; we only take from her the evidence. I may say the whole time I have been a visiting justice we have only had to deal with two women.

2695. Take the male side. When a man has to be dealt with severely, do you take the opinion of the governor as to his past conduct?—Yes, we refer to the book to see what he has previously had, and if he has become an habitual offender we should deal with him accordingly.

Mr. J. H. Stone.

2696. Does the governor suggest how a man ought to be dealt with?—Sometimes he does, but we do not always follow his advice if we think the evidence is not sufficient. We do not take his suggestion as the one we should go by. We act on our own discretion entirely.

2697. Do you think that the discretion of the governor might be usefully extended in respect of punishments; I do not mean to come up to the level of the punishment you could give?—You mean to increase his powers?

2698. Yes?—No; I should not suggest increasing or decreasing them; they work very satisfactorily. I should not be inclined to give a governor too much power to punish.

2699. Would you give him a discretion in the direction of relaxation?—Yes; my experience of the present governor is that he would relieve a prisoner rather of punishment than inflict it.

2700. He would be glad of having a discretionary power of relaxation?—Yes. If we give a discretionary power, for instance, to say that a man shall have 18 strokes with the birch, and the governor is to say when he is to have the second half, invariably the governor gets the second half taken away if the man behaves properly.

2701. Are the schoolmasters in your prisons also warders?—No.

2702. You have separate schoolmasters?—No, I should consider them part of the office staff.

2703. They do not do warders' duty?—No, they only teach; but that is a case in which things ought to be altered, and put into classes of 12, or something of that sort. Going from cell to cell to teach men is quite a failure.

2704. Is your staff sufficient for your number of prisoners?—I believe it is about 38.

2705. You think it is adequate?—I think so.

2706. Is there any Sunday exercise?—Do you mean to chapel?

2707. Is there any Sunday exercise for the prisoners?—In the yard; there is no work.

2708. On the Sunday?—Yes.

2709. Your staff is sufficient for that?—Quite sufficient.

2710. Do you consider it would be a hardship on the prisoners not to have exercise on Sunday?—I think it is a day's change for them.

2711. If your staff was not sufficiently great to admit of exercise on Sunday, you would say it ought to be increased?—Yes; I think prisoners should have exercise the whole of the days of the week; you should not shut them up the whole time; it would be almost a punishment on the Sunday to do it.

2712. Do you think the one hour a day they have out of the 24 is enough?—I think so.

2713. You would not give them more than the one hour out of the cell?—No, they are very healthy, and I think that is quite sufficient.

2714. (Dr. Bridges.) I understand you would modify the system of isolation that is at present practised?—Yes, I would.

2715. But that for the first days or weeks, may I take it, you believe in isolation?—Yes, I think for seven or fourteen days. I think for a short sentence of that kind I believe in it.

2716. When would you begin the association plan?—Perhaps at the end of a month if a man behaved himself properly, but in short sentences of under a month I would not give association.

2717. You are not of opinion that much danger results from association with other prisoners?—No; they associate now in the chapel; 400 or 450 of them sit side by side, and it is not once a month you get complaints from a warder that they have been talking in chapel.

2718. You think you could carry out associated labour on a strict system of silence?—Yes, I would have sufficient supervision to enforce that.

2719. That would require an increased staff of warders, would it not?—Not necessarily. I think their behaviour would be good.

2720. You have not thought specially of that question of the increase of the staff of warders?—No, I think the increase would be very slight.

2721. Have you any ground round your prison at Birmingham?—No; we have the exercising yards and the stone yards. I dare say the exercising yards are two acres and the stone yards three or our acres, but outside we are bounded by a wall.

2722. I suppose in your stoneyard each prisoner is in a sort of bunk of his own?—No, only in bad weather. There are 60 or 80 men together as closely as the chairs in this room are.

2723. You have not found any particular harm result from that?—No, the complaints of talking in the stoneyard are very slight. There is nothing that tends to disorder, and if it is observed it is stopped.

2724. Do you begin stone breaking at about the end of a month?—If a man is sentenced to three or six months' hard labour he would be put on to some labour at once.

2725. What amount of stone is a man expected to break?—I am not certain about that, but both that and the oakum picking they can well do within the allotted time.

2726. Oakum picking is, of course, done in the cells?—Yes; but whatever work is done there can be well done by the prisoners.

2729. You have not considered the question of agricultural work in connexion with prisoners?—No. We have no opportunity of trying it. I know it works satisfactorily amongst the boys at Stoke.

2730. You say that you have very little insanity in your prisons. Have you—not what would be called insanity, but feeble-mindedness? Have you a certain number of prisoners of that kind—weak-minded prisoners?—Yes, we do get them. The medical inspection is very close over them, and if we find they are not answerable for their actions we get them removed to an asylum.

2731. I was speaking rather of men or women who are not fit for a lunatic asylum, but who have not the ordinary allowance of wit?—Yes. I cannot call to mind any instance.

2732. I mean people who in the workhouse would be classed as imbeciles?—We have very few of them. If we had any number I am sure that matter would have been under consideration.

The witness withdrew.

The proceedings were adjourned until Tuesday the 31st instant at 11 a.m.

SIXTH DAY.

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.
Sir JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts; and
Miss ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Secretary.

Mr. JOHN TREVARTHEN called and examined.

Mr. J. Trevarthen.

31 July 1894.

2733. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You are the secretary at Redhill School?—Yes, at the Farm School.

2734. The proper name of that, is what?—The Philanthropic Society's Farm School.

2735. How long have you been in the service?—32 years; since the first of May 1862.

2736. Do you know anything of the previous history of Redhill School Reformatory?—Yes, I made it a matter of study when I first came, and I have refreshed my mind from time to time. The Society, if I may be allowed to give a short description of its previous history, came into existence about two years after John Howard made his celebrated inspection of prisons, and it was in consequence of some of the revelations that were made known in that inspection that the Society took up the case of deserted children, the children of those who, because they were left without fathers or mothers in many cases through those executions which were so frequently the punishment of crime in those days, were left uncared for. The Society started first of all by putting out a baby to nurse in what was then the village of Hackney, and they went on until they had established 12 cottages with children in them. Then they removed from Hackney to St. George's Fields. That was in 1792. In 1788 they began their work; in 1792 they removed to St. George's Fields, they had a school which they called the Reform school, in what is now called Bermondsey. They had a manufactory also at St. George's Fields which is just behind the Blind School as it now stands. In the first eight years of its history it received 314 cases.

2737. Were they criminals?—They were children of criminals. In 1806 the Society obtained a special Act of Incorporation, the preamble of which stated that "the "charity had been of considerable use to the public." In 1817 the Police Committee of the House of Commons reported; "This excellent Institution as well deserving "of more extended patronage, not only for the end the "Society had in view but also for the success which "has attended its labours." In 1845 the increasing number of juvenile delinquents and the better provision that was made for the offspring of convicts under the Poor Law led the Committee to abandon what they had hitherto held—a female school (as well as a school for boys), and they concentrated their efforts at that time on criminal boys. London at that time furnished 25 per cent. of all the boys committed to prison in England and Wales. That was in 1845. In 1848 at the request of our late Treasurer, Mr. Wm. Gladstone (who was the first cousin of the late Premier, and so connected with the chairman), came in contact with the work at St. George's Fields, and was induced to recommend the Committee to make a study of the experience gained in Mettray. The result was that Mr. Sydney Turner, who was then chief of the school, went out with Mr. Painter, one of the London Police Magistrates, and one of the Committee of the Society. The result of their observations at Mettray was to recommend the Philanthropic Society to remove from London, and become an agricultural colony like that at Mettray. In 1848 they went out, and the result of that was that the Committee determined to establish this agricultural colony somewhat upon the lines of Mettray, adapted, of course, to English habits. I have been myself to Mettray, and compared the two things and M. De Metz, the founder of Mettray, has been to Redhill in my time; and two or three other times besides, and he called Redhill "a grand development of Mettray." It has divided the institution into small families rather than having one barrack-like arrangement, and so we have at the present moment 300 boys in the school in five houses of 60 each. When I first went to the school we had 50 only in each house, but we gradually, after the experience of former years, found it was possible to enlarge our schools without injuring the discipline or efficiency of them, and we have risen to the present numbers.

2738. In 1848 how did you get control of criminal boys?—We obtained them from the prisons—most of them—and they were all cases under conditional pardon.

2739. You received the boys through the Home Secretary?—Yes.

2740. Under a conditional pardon?—Yes, as the result of the experience that we had gained from the conditional pardon cases that were received down to the time when the Reformatory Act came into existence. The number was 620 under conditional pardon. These were youths ranging from 12 or 13 up to 20.

2741. You had conditional pardon cases up to 20?—Yes, we had free transfers from Parkhouse, which was an endeavour to establish a special prison for juveniles; but that broke down. Sir Joshua Jebb recommended it, and it went on for some years, but it did not answer. We took some of the boys that were sent to other schools also.

2742. That was a regular boys' prison?—Yes, it was a juvenile prison.

2743. Do you know why that did not answer?—I cannot give you the reason; but it did break down, and it was turned into a convict prison, which it now is.

2744. What were the conditions of a "conditional pardon"?—They were lads under long sentences for offences such as we should now consider somewhat trivial, but which were then punished with heavy sentences.

Mr. J. Trevarthen.

31 July 1894.

2745. It was a revocable pardon?—Yes, at least it was granted on specific conditions. Mr. Turner, for instance, went to a prison. The mode of proceeding ordinarily was this—that certain boys under sentence for a long imprisonment were seen by somebody representing the school—mostly Mr. Turner—and those of them whose character and condition, and so on, appeared to indicate that they might be sent to such a school as ours were selected. The Queen gave a conditional pardon, which was signed by Her Majesty in those days; afterwards by the Home Secretary on her behalf, and those boys were released from the sentence under which they were, on the condition that they were received into the Philanthropic Society's farm school until they were duly discharged by the managers thereof, and that discharge depended as to length of time upon their conduct.

2746. So that they were detained personally by you and could be returned to prison if necessary?—I imagine that would be the case.

2747. And that system was used for boys over 16?—Yes, we had between 1846 and 1856 258 lads at Redhill who were between 16 and 20 years of age at the time of their admission. There were 258 boys who ranged from 16 to 20 years of age, and those I have traced out the subsequent history of, to see what the result was, and I find that 88 per cent. of them were not re-convicted.

2748. That system of taking boys of over 16 terminated on the passing of the Reformatory Act?—It did. The Reformatory Act prescribed that no boy should be received over 16 years of age.

2749. Where do you get your boys from mostly?—Half of them from London, roughly speaking. We get them from the Home Counties also. I will give you a list of those that we received last year, which will give a guiding idea as to the sources from which we receive them. We received 71 boys into the school. There were from Berkshire 2, from Essex 4, from Kent 2, from London 41, from Middlesex 4, from Nottinghamshire 1, from Surrey 4, from East Sussex 1, from West Sussex 1, from the Borough of Barnstaple 1, from Brighton 2, from Croydon 1, from Exeter 1, from Folkestone 2, from the City of London 1, from Nottingham 1; there was 1 from Reading and 1 conditional pardon.

2750. Who decides whether a boy shall be sent from the Metropolitan area to you or to Feltham?—Feltham is an industrial school.

2751. It is only an industrial school in name?—Yes, for industrial school cases.

2752. It is an industrial school by a private Act of Parliament, meaning much the same thing as a reformatory school?—Yes, I am afraid between the two things it is very often obscured in practice; but the intention as between the two classes of schools is quite distinct.

2753. The intention of industrial schools and reformatory schools is quite distinct?—Yes.

2754. But Feltham is under the Industrial Schools Act?—Yes. Feltham was originally established under a special Act for Middlesex as an industrial school. They take some boys under what they call the Middlesex Act—the Act under which they were created; and they also take some boys under the general Act; that is, the Industrial Schools Act.

2755. But under their own private Act, although called an industrial school, they take reformatory cases?—Not as such.

2756. A boy up to the age of 16 may be sent to Feltham for five years?—No, up to 14 only.

2757. Feltham takes no boys over 14?—No, no industrial school does.

2758. Under its own Act?—Under its own Act, or any other Act, so far as I know.

2759. I was under the impression that the private Act of Feltham, as an industrial school, covered exactly the same ground that the Reformatory Act covered?—It was intended to include, I think, a more criminal class of boys than the ordinary industrial school; that is, their own private Act was. To that extent it goes, of course, in the direction you are suggesting, that it was to some extent a reformatory school; but the broad distinction to be kept between the two classes of schools is this, that reformatory boys are boys who have distinctly become identified with crime, and are bent on a criminal career, as proved by their previous antecedents or convictions, and industrial boys are those who are neglected, or who are tending towards crime, but which is not actually on them; but, as a matter of practice, we have received several Feltham boys after they have been there, who have been transferred to us for subsequent offences committed in the school, which are recognisable under the Act, and I find on going into their previous history, they are often sent for petty larcency first, that is to say, they are not sent to prison for felony, but treated as for trifling offences.

2760. Then no boy may be sent over 14?—But they may be retained until they are 18, I think. I am not quite sure as to that.

2761. That is under their private Act?—I think that is so, but I am not quite sure.

2762. You are not perfectly acquainted with the Feltham Act?—No, I am only telling you in a general way what I think about it. I know the Industrial Schools Act also in a general way.

2763. That is the public general Act, which we all know more or less, but Feltham has also in operation its own private Act, which to some extent covers the reformatory grounds?—For many causes they did not at first take any cases under the general Act. The difference to them was, among other things, that the county paid for the whole of those received under their private Act, and when they put themselves under the general Act they got the Treasury grant like other schools, and I think they have gradually come to take a large number of them. I think it is not an unnatural result, but I may take this opportunity of saying that at Redhill during the whole of my time, and I have reason to think before—but particularly during my own time I can speak with confidence, because the department of receiving applications for admission and so on is my own branch of work—we are always very particular indeed never to take cases where they ought to be sent to an industrial school. There is a great deal of confusion in the public mind, even on the bench, as between these two classes of schools, and there is a difficulty in dealing with a child between the two; but as far as we can obtain information all the antecedents of the boys and their character and fitness are gone into. We often reject boys because they appear to us to be not of the class the reformatory school is intended for, that is a distinctly criminal class, because we think there is danger to them in their admission. We have confined our admissions to absolutely criminal boys, and the worse they are the more we think them fit for being received into a hospital for the almost incurable cases. We go upon the principle that having limited accommodation we render greater service to the country when we take those that are most difficult to deal with, and the result is most gratifying.

2764. In your five houses you attempt some system of classification of younger and older boys?—Yes, we do. The first thing is that we have for many years assigned all boys under 14 years who come into the school to one house for obvious reasons. There are many reasons for putting boys of 14 alone, and not mixing them with bigger boys. It lessens temptation and difficulties of many kinds. Then when those boys get older we transfer them to some other house, which I may call the senior house. If a boy comes into the school who is over 14, unless he is diminutive in size, we should put him in one of the other four houses. I have the ages of those at present in the school. The average ages of the boys now in the school including the little boys' house, is $16\frac{2}{12}$ths. The average age, excluding the little boys' house, would raise it to 16½ths. The average age on admission of the boys now in the school is 14½ths, and the average age on discharge last year was 18½th. We have at the present moment 2 boys under 12. Under 13 years we have four more; under 14 years we have 23; under 15 years we have 42; and under 16 years we have 63 in addition. Then we have 95 boys who are between 16 and 18; and of boys between 18 and 19 we have 39; between 19 and 20 we have 18; and between 20 and 21 we have 4.

2765. How is it you have boys of 20 and 21?—Because a boy may come in at 16 for 5 years.

2766. But how about the Act of last year?—That only applies to cases since that Act has been passed. That is for the future.

2767. Boys admitted subsequent to that cannot be detained after 19?—No.

2768. But boys who were sent before that can be detained until 20 and 21?—Yes.

2769. How many boys have you between 20 and 21?—Four. We have 18 between 19 and 20; we have 39 between 18 and 19. That is we have 61 over 18 years of age. One fifth of our boys at the present moment are over 18 years of age and more than half of them are over 16 years of age.

2770. Why do you detain the boys between 20 and 21. Are not they old enough to gain their own livelihood?—It is not a question of gaining their livelihood; it is a question of their character being sufficiently established to justify our sending them out. We keep a boy as long as it is desirable to keep him to ensure his after success in life. Sometimes a boy may have such a great amount of past habit to undo that it is not easy to put on an entirely new life and character.

2771. These boys between 20 and 21 must have been with you for four years at least?—Yes; then sometimes it arises from the difficulty of finding a suitable discharge for the boy. We think it merciful to a boy, whose home surroundings are so bad, that to send him home (which may be the only course open to us) would be a very unkind thing to do, to keep him as long as we can.

2772. The Inspector of Reformatories who was here, reflected, I think somewhat severely, upon the practice of reformatory schools in general, keeping their boys to that sort of age?—Of course, that is a general statement which it is difficult to meet, except by a correspondingly general one. I can only say we do not deal with them in the mass, but with individuals one by one; and as soon as we can, with proper regard to the purposes of the boy's future life, discharge him. We have very strong inducements to get rid of him because the Treasury put the screw on us in this way, that when a boy has been with us three years, no matter what his character, or his antecedents, or his future may be, the rate is reduced by one-third. They pay 6*s.* a week for him until he has been in the school for three years, and is 16 years of age, and then they drop it to 4*s.* Within the last 10 years we have lost 1,970*l.* through that reduction of grant, which is practically a screw that is put on us, and in these hard times, therefore, we have every inducement of that kind to discharge them.

2773. It would be an error then to say that reformatory managers keep boys of mature age, because they are profitable to them?—Oh, dear, no; that is not in the least the case. If you are speaking of licenses, I have taken generally for the information of the Committee the statistics for 10 years. I thought that was better than giving one year. We have granted in the last 10 years 164 licenses, and we have revoked 35 of them because the boys were not going on satisfactorily. We do not license so many as we did for these, among other reasons. You know that the labour market at the present moment is tremendously overcrowded; and boys who like ours, labour under the disadvantage of coming from a school like ours do not have the best chance of obtaining employment; and other boys of equal fitness would be taken in preference to them, and to find places which are suitable and satisfactory where an employer will report to us regularly, and where the boy's home surroundings or the places they are to live in are satisfactory also are increasingly difficult to find; and when we have kept boys as long as we can keep them in the boys' own interest and send them home we very often find they go weeks and months sometimes before they can find work, which is a difficulty we used not to have to meet. That is one reason why licenses have gone down. The openings for boys in and about London are very much more difficult to obtain than formerly. In rural districts you may find them still, but very few of our boys come from that part of the country. Therefore, we have enormous difficulty in finding places for them. Another point is that to send a large number of boys out from the school on license, to work out properly, involves a considerable amount of supervision and looking after them at their work and their homes, and obtaining frequent reports of them and being satisfied with their going on well. This means a considerable expense. The Treasury gives us a grant of 2*s.* a week for 13 weeks, and 1*s.* a week afterwards for 26 weeks, and that is all the assistance they give. If we had a more liberal allowance for supervision of boys (and this only covers about the expense of going out occasionally after them) we might in our case, I think, even start a home for our boys in London where they might come. We have a sufficient number for that purpose, but our funds would not permit us to enter upon anything of that kind, so that we have not been able to meet anything like that in the face of the difficulty that exists from a deficiency of labour. Another thing is that to work a license system perfectly, you must have reliable people to whom they are sent, and the parents, who, in the first instance, would be interested to find such places for them are really so unprincipled and so little to be depended upon, that it is no uncommon thing for a boy to have gone home on license—most respectable and promising boys who go home to places that have been reported upon by the parents, and of which we have had comparatively satisfactory accounts in other ways, and yet when the boy goes home in two or three weeks he finds that it is impossible for him to continue, because the circumstances under which he works, and so on, are so inimical to his moral welfare. We had a most satisfactory carpenter boy who went home to a place which was said to be a most excellent opening. The boy came back in a fortnight and said if he remained there he would unlearn all he had been taught of what was right and true and pure at Redhill. The surroundings were so bad, the pay was so small, and the temptation so great that he begged to be taken back again to the school.

2774. It is entirely according to your idea of the necessity of the case whether you keep boys to such mature years?—Yes. I should like further to make this remark, that we at the school at Redhill would compare in the office unfavourably with other schools as to the number of boys we send on license, partly for the reasons I have given, but in addition, there is this reason; that we emigrate from Redhill much more than from other schools. One-third of all the emigrations from reformatory schools have been from Redhill, and when we emigrate a boy he is discharged earlier, having qualified himself by a character, and so on, and we obtain that boy's discharge from the Home Secretary, and also for the army, where we send a good many boys.

2775. These represent licenses elsewhere?—Yes.

2776. The Act of last year limited the age to 19. Do you approve of that change?—I do not. I have a very strong objection to the limit having been introduced. To my mind it was absolutely uncalled for, and regarding (as I do) the reformatory work, as one of the most important character—one of the most beneficial for the country and its subjects—I think any attempt to minimise the area of its influence is a great mistake. Apart from which I think there is no reason in the world why older boys should not be received and dealt with satisfactorily. I have shown you by our ancient history that we used to do it in "old times"; and when we have the opportunity of judging now, as we continually have, from the conduct and deportment of older boys, we find we have very much more to work upon than we have with smaller boys, and the results are more satisfactory. I have no doubt that we could deal quite as satisfactorily or even more so, with cases up to 18 than we can do with those we now receive; but, of course, when a limit is placed on us by this Act that no boy may be detained after 19, it cuts us up by the roots.

Mr. J. Trevarthen.

2777. It would be no use sending a boy at 18?—It would be perfectly useless, because the boy would have so much to unlearn, and we should have so limited a time to do it in.

2778. Would you recommend that the age for admission to reformatories should be extended, and to what age?—I would extend the age of admission to 18.

2779. You would recommend that the age of admission to reformatory schools should be extended to 21?—No, 18 for admission, and that they should be detained until they were 21, which we have been able to do until lately, but we have not been able to receive them beyond 16. Then I am glad to say that magistrates sometimes, in what is called "the judgment of the court," will send us a boy who is a little bit older, and professedly 16, and we find they are the most grateful for the opportunities given them, and turn out best in the long run.

2780. You have a general knowledge of reformatories in England?—I have.

2781. I suppose you would hardly say that all the schools in England would be capable of doing what you are doing at Redhill?—I do not think they would.

2782. You have opportunities of classification, which they have not elsewhere?—Yes.

2783. It might be possible perhaps to license some of the existing reformatory schools, so as not to receive small boys?—I think so; I think it would be a very great advantage to the whole movement.

2784. In that way there might be a classification of reformatories?—Yes.

2785. Just as you classify your houses in other places, the schools might themselves be classified?—Yes, and I think the managers of schools might be asked to make their choice. They might be asked, "Will you take junior cases or senior cases," and they could adapt their arrangements accordingly.

2786. Perhaps you can suggest the line of demarcation you would make between the junior and senior?—I should say a school laying itself out for senior cases should take none under 15 on admission, and they might be allowed to retain them if the age of admission permitted it until they were 21. Of course they would come for not less than three years; that is a very great improvement in the Act of Lord Leigh, which by cutting out that ridiculous two years' sentence, has done a good service. We never received a two years' boy; we always refused it, because if a boy really required reformatory treatment, two years was an absurd time to send him.

2787. You say a senior school should receive no boys under 15, and that a junior school should receive no boy over 15?—I do not think they ought. I should draw the line at 15 or so. We should find no difficulty, as you have observed, in sending all that class of boys to one house. I might instance this in this way, that I think it desirable to put line down as low as 15. Some might perhaps suggest a higher one, but my reason for suggesting 15 is this, that the more you can make a school like the actual world the boy has to live in, the better preparation and training it becomes for the future, and if you have a school of boys all over 17 or 18 and up to 21, it would not be the least like the outside world. It would be a selection of boys of one age, and it would not give the same chances for the development and training of character that smaller boys being in the house would afford. For instance, bullying and fifty other things would suggest themselves. If you want to train a boy to be manly in his deportment, you must give him the opportunity of being otherwise, and I think the influence of the younger boys would be better than having boys on too hard and fast lines.

2788. Are the views you have expressed generally held by reformatory masters?—I think so. The only exception ever taken by other schools is that they are all very particular, and wisely so, that if any change were made in this respect it should be accompanied by the classification to which I have referred, and that it would be perfectly impossible to receive senior boys into the schools as they are now constituted, but that by making a proper classification it would be very easy to do so.

2789. I think you are one of the joint secretaries of the Reformatory Societies' Association?—I am the honorary secretary of the Reformatory Committee of the National Association for certified Reformatories and Industrial Schools.

2790. So that in that capacity you are generally acquainted with the opinion of Reformatory Managers?—I am in communication with all the managers of reformatories in the country, and have had special opportunities of acquiring their impressions about it.

2791. You make a point of keeping a record of your boys after they have left?—Yes, for four years at least after discharge.

2792. What per-centage do you find doing well?—Here, again, I will give it you for 10 years, which is a fairer guide than any one year. The average of our discharges in the last ten years of those who have been followed up for at least four years and in some cases more who are now doing well is 91·7 per cent. That is, of course, remembering the class of boys we take. Of those we have discharged in the 10 years who have been re-convicted the proportion is 6·9, and of unknown (as showing the extent to which we keep touch with them), it is 1·2 per cent. only.

2793. 1·2 per cent. are unknown?—Yes; in all the other cases we have followed them.

2794. And 7 per cent. are re-convicted?—Yes, 6·9, that is roughly 7 per cent.

2795. And the rest are doing well?—Yes, that is practically 92 per cent. are doing well, taking an average of 10 years.

2796. And this is a school which has peculiar difficulties in putting the boys out, owing to the origin of the children within the metropolitan area?—Yes. Might I venture to add to what I said just now about the Government arrangements under which we received the boys before the Reformatory Act was passed, that we had a special rate of allowance for them. It is a matter of life and death to have a sufficient support for these things, and I venture to think that it would facilitate immensely the acceptance of a senior class of boys, which I believe would be of the greatest possible service to the country, if we could revert, at any rate to some extent, to the kind of grant which was made to us in those cases before. I have looked up the facts about that, and I may mention that the grant for those senior boys to whom I refer as being dealt with in former years was a shilling a day instead of 6*s.* a week, not subject to the reduction which we now suffer; and that in addition to that the Treasury paid all the expenses of their disposal. You may imagine how generous they were, and how one longs for a return to them when I say they have even been known to pay 30*l.* for a boy's expenses to Australia. Of course I do not expect at present we should get a return to anything so liberal as that; but working out the disposal expenses as we now incur them on an average—because we have to provide for them also—I find that it is about 7½*d.* per week per head additional to the maintenance rate, which would cover what we incur for disposal, that is, sending some home and some abroad. I find it comes to about 7½*d.* per week.

2797. If you take a class of older boys, you think the Government allowance would have to be increased?—I think it ought to be.

2798. Could you take them at the present rate?—We would rather do that than not have them, because we should be doing so much more good which is above all things what we desire to do, but I do not think it would be quite fair to us to expect us to take them at the same rate.

2799. Have you a large annual subscription?—No; I will give you the last year's account. Of course we have suffered so tremendously from the agricultural depression that our circumstances have been somewhat peculiar of late years. At one time we relied very little upon subscriptions and donations, but our industrial profits were sufficient.

2800. Farming has now become so bad?—I have got a little pamphlet in my hand which we have issued with pictures of the schools, and in the course of it I put in these figures which I drew up at that time just to show the effect of the agricultural depression on us. Taking the last 30 years, the average annual income from the farm for the first 10 years was 865*l.* 13*s.* 3*d.*; for the next 10 years it was 736*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.*; and for the last 10 years it was 97*l.* 16*s.* 7*d.* That is an index of the extent to which agricultural depression has told upon us. This, of course, was one of our sources of income. That was written two years ago. The farm profit last year which had begun to improve a little, was 173*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.* and we made a profit on our trades with which we only supply ourselves, of 96*l.* 8*s.* so that our total industrial profit was 269*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* only last year; that is, speaking roughly, a loss of say 800*l.*, and we have tried to make that up by having an occasional public dinner or something of that sort, but it is rather against the grain, though we must live (spite of Talleyrand). Our subscriptions last year were 286*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.*, and we got from a public dinner 340*l.* besides.

2801. The Act of last year made an alteration about the imprisonment of children?—It did.

2802. All your boys at the present time have been sent to prison previously to going into reformatory?—Yes, they had been.

2803. Have you any remarks to make as to that?—Yes, I have a statement here which I think is very interesting indeed, especially with reference to the objects of this Committee as I understand them to be, and which will illustrate, what I am afraid must be considered rather an unsatisfactory want of principle in the mode of working the Reformatory Act, without imprisonment. I am one of those who did not object to previous imprisonment, which is explained by the circumstance that I have already mentioned, that we only profess to deal with juvenile criminals distinctly as such, and that though a boy may not have been actually imprisoned before he comes to us, if we take a first conviction, as it is commonly called, that is because there is no previous imprisonment or punishment recorded against him, we take care that there is forthcoming such proof of his character that it would show it was only by what he would call good luck he has been able to elude detection, and they are the worst boys of all who have succeeded in longest eluding the vigilance of the police.

2804. If he comes to you on first conviction, you do not take him without a criminal history?—Exactly. We always publish in our reports every year the circumstances which have led us to accept these boys who have been sent to us on first conviction, and you would be perfectly astonished if I read to you some of those particulars which are abstracted and put in here.

2805. Perhaps you will put that book in?—Yes, the particulars are given on page 18 of the Annual Report. Page 18 gives the particulars of which I have been speaking—I was going to say, if I may be allowed to refer to it, that there is a wonderful variety in the mode of treatment as compared with what was the case before the passing of Lord Leigh's Act. I made up yesterday a statement of the treatment in that respect of the 67 boys whom we have received under Lord Leigh's Act, which was passed in September last. Of these 67 boys six of them were sentenced to previous imprisonment. One to seven days, one to 10 days, and two to 14 days; that is four boys. That was the ordinary way of treating them before. One of them was sentenced to seven days in the police cell, which I venture to think is a great mistake, and one was actually sentenced—and it is so put in the warrant—that he should go for seven days to a workhouse. I shall have a word to say about the workhouse a little later on. So that six of these boys, and only six of them, were sentenced to imprisonment at all of any kind, and one was sent to the police cell and the other to the workhouse. Then 42 of these were remanded to prison for various periods, ranging from 3 to 28 days, nearly all of them to Holloway. When it runs beyond seven days of course it means necessarily that they were had up again and sent back three or four times. That might arise from a difficulty in ascertaining the particulars about the boy or following up the case and in scarcely any case did it arise from any difficulty with us. There must necessarily be a margin of time between the boys being sentenced and his coming to us in order to allow us to exercise that veto which the Act of Parliament permits us to exercise as to whether we would receive a boy or not, and therefore there must be some few days to find out a school which will take them.

2806. A boy cannot be sent to a reformatory whether there is room for him or not as he can be to a prison?—That must rest with the managers. Of course the managers may make any arrangement they like with the court about that, but as a question of principle it does involve a certain delay to inquire into the boy's antecedents and also as to whether a particular school will take him. 42 of them were remanded to prison. There were 21 remanded to workhouses, and I have already pointed out that all our boys are distinctly criminal boys. 21 boys were sent to workhouses varying in terms, being for 1, 6, 7, 14, 21, and 24 days. One boy was remanded to the police station for no less than 25 days off and on. One was on bail. Now, what I wanted to say about the workhouses was this, that it may not matter in the case of non-criminal children that such children should be sent to mix with the pauper children, but I should venture to remark that for boys such as we take it must be a very bad thing indeed to send these boys to a workhouse to mix with general children. It must be very bad for the workhouse, I mean; and of those remanded to the workhouse four had been previously in prison, so that there is not much principle about non-imprisonment running through it. Perhaps this may not have been known to the magistrate but four who were remanded to the workhouse had been sentenced previously to imprisonment, and 13 of those sent to us had been previously in prison. I just mention this to show that there is a great deal of irregularity and difficulty about it. Of course, our appeal now is to the magistrates, and to nobody else as to this part of the case. We still recommend that for boys who really require reformatory treatment owing to their antecedents, imprisonment is the best thing for them; because we object very strongly indeed to being considered part of the penal discipline of the country. When a boy comes to us he turns his back on all his past career, and we bid him welcome to start a new life entirely. Therefore we do not put him under any imprisonment for an offence he has committed; and so whatever he may have done, he gets no punishment at all for it except this remand which means generally a few days' laziness at Holloway or in the workhouse.

2807. In fact, the boys generally, although they do not go to prison in a technical sense, do go to prison, only they have nothing to do there, and it is not part of their sentence?—It is not recognised as part of their sentence; they are simply put there as a place of safety.

Mr. J. Trevarthen.

31 July 1894.

2808. Is they any harm in that?—No. I should think the separation from the home contamination is a great advantage to them. A great deal is said about the stigma of imprisonment, but whatever that may mean in sentimental people's minds I think would attach to the reformatory also. In the meantime it gives us a very bad start. It does not give the reformatory the same chance it would have if he had a punishment for his offence, and realises that he is entering on an entirely different career.

2809. In addition to your view that prison is not disadvantageous, do you also suggest that there is a practical difficulty existing owing to magistrates not knowing what to do between the time of boys coming before them and their being sent to a reformatory?—Yes, exactly; which points to the old practice of sending a boy to prison as part of the sentence. They may still do it; and in Lord Leigh's Act one of the qualifications for the boys being sent to the reformatory is that that he must have been imprisoned if he is under a certain age. Of course it does not say they shall not be imprisoned, but the whole tone of the Act is in the direction of non-imprisonment, and it stipulates for the first time in reformatory legislation that a boy if he is under 12 years of age must have been previously in prison. It is not "previously convicted," but it is "previously in prison."

2810. The boys who go to industrial schools are never sent to prison?—No.

2811. How was the practical difficulty got over there between the time of appearing before a magistrate and the selection of a school for them?—I am sorry I cannot say.

2812. It must have arisen in that case as well as in the reformatory cases?—Well, perhaps it may be that as there is less discrimination required on the part of industrial schools as to the kind of cases they receive in cases under the Industrial Schools Act they would probably receive them right away, whilst we on our part discriminate between mild cases and serious cases. There are different rules in various schools, for instance, take the Wandsworth Reformatory. The "Boys' Home" on Wandsworth Common puts at the head of its regulations for admission that "no "decidedly criminal boy can be received." We, "on the other hand, put it that none but absolutely "distinctly criminal boys will be received at Redhill." At Wandsworth they take the mildest cases that come under the Reformatory Act. So I say in schools we exercise a good deal of discrimination as to whether the boy is really eligible according to our rules; that is to say, whether we are doing our duty best by receiving such cases. It might interest the Committee to have a comparison between the working of Lord Leigh's Act as to the number of admissions.

2813. I would ask you this question; owing to the system of imprisonment, boys were not being sent so freely to reformatories as they might have been?—Quite so.

2814. Magistrates were sending to industrial schools?—Yes.

2815. The practice of imprisonment was rather crippling the reformatory schools?—Yes; of course the introduction of the "First Offenders Bill" has had a great deal to do with it. An immense change has come over the treatment of prisoners, and a good many of the boys who really come to us on first convictions are very bad boys indeed; though technically they have never been in the hands of the police before. If such a case as that comes before the magistrate under the "First Offenders Bill" the magistrates have a discretion which they very frequently exercise in favour of giving the subjects some other treatment rather than sending them to prison; and directly that circumstance became known a large number of what are called "voluntary institutions," "voluntary homes," and so on, intervene. In London there has been a tremendous number of young people who came before the Court, technically upon their first charge, who have received the benefit, such as it is, of being treated under that Act; although when it came to be investigated subsequently their antecedents had been most unsatisfactory and criminal in character, it was not brought out at the trial, and he received the benefit of the "First Offenders Act" in being sent to some "voluntary home." There are several of them in London. After staying there sometimes a few hours, sometimes a few days, sometimes a few weeks (because they had no legal control over them, although they were handed over to them), these fellows would fall again into crime and then would be sent to us. We have had a good many of those cases that have been let off under the "First Offenders Act," had been sent to "voluntary homes," have fallen again into crime; and then we have discovered how unsatisfactory that treatment of such cases has proved to be; and it has had the effect obviously enough of diminishing the supply of re-convictions and of tinkering up the cases instead of curing them.

2816. You think too free use has been made of voluntary schools by the magistrates?—Yes.

2817. Owing to their not being acquainted with all the circumstances?—Yes, I do not think they have the least idea of what happens to them afterwards, because none of these "voluntary homes" make any reports about their cases. Some of the boys are most unmanageable; they take these boys and they have no legal power over them; they make the home their place of residence; they go out from there to find work; they go out in the streets and they are under the least possible control from the "homes" themselves; and the amount of poisoning influence that goes on in those homes, through the extraordinary mixture there is really appals one, inasmuch as the number of downright bad ones they mix up with is really appalling. It is most unsatisfactory.

2818. So that philanthropic persons are rather doing harm than good?—Yes, many of them are, in the way I have explained. Of course, that they do not do a great amount of good I do not wish to imply at all.

2819. Cases that should not go to them are sent to them?—Yes, a great many.

2820. While the cases that ought to go to them perhaps are kept out, because there is no room for them?—Yes, I think these homes ought, as far as possible, to be kept for the non-criminal classes; and that criminal boys do get into them is unmistakable by the representations they make, and thus the opportunity of curing the boy is lost, and the mischief he does to the comparatively innocent lads is quite appalling.

2821. I believe your warden has prepared a list of such boys?—Yes, he has.

2822. Will you hand it in?—I have not got it here, but I shall be very happy to send it to you. The kind of thing is this; a boy is brought up, for argument sake, at a London police court; he is apprehended for theft, picking pockets, or some other offence of the kind. There is nothing known against him at the time. The magistrate thinks, for reasons that occur to him at the moment, that the boy may be given the advantage or benefit of the "First Offenders Act." The representative of a voluntary home comes forward and says, "Well, your Worship, "if you will allow me to have this boy, I will send him "off or take him into a home." The magistrate not unnaturally says, "Well, you may take him," and so far as the cognisance of the police is concerned he has gone from their purview. They do not follow him any longer, because it is not a technical charge; he is given to that man. The length of time they stay in the "home" is very short; they nearly always bolt. All the boys who have come to us have absconded, and there is no difficulty placed in their way. They simply live in a home in some street in London where they meet after they have done their work; and after their evening meal, the rule is that they go out and they may stay out until 9; in some cases until 10; they meet in the street, and I have known boys in our school admit that they have made appointments with boys to meet them on the old ground and carry on the old game. The one is not in the "home," the other is; and so this lad has not only the time deferred when he should be properly dealt with with regard to his own reclamation, but he is poisoning the minds of other boys.

2823. Perhaps you will send in a list of cases which have occurred to your knowledge, within the last 12 months?—Yes, I will. (See Appendix IX.)

2824. (Dr. Bridges.) I gather that there is considerable difference in the practice of different reformatories with regard to the cases that they admit?—Yes. That is the ground of selection you mean?

2825. Yes?—I have broadly hinted that in giving the two illustrations of Wandsworth on the one side, where they say they will not take a decidedly criminal boy if they can help it; and we on the other hand who lay ourselves out absolutely only for criminal cases, and sort them after they come to us.

2826. With regard then to reformatory managers, to adopt what I will call the "Wandsworth plan," would you be prepared to say that the distinction between the children admitted into such a school as that and the children admitted into an average industrial school, were of a very different character?—I would not say very different; but I should think a difference which could be recognised. My contention rather was that the industrial school system was intended for boys—I am speaking of boys, because I am connected with boys, but of course it applies to girls also—and cases that could not be technically recognised as cases of crime, but of boys who were rather neglected and driven into crime.

2827. Yes, I am aware of the intention that prevailed when these two sets of institutions were organised. I was rather directing my attention to the actual practice, whether in the class of reformatories that adopt a different principle from yours, or where there is any other real and sharp distinction?—I should think not very sharp.

2828. Between the industrial boys and the reformatory boys?—Yes, I have heard industrial school managers admit that they very often have boys sent to them that ought not to be sent to them, that if the rule as to the character of the school were more particularly observed they would not have committed to them at all; that is to say, they ought to be in reformatories; and of course there are a certain number sent to reformatories that would do just as well in industrial schools; and I venture very strongly to recommend that as for as my observation goes (and I have had some experience, because I myself have received 2,641 cases at Redhill), I very strongly recommend anybody who is concerned in the question to accentuate, as far as possible, the real distinction which ought to be made between the two schools, which I think would be very much to the advantage of the country and of the schools also.

2829. You have stated your own opinion on that point with most extreme clearness, but as a matter of fact your view is not the view which prevails universally?—No, it is not.

2830. You have spoken of the criminal class of boys. How do you define whether a boy belongs to the criminal class or not. Do you define it, I mean, by what you know of the general character of the boy, or do you go by the number of convictions?—Certainly not by convictions—by the character.

2831. Is it then possible that there may be many boys who have not been convicted at all who are of exactly the same type of character as those that you admit into Redhill?—Certainly, I think that they go through the net, and are not apprehended in many cases, the more astute thieves, for instance, elude detection longest.

2832. Have you any knowledge of Poor Law Schools?—I have none.

2833. It would not surprise you to find that in Poor Law Schools there are a considerable number of boys of that character?—I am not surprised. My own knowledge of Poor Law boys is that we have received from time to time a good few of them, and I am sorry to say that, as a class, they are nearly always very unsatisfactory.

2834. Quite so?—I need not go into the reasons, but it is a very curious and striking fact in our observation that pauper boys who come in to us rather prove to be very unsatisfactory cases.

2835. That is just the point on which I wish to ask you a question. Have not you found in your experience cases in which in a single family some of the boys have gone to the workhouse and other of the boys have gone to the reformatory?—I do not think I know cases of that kind, but I have known cases, as I have said before, come to us from the Poor Law Schools for offences committed there. It is no uncommon thing to have two or three of a family sent to us in succeeding years. I do not want to detain the Committee a moment longer than is necessary, but a case that occurs to me I may mention now, and I think it may interest the Committee, as to the effect produced on the mind of what at first appears to be some unpromising subjects. A boy came to us with a very bad record, and the whole time he was with us he was very unsettled in his conduct. He made two or three attempts to abscond and at last succeeded. He had been with us only a fraction of a year, I think nine or ten months. He got back to London; we made all kinds of efforts to recover him if possible. We suspected certain people of harbouring him, and we tried as usual to discover if he was in any way connected with them, but he absolutely and entirely eluded all researches until at length his time was up, and then according to the law we may not touch him if his term has expired, although he may not have served the term in the school. If we could have found him before, we could have punished him accordingly. We had given up all hope of tracing him until one Sunday evening I had a telegram sent to me from the Whitechapel Police Station to say, "McKeown is in custody here; what shall we do with him?" That was rather a poser. I wired back saying, "I will come to-morrow morning." I went to the Whitechapel Police Station to find that he had given himself up at the police court and said, "I am a runaway from Redhill, I want to be taken "back again." He is a fellow of 20 years of age, a well grown stalwart chap, and the next morning I went up to see him. I said, "What do you want?" He said, "Sir, I hope you have come to take me back "with you." I said, "Your time is up." He said, "I "hope you will work it somehow, I want to go back." I said, "Where have you been?" He said, "I have "been in and out of prison ever since I came out of "the School. I have just come out of six months "now." I said, "I cannot entertain any notion of "taking you back into the school again at present. "You have behaved so badly, you know, that it "would be a bad example, and I do not think you "would deserve it." The fellow with tears in his eyes, said, "Well, I hope you will be as kind as you "can." I said, "I have made up my mind that as I "cannot punish you now for absconding which I "would have done, I shall charge you with stealing "the clothes you have got on." He said, "Please do "not send me to prison any more, it will not do me "any good, I have had such a lot of it." I said, "But you have served us so badly you deserve it, "and what will the other chaps think about it?" He was sent down to Redhill, because, of course, the offence was committed at Redhill. I took him before the mayor and told him how the thing was, and I said for the moral influence of the boys in the school it was necessary to assert the principle that he had incurred some punishment for his base misconduct, and that if then having purged his offence he was willing to start afresh, we would give him an opportunity as far as we could.

2836. As a volunteer?—As a voluntary case. So I took him before the Mayor at Redhill, and asked the mayor to deal tenderly with him. I suggested that a a month at Wandsworth would, I thought, be sufficient and accordingly he was sent there. At the end of the month, the day that the punishment was up, McKeown made his appearance. He walked in about 11 o'clock and said, "I beg your pardon, Sir, I am sorry I am a "bit late." He said, "I could not catch a train "before, but I caught the first I could catch and I "am here, I am sorry I could not come before." I said, "What do you expect me to do with you?" He said, "You are going to take me in, a'int you." I said, "You ran away from the place when you were "here." He said, "I was a great fool; you may do "anything you like with me and treat me how you "like, but do take me in." I said, "All right, you "may go and take your place; go and put the school "clothes on, and I will do the best I can. If you "misbehave yourself out you go, but if you behave "yourself you shall be treated just as well as we can "do it for you." That boy at this moment is really one of the best behaved and hardest working and most satisfactory fellows in the school. I am sorry we have got him as a volunteer because we get no help towards keeping him, but I hope we shall find some useful employment for him. That illustrates the point I was trying to make to the Committee in the first instance, that we have so much more in the experience and character of older lads to work upon; their good sense comes to the rescue, and if the experiment could be made of sending us a number of boys, say under conditional pardons as they used to be, I believe it would be the greatest possible blessing to a large portion of the population who now absolutely perish because they have no hope before them.

2837. With regard to the general system of reformatories with which you have had great experience, I observe that in the last report it is stated that of the boys 75 per cent. were doing well and 19 per cent. had been convicted; of the girls 76 per cent. were doing well, 5 per cent. had been convicted; do you on the whole consider that result a satisfactory one?—I think it is satisfactory.

2838. That one-fourth of the boys should be convicted afterwards?—Though the general average is not as high as it ought to be I think that it is a very satisfactory return considering the class of cases dealt with, though for my part I do not see why the returns should not be better judging by our own experience.

2839. Can you point to anything in the management of reformatories which in your opinion produces that great difference between them?—No, I cannot distinctly put my finger upon it, but I think it will be found perhaps to some extent in the length of time that they are detained. I have shown this morning that we keep our boys as long as we think it is necessary to keep them, even to the last hour of their time.

2840. The time of detention would be one of the things?—Yes.

2842. The moral influence?—Yes; the arrangements that are made for systematic and proper training in religious matters.

2843. With regard to the employment on which the boys are put (I am speaking specially of boys now) do you consider that that is a matter of great importance with regard to the success of the reformatory?—I think it is.

2844. What kind of employment do you think is of the greatest value, first of all as far as the physical condition of the boys goes?—Farm training is of course pre-eminently the best. I believe the digging in the fields which all our boys go through in the first instance, though they pass into trades afterwards, is the most healthful thing in the world. Nothing can be more striking than the difference between the boys after they come in from London and have been working for a time in the fields. It is astonishing to see how their complexion clears, how their appetites grow, and how their spirits improve.

2846. And although a large proportion of your boys come from London is it for those boys you would think agricultural labour was of great value?—Yes, not so much to fit them for after-employment, though that is importance in the case of emigrants, as for the healthful effect it has. I believe mother earth is the grandest deoderiser of morals as well as other things that has ever been found yet.

2847. In the last report of reformatories with regard to Redhill there are references to a difficulty which occurred with regard to Gladstone House?—Yes, some two or three years ago.

2848. Could you mention very shortly what the general nature of that was. I only ask for the sake of eliciting difficulties with regard to management of reformatories?—There were two or three boys in that house who since then have turned out remarkably well, who at that time were discontented and exercising a bad influence upon the others and they got up a kind of an émeute which at that time appeared to be a very serious thing, but in the course of five or six hours with the exception of six boys who got right away there was a perfect end of the whole thing; the fellows all went back in to the house, and so on. It was an outbreak of boyish folly. It was not anything more serious than that.

2849. What kind of punishment are used in your reformatory?—The most serious punishment is birching, with the cell confinement on bread and water, which is very rarely used indeed. There is our caning, which is the ordinary kind of punishment inflicted. I have got a list of all the punishments in our Annual Report here and I will send the Committee copies of them. On p. 26, there is a comparison for the last eight years of all the kinds of punishment inflicted. Last year was 1893, we had 11 boys birched; we had 34 in the cell; 151 caned; and 155 fined. The caning is applied over the seat of the trousers and not over the hand or back. We do not allow caning on the hand or back. They are both very bad things for boys. We do not allow any punishment to be inflicted by any subordinate officer at all. It is always done by the superintendent or master of each house, and a caning means that the fellow stoops down and has half a dozen cuts on that particular part of the body which does him no harm, but does him a lot of good.

2850. How long is bread-and-water applied?—The average would be about a couple of days.

2851. A pound of bread or something of that sort?—Yes, a pound of bread.

2852. You mentioned that you carried out in your five houses a classification between the houses to some extent, that is to say, one house was kept for boys under 14?—Yes.

2853. Do you attempt any classification with regard to the other four houses?—Yes, to some extent, only so far as that the ascertained character or apparent character of a boy would indicate that a certain master whose strong points we should know would probably deal better with him than another. There is not anything that could be formulated with regard to these houses, only that some particular man has a strong point one way and another one another. One is perhaps more fatherly, and another more lordly, and so on. In the last 10 years we have transferred from house to house in the school 158 boys. That is one great advantage of our arrangement, that if a boy is not doing well in a particular house we give him change of air, and then it may be he does wonderfully well. We have found boys who do not do well either from the companionships he makes in the house or from the relation in which he gets to stand with the authorities or from fits of temper, or something of that sort; and just moving him into another house is like putting him into a new world. Of these 158, 139 were little boys who had grown up to be big boys, and who were transferred into the other houses, so that there were 19 cases that were removed on grounds of expediency and in the hope of giving the boys a better chance in another house than they possess, and in almost every case with advantage.

2854. With regard to your wish that boys of the older class should be admitted into your reformatories would you consider that 60 young men, as we may call them, from 17 to 20 might be possibly an unmanageable item in one house?—I do not think so.

2855. What sort of officer have you in control?—We have a man whom we call a schoolmaster, but he is really head of the house in every respect. He is the father of the family. He is a married man with his wife and children living in the house. Then there is a labour master who takes the majority of the boys in the house to their work, and superintends their work and assists the master at any time when called for. That is the house staff, but in every department of the school we have got a particular superintendent. Then we have a gymnasium, and so on, and the labour and everything has its special head. We built the gymnasium by special contributions about three years ago, and although we used to have a good deal of exercise before, it is quite impossible to overrate the immense moral good which has accrued from the regular systematic training in the gymnasium. Every boy has at least an hour a week, and when they excel in their exercises they have other classes too. There is a delightful spirit of healthy emulation got up between the houses and the boys, and I could not express too strongly my view of the immense advantage the establishment of a gymnasium has been to the school.

2856. You spoke about the immense importance of individual attention to each case?—Yes.

2857. You would say that the schoolmaster who would be at the head of the house of these 60 boys from 17 to 20 would be able to know a good deal of the character of each boy. Would it be the schoolmaster whose special business it would be to inform himself as to the character of these 60 boys?—Yes it would and then in all work of that kind the warden of the school who is the resident chaplain is also in continual observation and contact with them every day and continually.

2858. But while they are in the house this schoolmaster is the responsible head?—Yes he is.

2859. Under the general warden?—I might point out what is of course quite obvious that the reason we can manage such a large number of boys in the house is that they are not all turned in 60 at a time. Here is a settled community with its settled tone established by long years of experience and its acknowledged relation into which a single case comes this week and another next week and so on. The boy comes into a settled community. If we were going to put 16 or 20 in at once there might be a risk, but if we take them in one at a time I do not think there is the least difficulty in the world.

2860. How many of these 60 are in the same dormitory?—We have usually three dormitories in the house. They are equally divided. We have generally one small dormitory in which the bigger boys go, but they are very nearly alike. They are very simple in their arrangement, and there is a system of monitorship right through.

2861. I have one more question to ask you as to the general system of reformatories. Are you able to say what is the status and education of the officer who is, generally speaking, put at the head of the reformatory. What guarantee of capacity is given by the officer who is made and chosen to be the head of the reformatory?—Of course I can only speak for our own, but if you take them all round most of the superintendents are men who have been in their office for a great many years who were selected for the combination of the fatherly character with practical common sense and a certain amount of education, perhaps about equal to that of an elementary school teacher, but always men I think who were in the early days chosen for the combination of those qualities; not so much for their intellectual force as for their personal influence and character, and their opportunities of having acquired a knowledge of men and things which, after all, best equips men for this particular work.

2862. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I suppose you know that as a rule there are a great many boys who are admirably adapted for reformatories or industrial schools who have something which unfits them for industrial training?—Not a very large number, I think.

2863. But a good many?—Yes. We do not make a very strong point of that. We lay down as one of the rules that a boy should be capable of outdoor employment, but we sometimes relax that rule in the case of a very bad boy. I will illustrate it by two Birmingham boys. One of them was a fellow who walked with a crutch, and two or three schools in that neighbourhood had been asked to take him, but they declined on the ground that he was a cripple. Mr. Alfred Hill wrote to us and said that this boy was a trainer of thieves in Birmingham, that he stood at the corner of streets and sent half a dozen fellows to sell papers or things like that, but who were really thieving, and he tempted them, and they brought him the proceeds. This boy was a bad boy, although I may say he was the son of a father and mother who were both captains in the Salvation Army, and they wanted to get rid of him. Under these special circumstances we took him. We found he was not able to go into the fields, and we put him into the shoemaker's shop, where he soon learnt the trade sufficiently, and before his time was up we licensed him to a shop in London, and there he carried on his trade. The fellow turned out very respectable, and I believe he has gone to Birmingham again. Another was also a case in Birmingham of a little fellow with a hip disease, and upon a representation of his being certain to go to ruin if we did not take him, because other schools rejected him, we took him. Now and then we do not know these points, but, as a rule, it is very natural that we should prefer to take boys we can put into the ordinary work of the school. However, we do not make a point of sticking to it so formally as not to vary it.

2864. I suppose you have heard of circumstances where, in the old system, a boy has been sentenced to 10 days and afterwards to a reformatory, that no reformatory would take him?—Yes, it has occurred.

2865. Often to your knowledge?—Not often, I think. We should strain a point if the case were really a bad one.

2866. Yes, in your particular reformatory?—Yes.

2867. Have you any suggestion to make as to what should be done for that sort of boy?—No, I really have not. I do not think that the number of them would justify a separate institution, and it would be an exceedingly difficult one to work. I should think it would be much better to try and persuade the schools to strain a point and to save them; and I think in most cases they would do so if the boy were decidedly criminal. If he were not I think some of these charitable homes would take him, but if it were absolutely necessary that the boy should be sent to a reformatory, I should hope that most reformatories would take him, whatever their rules were, and make the best of him.

2868. You said just now you were of opinion that if a boy committed an offence which was a bad offence some punishment should follow?—I think so.

Mr. J. Trevarthen.

2869. And that under the "First Offenders' Act," and the lenient way in which criminals are dealt with now, boys who ought to be sent to reformatories are not sent to reformatories, thus starving the reformatories and filling the prisons afterwards?—Yes, I am perfectly sure, so far as I am able to speak, that for the future, it will not be very long before we shall see an immense accession to the prison number of youths and young men who are beyond the reach of reformatory effort in the ordinary sense of the word. I mean they will be too old for treatment, and being over 16 there is no chance in the world for them except going on being imprisoned and ending with penal servitude and dying miserably. That may be easily altered if we can induce the authorities to extend the area of our influence, and then we shall perhaps be able to undo some of the mischief arising from this wave of sentimentalism which has passed over the country during the last few years.

2870. (Miss Orme.) In the case of having special institutions classified according to age and supposing a boy is sent under 15, what do you do with him when he is over 15. Do you move him on?—No. I contemplate that if a boy was sent to what I may call the junior class of school it would be an advantage that he should be detained in order that the proper influence between the older and the younger should operate in the school. I am not at all in favour of making a school too select with regard to age so as to make it unlike the world. I would give them a training and the opportunity afforded by the variety of age within certain limits, but if a school were limited so that they might not receive them over 15 that would be provided for.

2871. Then you think even in that junior reformatory there would be sufficient control for the older boys?—I think so.

2872. (Chairman.) You could reserve power to transfer boys from that school to another if they turned out badly?—I think occasionally that might be necessary, but I think very rarely. Of course in such a case we should change the boy from one house to another but it might be desirable in a small school.

2873. Can you give us the per-centage of licences which are revoked?—Do you mean in our own schools?

2874. Yes?—I gave the numbers, but I have not worked them out in per-centages. It is about one-fifth.

2875. And can you tell us what proportion of those cases of boys whose licences are revoked turn out satisfactorily subsequently?—I am sorry I cannot tell you that straight off, but they have gone into the general returns amongst the others. The probability is that a boy whose licence was revoked would turn out quite as well or better because he would come back to the school and begin his training again, so to speak, and we should be doubly careful in putting him out next time. Sometimes the revocation has not been through his own fault. Sometimes revocations occur from failure of employment or the surroundings.

2876. At any rate they give you no special trouble?—No.

2877. Can you tell me what proportion of your boys go into the Army and Navy?—In the last 10 years we have discharged 834 boys, and of those 34 went into the Army. The Army has furnished us an output for our boys of increasing importance of late years. Out of the 34 I speak of, 24 would be within the last four years. We are finding a greater demand for our boys than formerly, very much through the development of our band and gymnasium. Both these things have helped to make the fellows more acceptable as recruits, and the successful boys coming down as soldiers to see their fellows has stirred up a certain amount of martial ardour which they have expressed in their desire to enlist themselves. Not only that, but in several cases the colonels and officers of regiments having had our boys have wished us to send particular cases to them. I think we are likely to find in the future an increasing proportion of boys sent into the Army with very great advantage.

2878. What is the length of your period of observation subsequent to departure?—We keep an eye on them for four years, and only lose, as you will observe, one per cent. of them.

2879. You spoke of the worst cases in your school, and you said that your result was most gratifying?—Yes.

2880. Do you mean by the worst cases the boys who are most disposed to be criminal?—Yes, whose antecedents are the worst.

2881. As to antecedents do you make very careful inquiries?—Yes.

2882. And you treat them to a certain extent according to their special antecedents?—Yes.

2883. And your rules are not of cast iron?—No.

2884. You can adapt them to each individual case?—Yes, we have certain rules as to eligibility which appear on the application forms sent to prisons and courts, and so on.

2885. Could you tell the Committee how many boys you would have on an average who might be called of the habitual criminal class?—So far as the juvenile age can admit of that description I should think that by far the largest proportion were such because, as I have said before, we try not to receive other than those. So far as a boy's tender age ranges only up to 16, and the average age at which they come to us is only 14, it answers that description by saying they are most of them of that character.

2886. I observe you use the phrase in the pamphlet you handed to me "Adepts in Crime"?—Yes.

2887. Do you say a large number of those boys would be adepts in crime?—They are in the particular class of crime in which they excel, for instance, we have had some of the most successful pickpockets and other forms of thieving. I can give you some illustrations which for their cleverness are highly amusing. They are boys who are very sharp witted. Half of them come from London, and London circumstances seem to call out their native talents.

2888. But you have as a matter of fact under your charge a number of lads who are to all intents and purposes, except, perhaps, their number of convictions, as much habitual criminals as those who are between 16 and 21 in prisons?—Quite so.

2889. Would you be prepared to take charge of an average habitual criminal who is now in prison?—Yes, if he had had his punishment. We should stipulate for that.

2890. Some of the witnesses before the Committee seem to think that when a lad between 16 and 21 has really fallen definitely into crime and has been convicted two or three times he is as hopeless and difficult a case as the older criminals?—I do not agree with them at all.

2891. You would not be afraid of him?—Not the least.

2892. And you are confident that supposing the whole of the prisoners between 16 and 21 in Wandsworth or any other prison were transferred to you and you had the proper means of supervising them that you would be able to reclaim a great number of them?—I think I should make this difference. I do not think we should take them from 16 to 21 on admission; we would receive them and keep them until 21, but from my present opportunities of observation I should not think it would not be desirable to take them older than 18. I am not sure at all but that an experiment made upon cases between 16 and 18, whom we are not able to receive at present, but whom we ought to be able to receive, would enable us perhaps to deal with still older cases up to 21.

2893. You have given us this morning the case of McKeown who has certainly fallen into the police definition of an "habitual criminal" and who was over 20?—Yes. He had the opportunity of knowing what the school could do for him, and that it was through his own fault he left it.

2894. Possibly other prisoners may wish to have the same advantage?—Yes, I think it would be found so.

2895. Supposing a change was made by the establishment of what may be called "penal reformatories," that is to say the establishing of an institution halfway between the reformatory and the prison, would you approve of such a change?—I should be quite willing to take such cases at any time.

2896. I suppose you agree that the older and more hardened the youthful prisoner is the more severe discipline it might be necessary to apply to him?—Yes, but I should not depend upon that. I think there ought to be a reserve of that sort if necessary, but in my opinion it would not be called for provided that the particular offence which brought him under the cognisance of the law should be adequately dealt with by sharp punishment at the time and not by leaving us to punish. I should like to enter a protest against the idea of calling any reformatory penal. Of course we can use it as a matter of convenience as between ourselves, but I think it would be very harmful to associate any penal character whatever with the reformatory. We try to draw our line as clearly as possible. When they come to the reformatory they have done with everything penal unless they bring it on themselves; when there is punishment, it is very short and sharp, and straight to the point, but they need not have it unless they misconduct themselves.

2897. I understand from you that a boy from a reformatory school would have a better opportunity of securing a position than a boy from a prison?—Certainly, he ought to.

2898. Still I gather that you are in favour of imprisonment at all events preliminary to the reformatory school?—Yes, if he comes to the reformatory school he ought to be punished first. If they are not sent to prison they are remanded for a few days' laziness, or they get a casual whipping, and all the boys I have examined as to whipping (and I have had a good many of them) have despised the six or eight strokes which is ordinarily given by the court. They do not treat it with that respect that they treat the six or eight strokes that we give them; so that I should very much like to accentuate that point that the morality of the individual should be respected, and that his respect for morality should be accentuated by proper punishment before he comes to us, and we ought not to be associated in any way with the punishment.

2900. You think the after-life in the reformatory purges a boy of the taint on him through going to prison?—I am quite sure it does, but whether it has that effect in the popular mind I do not know; because I am afraid there is a little confusion as to reformatories and they think it is a part of the prison system, and the restraint under which they labour for that length of time of course gives the boys the notion that it is a continuation of the species of imprisonment.

2901. Do you think that the views you have expressed on the subject of imprisonment are generally held by the managers of reformatories?—There is a great of difference, I think, among managers of reformatories. It is curious that in the northern regions, and in Scotland particularly, though of course the numbers there are very small, there is a strong feeling against imprisonment as part of the sentence. In the south it is different, and this association of all the certified and reformatory and industrial schools, of which I am honorary secretary on the reformatory committee, passed a resolution two or three years ago in favour of the retention of imprisonment as part of a reformatory course.

2902. Was that unanimous?—It was all but unanimous.

2903. So that as far as England is concerned you fairly represent their views on the subject?—Yes. As a disclaimer it is sometimes said of us who take that line that we are advocates of juvenile imprisonment. We do not advocate that. If it could be abolished and something substituted for it, we should be glad. We only stipulate that we shall not be part of the punitive system of the country, and that crime shall be adequately punished; it is not our duty to provide the punishment, and that being over we can take them up and we can do all the better with them because they have received that punishment which their misconduct has earned them.

2904. (Mr. O'Connor.) Originally the only portal to the reformatory was the prison?—It was.

2905. It is not so now?—No.

2906. Has the Act of September of last year had any effect, so far as you have been able to ascertain; are magistrates more ready to send to reformatories now without the prison portal?—I think they are to some extent. We have received under Lord Leigh's Act, 67 boys at the present time. Going back over the same period in the year immediately previous to it I find we received 59 only, and as that was very close I went back to the year before that, and curiously enough I find that then it was 64; so that that does not show that there was very much difference. But I have no doubt that practically it does afford those magistrates who object to imprisonment an opportunity of sending boys they otherwise would not have sent.

2907. Have you reason to believe magistrates are fully alive to the fact that they can now send to the reformatories direct?—Yes.

2908. With regard to the punishment to be given before the boys go to a reformatory would you give them their penal dip perhaps in the police station, or do you think they ought to have a good flogging, or something of that sort?—If it were really a good flogging.

2909. But at any rate punishment is not the principle of the reformatory?—Not the least. We want to dissever it as far as possible.

2910. And these boys, if not stopped, would go into the criminal class?—Yes, those that we are taking are there when we take them.

2911. Only a few of them drift into the criminal community?—Yes, that is so.

2912. From your observation of what boys you have had to deal with would you say that they are in any way different from the generality of boys who have more happy domestic circumstances, or are their failings due to their surroundings and their bringing up?—I should think it is very largely due to their environment. I think under other circumstances they would be like other boys, and they are just as capable of the highest results as any class in the world.

2913. I suppose the offences of boys who have better surroundings are committed in their playground or homes, whereas these children have their playgrounds in the street, and are dealt with by the policemen?—No doubt the criminalty of their life enters much more into their life because of their circumstances. They are in it continually. I imagine a superior class of boy might now and then fall into some of those laches, but it would be only incidental and accidental, whereas these are continually surrounded by circumstances which aggravate them in the wrong direction.

2914. And their offences are committed within the jurisdiction of the public officers, whereas the boys of the better class are committed under the domestic roof?—Yes.

Mr. J. Trevarthen.

31 July 1894.

2915. You think if they were placed under similar circumstances they would come out just as well?—Yes, I believe there are great capacities in this class, and they would come out as well as any others.

2916. You told us that the gymnasium and band are the principal means, which together with moral persuasion and other similar influences make them worthy of something. Have you any reason to believe that those influences lose their effect at the age of 19?—No.

2917. Supposing you put these boys to pick oakum or turn a crank, do you think you would be equally successful?—I should not expect any success from that. I have brought with me, if I may leave it with the Committee, an extract from an annual report of ours published in 1891, which deals somewhat in detail with what we venture to call "The proposed "extension of the area of reformatory work." Incidentally it gives facts and figures bearing on this point which I think might be interesting to the Committee. I shall have great pleasure in sending a copy of the annual report. I do not know whether "Saved from the Wreck" would be equally acceptable to you, but that illustrates the life in the schools by pictures.

2918. (Chairman.) Yes, I shall be very glad if you will send us one?—I shall be very pleased to do so.

The witness withdrew.

Rev. W. D. Morrison.

Rev. William Douglas Morrison called and examined.

2919. (Chairman.) You are the Assistant Chaplain at Wandsworth Prison?—I am.

2920. How long have you been there?—I have been altogether in the prison service about 12 years; I think I have been at Wandsworth about eight years, I am not exactly certain, but it is about eight years.

2921. How do you divide your work with the senior chaplain?—Well, we take it in turns. I see the men on reception one week and he sees the men on reception another week. I see the men on discharge one week and he sees the men on discharge another week. Then the rest of the work consists in visiting the prisoners, in visiting the sick, in visiting the people who are under punishment, in visiting special applicants, and in visiting people who seem to require more attention than the majority do; prisoners that are very much troubled and that kind of thing. That is a brief epitome of my work, I think. Then letters that come from prisoners' friends we see and attend to, and we pay particular attention to all young prisoners, both on reception and during imprisonment, and also on discharge. Then we pay attention to all people who apply to us to get relief on discharge. Well, there are such a number of miscellaneous things that one does that I forget exactly what they are.

2922. Do you consider that the number you have at Wandsworth is too large for adequate supervision on the part of yourself and your senior chaplain?—I do not consider it is quite possible for one to know the prisoners as you ought to do when you have got 11,000 or 12,000 coming in every year. It is not merely the daily average, but it is the number which come in you must take into consideration. You must remember that if you have a vast stream passing through the prison you cannot know them so well as in a convict prison where they have perhaps 1,000 as an average, but have the same men for five, six, or ten years. That makes a considerable difference.

2923. Are you satisfied that the present system of religious services is altogether satisfactory?—Well, I do not know very well how it could be altered.

2924. You think that the effect of compulsory attendance at chapel at religious service is not harmful?—I think most prisoners are only too glad to get to chapel whether they like it or not; for this reason that it affords them an opportunity of getting out of their cells and it affords them an opportunity of; exercising their lungs (which they cannot do at other times) in the way of singing and so on; and it is looked upon as a privilege by almost all prisoners; I only know in fact one instance in the whole of my prison life where a prisoner has refused to go to chapel.

2925. Was that on the ground of conscience?—No, he was a man who was a little peculiar and who simply resisted everything, but if any prisoner objects to go to chapel on the ground of conscience the Governor will not compel him to do so.

2926. Do you find that prisoners who are re-committed often describe themselves as being of a different religion to the religion they have professed before?—Yes they sometimes do; in fact the cases are not infrequent when they do. Sometimes a man will come in as a Roman Catholic and sometimes he will come in as Church of England. Sometimes they put down one faith and sometimes another.

2927. Passing now to the special points referred to this Committee I will begin with the question of overcrowding. In calculating the amount of cell accommodation should the cells ordinarily set apart for special cases, for instance, punishment cells hospital cells, and so on, be included?—No, they should not be included, and I think in no prison except Wandsworth are they included; and they are included at Wandsworth for a very simple reason. At one time Wandsworth was a prison for both men and women and when it was a prison for both men and women there was a hospital for the women as well as for the men, but when it was turned into a purely men's prison the same hospital existed for almost double the number of prisoners that it existed for before, and the doctor had to take a number of the hospital cells and cells that were used for other purposes and use them for what is really hospital accommodation. Take, for instance, Wakefield prison.

2928. Were you at Wakefield?—Yes, I was at Wakefield for a few years; at that time it was as large a prison almost as Wandsworth is now. At Wakefield Prison the hospital had hospital cells and epileptic cells; and all those cells that are now included in the Wandsworth Prison itself were outside the prison altogether. The hospital was a separate building, and the fact that Wandsworth is in an anomalous position in that matter is seen in the erection of a new hospital, so as to bring it into line with the rest of the prisons.

2929. Will epileptic prisoners be placed in the new hospital?—I expect they will; they will go immediately into the hands of the doctor, and out of the hands of the discipline authorities. The class of prisoner that go into the hands of the doctor and out of the hands of the discipline authorities are in a different position altogether from the ordinary prisoner who is in the ordinary certified cell.

2930. Then as to prisoners who would go under Rule 26 in association; where would they be placed?—They ought by right to be in the hospital.

2931. You do not know whether it is intended to put that class there?—I do not know whether it will be necessary to be done in this particular instance, and of course it would be a pity to do it if it is not necessary, because it would be an expense.

2932. You think this special class of cells should be used for their special purposes, and should not be used for the reception of ordinary prisoners?—I do; because they are under the charge of the doctor; they are out of the charge of the discipline authorities.

2933. Have you looked at the evidence on this point which was given by Captain Schuyler?—I have not looked at it.

2934. He has given the Committee the general statistics with regard to Wandsworth, so that you need not go over them?—I know he has.

2935. With regard to section 17 of the Act of 1865, what is your opinion of the difficulties of excepting convicts?—When they were under the local authorities the convict prisoners were removed to the convict prisons, being a very short time in the local prison; but now, in many of the local prisons, convicts are kept for nine months, so that although that stands in the Act, yet it stands in it under very altered conditions from what it did before the Act of 1877, before the prisons were consolidated.

2936. Perhaps you would like to state what in your opinion are the chief evils resulting from insufficient cell accommodation?—Well, I think in so far as they affect a prisoner when half-a-dozen or more prisoners are huddled together all day long in one room they are in practical idleness; you cannot give them anything to do except oakum picking, they are in practical idleness and they pass the time in corrupting one another; as a rule the worst ones generally get the mastery of the good, because the spark of goodness in the good is not so very strong, and it is easily quenched. Then first offenders are apt to be associated with old offenders and the better class of prisoners who happen to be put in association complain and have complained to me frequently. In fact it is a common thing for them to complain to the chaplain about their being placed in association. The better a man is the more he hates this kind of association without supervision. It is association without supervision and association in a room a quarter the size of this room without the least particle of supervision. You take the door, pull it to and lock it, and there they remain for hours and hours at a time, because at the time there is this overcrowding in the prison, the warders have not much time to see to the prisoners at all, so that they are practically left to their own devices.

2937. You are now speaking of prisoners put into association cells to relieve the block?—Yes.

2938. And not of the others at all?—No.

2939. How often would such block occur?—Well, it has occurred every year at Wandsworth with one exception since I have been there.

2940. More than once?—Yes, more than once. One year we had the whole of the school work utterly paralysed. The schoolroom was filled with prisoners; every available spot was packed, and all the educational work of the prison was paralysed for a time, and the result was a very bad one.

2941. That special congestion would only last for a day or two, I suppose?—Sometimes it would last a day or two, sometimes longer. That would depend on circumstances.

2942. Whenever it did occur you always had complaints?—Always, without exception, we had complaints from the better class of prisoners.

2943. Then would you be in favour of absolutely forbidding association under these circumstances?—No, I should not forbid association so long as you had association with supervision, but I object to association without any supervision at all, and that is the form of association which exists at the present time when we have a block in London prisons.

2944. When you say "with supervision" I suppose you are chiefly speaking of what one might call the hospital cases—association under the doctor's orders?—No, I mean ordinary cases. Of course, I do not think there ought to be a block at all, but if there is an inevitable block, because there might be a riot and you might have hundreds of prisoners thrown into prison all at once in a place like London, so that you could not possibly say you would never have overcrowding; but in these circumstances there ought to be supervision over the prisoners when they come into the prison; they ought not to be shut up in a room and left entirely to themselves.

2945. We have had evidence from two governors of prisons in favour of abolishing association except under the special circumstances provided in the rule according to which association is ordered by the doctor?—Yes.

2946. You would not necessarily go so far as that?—Not quite, because I do not think you can provide for extraordinary exigencies.

2947. I am rather thinking of the ordinary periods of the year when congestion is likely to occur?—It would be a far preferable state of things if we had no association at all, because a prisoner likes to have some little time to himself, and if you have a man with another man in the cell he is never alone; he never has a moment that he can call his own; he is always mixed up with others, and I think after all there is something in allowing even a prisoner to have a certain amount of time to himself and his own thoughts, if he chooses to have it.

2948. Then it really comes to this, that a larger margin of available accommodation should be kept?—Decidedly larger than exists at present in the London prisons. I am not talking of country prisons, because many of them are comparatively empty.

2949. Then have you any special recommendation to offer for obviating the dangers of this overcrowding?—Well, I think that a return should be issued every year with the Prisons Report to show exactly the condition of the prison. At the present time if you look at the Prisons Report you will see it is impossible to tell whether the prisons are being overcrowded or not when you have a return for one year only; but you want to have a return for the five preceding years, and then have the daily average. You want to have first the name of the prison, then to have the daily average in the next line, then have maximum number for the year in the next line, then the maximum number for the preceding five years in the next line, and then have the ordinary certified cell accommodation in the last. Then if you have that, anybody who looks at a prison report can see at once whether a prison is being overcrowded or whether it is not. That is the way it should be drawn out. I will hand this in (document handed in. See Appendix II.).

2950. Then do you suggest that any amendment should be made of the 17th section of the Act of 1865, with regard to the average maximum of the preceding five years?—It is section 17, sub-section 1. I should exclude the clause saving convicts, and I should say "separate certified ordinary cell accommodation." That is how I should put it. I should put it "separate certified ordinary cell accommodation shall be "provided equal in number to the average of the "greatest number of prisoners who have been con"fined in such prison at any time during the preced"ing five years." "Separate cells" is vague. It might mean itch cells, hospital cells, or any cells. You want to define that more clearly.

2951. Now the Committee has been asked to express an opinion upon the present system by which the appointment of a Deputy-Governor is limited to prisons with more than 700?—Yes, I did not quite see the drift of that reference, I did not quite understand what it was about.

2952. I do not clearly understand the practice which prevails, but I imagine that when you get over 700 male prisoners a Deputy-Governor is appointed. Assuming that that is the prevailing practice, do you think that in a rough and ready sort of way, that is a proper provision?—I have not any very definite or decided opinion one way or another upon it; some people think a Deputy-Governor is a superfluity; others again, think there should be a

31 July 1894.

Deputy-Governor. Of course, I think myself there should be a certain number of Deputy-Governors in the prison service, because we want some place for training the men who are to take charge of the big prisons in the future; and if we have no big prisons to train them in then there would be no proper place for training these men at all.

2953. I understand that the disadvantage of not having a Deputy-Governor is that when the Governor is away on leave his duties devolve upon the chief warder?—That is so, no doubt.

2954. And that when you get a large prison say like Liverpool with a 1,000 prisoners or more without a Deputy-Governor it is too big a charge for an official in the position of chief warder who may or may not be a specially good man?—That is perfectly true and that is certainly an important point.

2955. The question really rather is whether you would provide that a prison in the absence of the Governor should always be under the charge of a Deputy-Governor?—I have no very strong feeling on it one way or the other. I can get along just as well with a chief warder as with a Deputy-Governor, or with a Deputy-Governor as well as with a chief warder. Some men prefer a Deputy-Governor to deal with.

2956. You do not think that is a point of much importance?—I think not.

2958. Then a further question referred to us is, whether it is right to appoint chief warders as warders in charge of persons with a population below 100?—Well, I have no strong feeling on that point either. Some chief warders in charge are exceedingly sensible men indeed; they may not all be highly educated men, but still they have had a great deal of experience of prisoners, and I should be very sorry to destroy the career of those men. It is a very humble career at the best, and if you have a prison staff of say, between 1,800 and 2,000 men, there are a certain number of those men who really ought to get the chance of rising to be chief warders in charge. It is not much of a position even if they get it; it is only about 150*l.* a year; but it gives them something to look forward to at the latter end of their life, and I should be sorry to see the system destroyed, although, at the same time, I do think it ought to be worked better than it actually is worked. I do not think the present way of dealing with chief warders in charge in local prisons is a good one at all. I think chief warders in the local prisons are unduly overlooked in favour of officers in convict prisons; and that arises from the fact that the Prison Commissioners do not come in contact with the officers in charge of the local prisons in the way they come in contact with the officers in charge of the convict prisons. The Prison Commissioner sees the officers in charge of convict prisons once a month. He may not see those in local prisons for years and years, so that the local prison officers, however good they may be, are often overlooked, not because anybody wishes to do them an injustice, but simply because they are not known, so that if the system of chief warders of prisons in charge is continued there ought to be greater consideration shown for the chief warders in the local prisons, because, after all, I think the chief warder of a local prison is the best man, seeing that the chief warder of a convict prison is dealing with different Acts of Parliament. He is also dealing with different prison rules; he has no experience at all of the work of a local prison, and he is thrown sometimes, all at once, into one of those prisons without any previous experience, and, perhaps, with results that the Visiting Justices themselves find fault with. That may be one reason why Visiting Justices do not like chief warders in charge. I do not know personally, but it is possible that may be one of the reasons, because some are men of no experience.

2959. I suppose it may be said the effect of having this possibilty of promotion before them is that the chief warders might be encouraged and are encouraged to put forth their best strength in following out their duties?—They certainly are.

2960. It is a premium on efficient and faithful service?—Certainly, they look forward to that more than anything; and I should be very sorry to destroy the little hope they have, because it is dull work for them in a prison, and I should not like to see their career in any way interfered with.

2961. Now I should like to ask you a few questions about prison labour and occupation before passing on to the other points. First of all, with regard to books I think your practice at Wandsworth is to give a book once a fortnight?—Yes, it is so.

2962. Is that a matter of discretion with you?—It is, to a very large extent. We practically do what we like in the way of giving prisoners books, although it is against the rules. If a prisoner is fond of reading and applies for books I should be very sorry to refuse him a book; in fact, I would not do such a thing; and if a prisoner wants more than one book I should be sorry to refuse it him if he is doing his work. If there is no complaint in any other respect I should like him to read as much as he likes, as long as his work is done.

2963. As a matter of fact, are there not difficulties at Wandsworth with regard to the distribution of books?—Yes, there are difficulties; because practically we have only got one man at liberty for the distribution of books. I am not absolutely certain about the practice at present, because it is in a state of transition. We used to have three schoolmasters at Wandsworth, and now we have only got two; and what has happened in consequence of our only having two, I really do not follow exactly.

2964. But I understand you really to express your opinion that you do not see any objection, apart from your own practical difficulties of distribution, to giving prisoners as many books as they care to read, provided that it does not interfere with the labour they have to perform?—It is the very reverse; I should like to see them occupying their minds. The great difficulties we have is to get these poor people to occupy their minds.

2965. But as a matter of fact, the number of books supplied is really a matter of discretion for the officials of a particular prison?—It is in practice. It is left principally to their discretion, and they may use their discretion liberally, or they may use their discretion in a niggardly way. It is practically left to them.

2966. Then with regard to prison labour, are you in favour of extending the practice of association in industrial employments, such as you have at Wandsworth?—Decidedly. I think that you can get much more work out of a prisoner in that way, and that the monotony of prison life being varied by that, that you could keep the prisoners in a better state of health. If you have a man in a cell for 23 hours out of 24 the monotony is something horrible.

2967. We have had it in evidence from Mr. Manning, of Pentonville, I think, that there are a large number of prisoners who strongly dislike association in any shape or form whatever?—Yes, that is true.

2968. And for that reason he seemed to be doubtful whether it was expedient to extend the system of association?—I should not force a prisoner to go into association; but I should always give him the option of going into association if he chose to do so.

2969. And you think the present workshops are not sufficiently large to employ the prisoners who would like to be employed there?—Not nearly; I am sure of that. One of the greatest privileges you can give to a prisoner is to allow him to work out of his cell. That is a privilege which is reserved for prisoners who have been in prison for some time, and the applications to the Governor for work out of the cell are always a large number. That shows the general feeling of prisoners on the subject.

2970. I suppose habitual prisoners would always like to work in association?—Habitual prisoners are often morose. They are not all fond of seeing each other, although habitual prisoners do prefer association. I do not think it would apply more to habituals than it does to others.

2971. You would not draw a distinction?—No; there is one class, I think, might not like to be in association; that is to say, a man who may have been in a fairly good position in the world, and who all of a sudden finds himself in prison. That man in many cases, does not care to go into association, and he is, no doubt, of the class which Mr. Manning refers to. He and I have talked that matter over before now, and I think that is the class he would be referring to more than anything else—the class of man who is not the ordinary habitual criminal, but who gets into trouble once in his life, and who likes to be left to a certain extent alone; although that is not the case with all of them, because many of them who are of that class when they are left in prison alone become absolutely wretched. They keep on thinking what is going to happen to them when they go out, and so upset their minds very much indeed; but although they may not like to come into association, yet I believe association would be a good thing for them, because it would compel them to take their minds for the time off themselves, and it would keep their minds in a more healthy condition. For instance, a short time ago, we had a man sentenced to prison at Wandsworth, a man who was in a fairly good position in the City, and who got three months' imprisonment. That man was in an absolute state of misery and despair while he was in, as to what his friends would think of him, and how he would be received by the world when he went out, and I had to go and see that man through it for a considerable time, to keep him from doing something desperate; and when he did go out I was afraid of him. I made inquiries to see what happened to him, and he is utterly broken down and has now become a complete wreck. Before that he was a man who had never had a stain on his character, and was looked upon as a very respectable person; and I say if that man had been induced to go into association, it would have kept his mind in better balance. That is one case.

2972. Are you afraid of prisoners talking to each other?—No, not much. If you do not let prisoners talk at all they are very fond of putting in a word and becoming sly and so on, but if a man is not forbidden absolutely to talk what he will talk about will, perhaps, more likely be what he is working at than anything else. Of course you have an officer in charge who would take care that unseemly talk did not take place, and I have not that fear of talking some people have. Some people have a great dread of it, but I have not.

2973. Do you think there are distinct evils arising from the very strict rule forbidding talking?—I do; I think it induces a lot of trouble. Take, for instance, the chapel; they go to chapel, and a man perhaps does not open his mouth for weeks. It is the only chance he has of opening his mouth, and many of them cannot resist it. They do not mean any harm by it; they are not bad prisoners, they are men who would do all right in the world again probably, but they are so constituted that they cannot resist saying a word, and I believe that if we had the same experience that they have we should be much in the same state as they are. Of course with regard to convict prisons, I think the system of absolute silence is an abomination. According to the present rule a man may be sentenced for life, and he is to be silent for life according to the rules. Well, I look upon that as horrible, and as condemning a man to absolute silence for the whole of his life, or for 20 years. It used not to exist in convict prisons, and it has been introduced in recent years. It cannot be a good thing, and if a man's faculties are so stifled I think it must be a bad thing.

2974. Do you say that the silent system has been introduced recently?—It has. It has not been of very long continuance.

2975. How long?—I could not tell you, perhaps 10 years or so; I know some convicts used to be allowed to choose their companions, I do not remember the exact way in which the system of allowing the conversation was worked in the convict prisons, but I think there were evils connected with it, and I think those evils might be obviated.

2976. Have you ever been in a convict prison?—There is little to see there which cannot be seen in a local prison as all convicts pass through local prisons.

2977. Do you imagine that there is improper talking in chapel?—Yes, there is a tendency to it. Well, you hear men of that class talking to each other outside. It is pretty rough talk, and it is very much the same talk inside. You pass a street corner where the class of men who go into prison are talking to one another and you hear pretty strong language. You are apt to hear and you do hear exactly the same sort of language in chapel, and nothing more or less but just the same sort of language the social class they belong to indulge in.

2978. At Wandsworth they sit very close together?—They do. I think if you had half the prisoners in on one day and the other half the other day, you would by physical means prevent so much talking.

2979. Do you think that the chapel at Wandsworth is so crowded that there is considerable danger of improper communications?—I do.

2980. The prisoners are sitting close together?—Too close together.

2981. And there is a very small space between one row and another?—Yes; and there is no space at all between one prisoner and another. They are packed together too tight.

2982. And you think means could be found for giving greater space?—Yes, by letting one half of them come to chapel one day, and the other half the next.

2983. With regard to what you say about dividing the prisoners and having two services, does that involve more work upon the chapel?—It would be exactly the same thing. If you have one-half in on one day and the other half in on the next day, you would be having two sets of prisoners, and they would be only getting chapel every alternate day, and I am prepared to say that that is quite enough.

2984. Then with regard to the industrial labour in cells, I suppose you are in favour of that so far as it can be carried out?—Yes, I am.

2985. Such as mat making?—Yes, certainly. I think the industry of mat making was most unfortunately destroyed in the prisons. I do not exactly know the intimate facts of the case. Therefore I do not say this as anything more than what I have heard, but I hear the reason it was destroyed was because the monopoly of mat making was given to one firm, the result of which was that the other mat makers combined, and so the Home Secretary destroyed it altogether.

2986. Do you say a monopoly was given by Government to one firm?—Yes, to Messrs. Goodacre; and the remarkable thing is that these very people, I understand, learnt mat-making in prison.

2987. Was it a contract for prison labour, or what?—Yes, they contracted for prison labour, and they got the contract for the whole of the prison labour of England.

2988. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) To sell mats made by the Government?—Yes. If the Government had had the prudence to divide the contract amongst a number of them it would possibly have split up the combination, and there would have been no disturbance at all.

Rev. W. D. Morrison.

31 July 1894.

I do not know whether it was to save trouble, but there may be good reasons for it.

2989. (Chairman.) I can quite understand that what you say has produced an effect, but I understood the chief opposition to the mat making came from the trades unions and the workmen themselves?—I do not know about that. They worked on the trades unionists, but I believe it was stirred up by the manufacturers.

2990. You have a strong opinion of the desirability of restoring it?—Yes; I think it is one of the best of industries, because it can be learned in so short a time.

2991. Is there any other industry?—Well, some of the county magistrates used to make a profit out of their prisons. The prison I have heard at Hull sometimes used to pay its expenses.

2992. Are you against what is called unproductive labour?—Yes; I think it is a degrading form of labour, and the best of the prisoners like it least. There is no amount of skill required in it. It is only grind, grind, grind. If he is a good class of prisoner, he complains of that a good deal.

2993. You are now speaking of the unproductive crank?—Yes; and mills and that kind of thing. The best class of prisoners object to that.

2994. Do they object to the mill and pump as much as to the unproductive crank?—Yes; they object to the whole of that sort of thing, because there is nothing to occupy the mind. It is a mere physical operation, and I do not think that should be used.

2995. That goes to the root, does not it, of what is called first class hard labour?—It does.

2996. Would you be in favour of abolishing that kind of labour?—I certainly would.

2997. Would you substitute any other kind of hard labour for it?—If hard labour did any good to the prisoner afterwards, I would retain it; but I do no think it has any reformative effect. I think what yo want is to get as much industrial labour out of men a possible, because there is nothing that dignifies the mind of even a prisoner so much as the knowledge that he has done a good day's work at something which is remunerative. It gives him a feeling he never has on a crank or pump or anything of that kind.

2998. Of course this question of labour bears very directly on the question of health and the physical and moral condition of the prisoner. You are of opinion that the present system tells most unfavourably upon the prisoners' mental condition?—Yes, and physical too. We do not have an account of all the illness in prison in the statistics.

2999. I think you have said that the number of suicides are out of proportion in the prison population?—That has been decreasing recently, but I think the suicide has been transmuted into insanity on account of the physical obstacles in the way of its accomplishment. There was an inquiry into the amount of suicides in prison some time ago.

3000–1. In 1879 and 1880, I think?—Yes. If you look at that inquiry you will see that most of the suicides arose very soon after reception, so that suicide must have arisen in the prison. That is perfectly certain. We are told that a great deal of insanity arises outside the prison, but it is a perfect certainty anyhow that suicide arises inside the prison, and I think it is questionable whether a certain amount that is said to be insanity arising previous to imprisonment did exist before the man was sent to prison.

3002. I see that the summary of the results to which you have been alluding with regard to the first three points are that the tendency to commit suicide is greater?—Yes, when they come in at first. So is insanity when they come in first.

3003. Secondly, that persons under remand or waiting for trial are more likely to commit suicide than persons who have received their sentence?—That is perfectly true.

3005. But all those results rather go to show that suicide is dissociated from prison discipline?—I do not know that. I believe if you take a man and put him into a cell where he has no work at all, as happens when a man is committed to prison, it has a bad effect on him. When a magistrate commits a man to prison he is put in the unconvicted part of the prison and he is allowed to work or not as he likes. In fact, he does not get any work to do unless he asks for it, and that man, by the mere monotony and the silence and the solitude he is exposed to, becomes a prey to insanity and suicide.

3006. Do yon think he is affected by the depression and discomfort which may result from punishment for breaches of prison discipline?—Of course it is not one cause alone that produces the suicide or the insanity, but it is a combination of them. There is the fear of sentence, the imprisonment, and the sense of shame it may be. Suicide as well as insanity is not produced by one single condition but oftenly a variety of conditions acting together.

3007. I think you have said in the article you have written or in "Crime and its causes," that the prison population is a population which is specially prone to congenital infirmities?—That is quite true.

3008. They are weaker and feebler?—Yes, they have predisposing conditions, and then if you put a man in circumstances which will aggravate those predisposing conditions you will have the explosion.

3009. The number of suicides in prison is less than you would reasonably expect having regard to those physical infirmities?—It has been decreased by mechanical means recently. Greater care has been taken to prevent the commission of suicide than used to be the case. In consequence of that committee's inquiry very great care was taken to prevent suicide from breaking out; and I believe in consequence of this committee's inquiries greater care will be taken to prevent the breaking out of insanity.

3010. As a matter of fact the proportion of suicides is not greater in prison than outside in relation to men of the same age?—I have not worked out the statistics of suicide quite recently, but it used to be very much higher. I have no doubt it is higher if I were only to work it out.

3011. Then with regard to insanity, I think in your article in the "Fortnightly" you have given the annual ratio from 1875 to 1877 at 113 per 10,000, and in 1890 to 1892 at 226 per 10,000. With regard to those figures from 1875 to 1877 are they compiled exactly in the same way as the more recent figures?—Precisely in the same way. There is no difference whatsoever. I do not know of any change that has taken place in the way of compiling the figures. If a case of insanity breaks out it is put down by the doctor, and he is bound to report it at the end of the year. He was bound to report it to the Home Office before, and he is bound to report it to the Government central authority. I know some people say there is not so much care taken as in the past, but that is always the assertion. It is a very convenient way of getting out of a difficulty, but that is not my way of getting out of a difficulty. I say there was as much care taken by the local authority as is taken by the central authority.

3012. But of course the number committed to asylums has steadily increased?—Yes, there is an increase of insanity undoubtedly, as far as I can see—doctors differ. Dr. Ogle does not think so, but I think the general opinion is coming to be that it is increasing; and I think the Lunacy Commissioners are coming to admit it now in their last report.

3013. Has not the proportion of cured people discharged from an asylum increased?—I am not sure whether that is so or not. I have not followed that point sufficiently closely to be able to say.

3014. Is it not also the fact that it is the growing practice on the part of magistrates to commit persons who are brought before them whom they may have reason to think are not of sound mind?—I do not think that it is a growing practice. I think magistrates used to commit people on remand. There used to be as many committed on remand as there are now, I think.

3015. Is not it natural that it should be a growing practice?—It might be and it might not. I doubt if it is.

3016. Is not it a matter of increasing difficulty now, to get medical men to give certificates for removal to an asylumn?—Well, I am not sufficiently acquainted with the facts to say whether it is so or not.

3017. And by sending a person to prison a good deal of trouble and expense is avoided?—No, I do not believe in that again. I do not think at all that men are sent before magistrates that thay may be certified to be insane. That I do not believe for one moment.

3018. But the fact that so many prisoners are returned in the report as insane, who come in in that condition and are found to be insane rather tends, does it not, to support the view that this is an increasing tendency?—It is said they come in large numbers in that way, but I have serious doubts about whether it is so or not. I believe that they may become insane when they are in prison, just as people commit suicide when they are in prison. The suicide takes place inside the prison anyhow and the insanity may do the same. We have no absolute proof that the men had not become insane when they came in. If the doctor has to examine, as he has to at Holloway, perhaps 100 prisoners in the morning, it is often impossible for him to say whether a man is sane or insane. It often requires a long time to ascertain. I remember a man once being in Wakefield for six months or even more before we could find out he was insane. I was convinced he was insane, but the doctor could not find any trace of it, and I could not find any definite trace of it myself for some time, but one day he was talking to me, and he said, "I am the man that tried to shoot "the Duke of Edinburgh at Melbourne." That was his delusion, that he was the man that tried to shoot the Duke of Edinburgh at Melbourne a great many years ago, and that is how it came to be found out.

3019. Taking the figures for 1893 there were 307 cases of insanity, and in 251 of them it was found that the disease existed and was found on reception into the prison?—So it is said.

3020. And that in 227 cases of mental disease it was recognised a few days after reception?—So it is said.

3021. And that in only 34 cases did the disease appear to originate within 21 days after reception?—Yes. These things are stated. That is all I will say about it.

3022. They are stated on the responsibility of the medical officer?—That is perfectly true, but I do not think it is possible for a medical officer who has a vast number of prisoners to say this off-hand in all cases. The border line between sanity and insanity is a vast one.

3023. If a man is overworked, would not the tendency on his mind be rather to err on the side of caution?—Well, the case comes before him afterwards. The man does become insane afterwards, and he may believe he was insane on admission, or he might see something strange with him. Very often men are strange without being insane. He might see something strange with him on admittance, and he might believe he was insane.

3024. I have got figures relating to Wandsworth, and in 1890, according to this report, four prisoners were found insane, of whom three were insane on reception, and the fourth developed general paralysis of the insane two months after reception?—Yes, great precautions are taken at Wandsworth to avoid insanity. We have this large association room in which large numbers of people who might otherwise become insane are put. Then, remember, that Wandsworth is a prison for convicted prisoners; not for prisoners who are not convicted, but who are only received. Holloway is a prison for prisoners on reception before trial; Wandsworth for convicted prisoners. Therefore, a very large number of insane cases would be weeded out before they reach Wandsworth at all; just as they are weeded out in the local prisons before they reach the convict prisons.

3025. Yes, I quite see that, but according to your theory that the present system of prison discipline acts on the mental state of the prisoner, of course, one would expect to find a larger number of prisoners develop insanity in a prison like Wandsworth?—The shortening of sentences has an effect on it too, and Wandsworth is a short-sentence prison. If you take them for a very short time they have not time to develop it.

3026. I think one of your points was that there was a larger increase in insanity in local than in convict prisons?—Yes.

3027. It is difficult to reconcile them?—The amount of insanity on reception may be very large, but the amount of insanity afterwards may be very considerable too. Of course there is a very great deal of difference of opinion among doctors. Take, for instance, a prison where the doctor is rather an expert in insanity, and finds a good deal. Another doctor who does not pay so much attention to that finds very little. The border line between sanity and insanity is so wide in many cases, that it is not so easy to say "Yes" or "No," and one doctor may say it is on one side of the line, and another doctor may say it is on the other; and some doctors are far more particular about certifying that a case is insane than others are. It depends to a large extent on the doctor.

3028. We also recognise that the question of insanity is one which is surrounded with immense difficulties. You will be inclined to admit that it is very difficult to form definite conclusions about it, either in prison or out of prison?—Yes; I am looking only at facts. I say if I see insanity increasing in prison under precisely the same conditions from 113 in 10,000 to 226 in 10,000, there is a very serious state of things which requires inquiring into, and we have no proof that exactly the same number on admission before 1878 were not as insane on admission then as we have them now.

3029. Then as between the figures for 1875 and 1877, and the figures for 1892 and 1893 surely differences have arisen with regard to the prison population. In 1875 and 1877 there would be a larger number of young persons in prison, children?—Yes, there was a larger number and that would affect it to some extent, but that is neutralized by the fact that the sentences are now at least 25 per cent. shorter than they were at that time. Sentences have decreased one-fourth, I should say, within the last 10 years. That can be proved by figures.

3030. Still would that compensate for the great change effected by sending children in increasing numbers to Industrial and Reformatory schools?—Yes. The death-rate in prisons has diminished largely because people are in for so short a time that they have not time to die. Dying is a process. It takes time to die, and if you have people in prisons of the same class for a long time the per-centage of deaths will be greater, because the effect of imprisonment will be greater on them and they will die in larger numbers. Prisoners when they come in are always in a certain state of health.

3031. Assuming that the figures you give are a fair standard of comparison, what do you argue?—Well, I argue this—that the conditions of prison life are such that we want to diminish this ratio of insanity. If the conditions of prison life are such that 226 persons per 10,000 are found insane per annum in a prison, we say the conditions to which these men are subjected are bad, and we want to alter them in some way.

3032. Do you connect the change in any way with the Prisons Act of 1877?—I think there is a connexion. I think when the magistrates used to come in and go round and see men, and see curious cases, and so on, a number of them are very kind men, and they made a recommendation as to the treatment of the man, and he would be attended to. The magistrates then had responsibility. They were responsible for their prisons. They looked at each other's counties to see which county was doing best, and then there was a certain amount of healthy emulation among them; but now there is none of that; the magistrates have practically no power.

Adjourned for a short time.

3033. We will pass on to communications with prisoners. Will you give us your opinion with regard to the regulations at present existing?—In the case of old offenders I think the regulations concerning visits and communications should be left as they are with one exception, which is that children should not be allowed to visit these offenders unless in exceptional circumstances and under exceptional conditions. These exceptional conditions will in the nature of a death in the family. In such cases the child should be allowed to see the parent without the intervention of barriers and other humiliating conditions calculated to destroy the child's respect for its father or mother. That, I think, is a change that ought to be adopted.

3034. Then would you allow interviews between husband and wife?—Yes; in the case of first offenders I should also allow an interview between husband and wife, and in the case of first offenders it might take place free from humiliating barriers. Interviews of that character are very heartbreaking. The wife, if she is the innocent person, and the husband, if he is the innocent man, feel it very keenly.

3035. Then you would leave the discretion with the Governor?—Yes, decidedly.

3036. Then with regard to the old offenders?—In the case of old offenders I should not allow them to receive a visit or write a letter except in the present way and according to the present system; but if there was a death in his family, for instance, and a child came to visit him in consequence, I should allow the child to visit him, but I should not allow a child to visit a prisoner as a rule at all.

3037. Then under these exceptional circumstances you would always allow a child to see a prisoner?—Yes.

3038. No matter how he had behaved in prison?—Well, in all these cases, no matter how a man has behaved in prison, a death is always communicated to him, and I think if it is a death of a near relative, such as a father or mother, or wife or child, that a visit should be allowed in such circumstances even to an old offender, no matter how he has behaved in prison. I would allow that.

3039. Then with regard to juveniles?—In the case of juveniles I think the three months should be relaxed for the parents' sake. They often write very pitiful letters to us to see their child—their son or their daughter—and they are not allowed to do so under existing circumstances. Then it should be relaxed on account of the offender himself, because they are often frightened to go home again, and if they are not allowed to communicate with their friends to know how they will be received at home they do not go home at all; so that I think there ought to be some communication established between the parent and the child if it is possible when the child is in prison, and in all cases where juveniles are imprisoned I think his parents, if he has any, should be communicated with and informed when and under what conditions they can write him a letter or pay him a visit. That ought to be done.

3040. That refers to prisoners under 16?—Yes, I would make it refer to prisoners older than 16. If it were a first offender I should not mind making it refer to prisoners under 21, because it is often the first breaking away from the home that is the worst of all things, and if when the prisoner is in prison he can be induced to enter again in communication with his parents it often does him more good than anything else.

3041. Then with regard to the first offenders?—Yes; the three months' rule, I think, should be relaxed in their case, although what a first offender really is I do not know. Our prison returns are so dreadfully bad in that respect. If you take the prison returns for this year and look at the number of previous convictions in such a prison as Liverpool, and compare it with the previous convictions in a London prison, you will see that our statistics relating to habitual criminals are very defective. It is difficult to know what a "first offender" is. Supposing then this man is a first offender, the three months' rule should be relaxed in his case, partly on account of the offender himself, but mostly on account of anxious relatives. It should be relaxed to the extent of allowing the first offender either to write a letter or receive a visit, or perhaps in both directions. It should be relaxed in one respect at least in the case of a first offender.

3042. Then with regard to communications between prisoners and officials?—It should be permitted, I think, for a prisoner to send for the schoolmaster. He can often say to the schoolmaster what he cannot say to the chaplain; and in some of our small prisons there is no permanent chaplain at all, so that there is nobody except the Governor he can apply to see; and the Governor is a busy man in the prison and cannot always see a prisoner. Down in the North for instance, where there are a good number of Nonconformists I think it is only fair that they should be allowed to have the choice of selecting the schoolmaster or the chaplain just as they like. Sometimes the Nonconformists have very strong feelings, and I think if we can respect them even in a prison we ought to do it.

3043. What is the rule at present with regard to the interviews between the schoolmaster and prisoners?—He is practically in the same position as a warder. His position has been degraded for some mysterious reason in the local prison service, and in the convict prison service his status is a very much better one for no reason whatever; in the local service I think a schoolmaster is more needed than in the convict service, because you have a very much larger proportion of young people. One-fifth of our prison population is under 21, so that you have the largest juvenile population in the local prison, and yet the schoolmaster is not allowed to speak to them, except when he is teaching them.

3044. As a matter of fact they must speak to them to a certain extent?—Yes; but they are not supposed to do it unless they are compelled to do it.

3045. They can see a prisoner alone in his cell?—No, decidedly not. If a schoolmaster is going to teach him he can see him alone in his cell, but not at other times.

3046. Then there is no supervision?—No.

3047. So that he could speak to him then?—Yes; but there are a number of prisoners who do not require teaching, but yet who would like to see the schoolmaster about something. The schoolmaster is nearer to them socially than the chaplain, and they can say things they cannot say to the chaplain, and one gets to know a great deal through the schoolmaster about prisoners. I think he should not be crippled in his capacity at all, and if you are going to give a man the position of a schoolmaster you should place sufficient confidence in him to allow him a discretion as to what he shall say to the prisoner.

3048. How does the schoolmaster get to see a prisoner. Is it where the prisoner asks to be taught?—Only when we certify that the prisoner shall be taught. Supposing a man comes in for four months, I examine him to see whether he can read and write and sum. If I do not think he can read and write and sum sufficiently I say, "You had better be taught by the schoolmaster;" and if he is under 40 he is taught; but if we do not say that he is to be taught the schoolmaster has no right to go near him at all, except for the distribution of books.

3049. Is it open to a prisoner to ask to receive instruction after he has passed under your supervision?—It is open to him to ask to receive it, but if he is a good-enough scholar, that is, if he can read and write, and sum perfectly well; if he can read a book and write a letter to his friends, then there is no necessity that he should receive any more instruction. In fact, our schoolmasters could not give it them.

3050. Do you think it would be better that the prisoner should be allowed to see the schoolmaster than see the chief warder?—I think, in many cases, it would be very much better; but at present a prisoner cannot make an application to see the schoolmaster.

3051. The schoolmaster is a discipline officer?—Yes, he is a discipline officer now. He never used to be. In the local prisons, at Wakefield for instance, he was a most useful man in the prisons under the local authorities, because he was not a discipline officer. He went about in the same clothes as people outside, and the prisoner did not look upon him as a discipline officer, and therefore treated him with a certain amount of confidence, and he was able to exercise his influence on the prisoner, but now we have reduced our prison schoolmasters to mere discipline officers. We make them sleep in at night just as if they were warders, and we keep them on for as long hours as if they were warders. I consider the position of a schoolmaster now, in a local prison, is most unsatisfactory.

3052. Would you propose that they should not wear a uniform?—I do, and I propose that they should not be discipline officers at all, but they should be what they are—schoolmasters. It is difficult to combine disciplinary with educational functions.

3053. If what you suggest is carried out, would not there be some harmful competition taking place between the chaplain and the schoolmaster?—I do not think so. Everything in the end, of course, comes to common sense, and if people will not work a system with common sense it will not work, but I do not see why there should be any competition between the two, and I should think the chaplain ought to be only too glad to get the assistance of somebody else.

3054. Did this alteration in the status of the schoolmaster take place in consequence of the transference by the Act of 1877?—Yes.

3055. When did it first take place?—I do not know.

3056. Was it before you came into the service?—I do not remember. The old staff of schoolmasters was still in existence for some time after the transfer.

3057. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) As the new schoolmasters come in, they come in as warders?—Yes.

3058. But the old schoolmasters retain their status?—Yes.

3059. (Chairman.) Still do they not wear uniform?—No, they do not.

3060. Have you any at Wandsworth?—No, ours are schoolmaster warders, as they call them.

3061. You have none of the old ones?—No.

3062. Coming to visits to prisoners by outside agencies, have you any recommendation to make?—I think women attached to Prisoners' Aid Societies when approved by the Home Office, should be allowed at certain hours, and under certain defined conditions to visit female offenders, and I also would recommend that they should be allowed to visit boys under 16, when they are prepared to provide the boy with occupation on release. I should not allow them to come in merely to talk, and I should not allow them to come to visit adult male prisoners.

3063. You are speaking of women visitors?—Yes.

3064. Do you approve of the existing system with regard to Prisoners' Aid Societies?—Of what system?

3065. Well, it seems to vary a good deal, but the general idea seems to be that the Society attached to the prison has special facilities for seeing prisoners before discharge?—Yes, that is quite true.

3066. Do you think that the present system works well?—I think it works satisfactorily so far as that is concerned. Our method at Wandsworth is this: the Visiting Magistrates come round and they see anybody who chooses to make an application to see them, and then they consider his case and if they think his case a deserving one they decide how much aid he shall receive, and the agent of the society sees the prisoner and the following morning, on his discharge, sometimes he sees him in the prison itself and then gives the aid.

3067. Then when you say the Visiting Justices decide how much aid he shall receive, what does that mean?—Well, it means whether he shall receive clothes, or whether he shall receive tools, or whether he shall receive lodging money.

3068. By what authority do they say what he shall receive or what he shall not receive after he leaves the prison?—Well, they say it on their authority. They get the funds.

3069. What I am driving at is this: representations have been made to the Home Office by different societies asking for greater facilities for access to the prisoners and they say that for one reason or another they are kept away from the prisoners. They are anxious, more especially with regard to individual cases, to help the men, but under the present system they say they cannot get at them and that the access is monopolised by certain societies who are rather jealously inclined to exclude the co-operation of other societies?—There may be something in that.

3070. Do you see any objection to allowing a prisoner, if he likes, to see a list of all the societies and the names of the societies' agents that are willing to help prisoners, and to his making a selection of a particular society which he wishes to be helped by; and then allow the agent of that society to see the prisoner before discharge?—Well, that proposition is new to me. I should not like to give a definite answer on it just at once; because you might have a prisoner taking a mental note of all the societies and going round to all the societies afterwards and getting assistance from all the societies.

3071. But surely a Prisoners' Aid Society ought to be on its guard against that practice?—Yes, they ought to be, but I do not know that they are. I quite agree with you that it would be a very good thing if we could get as many Prisoners' Aid Societies to help us as possible. The more Prisoners' Aid Societies we can get to help us the better I shall be pleased, but it must be done with discretion, and it must be done so as not to turn the prisoner into a mendicant when he goes out. I do not know that I should hang up a copy of all the societies in the cell.

3072. I did not mean that, but suggested that a notice might be put in his cell that if he applied for such a list he could see it?—Yes, there would be no harm in that, but the danger is that we should be turning these prisoners into beggars who would be going to all the societies asking this society for assistance, and that society for assistance, and so on, and really abusing the privileges of the societies.

3073. With regard to prison offences?—My duties in connection with prison offences consist in visiting offenders who have been convicted of those offences by the Governor. I think that numbers of these offences are produced by the nature of prison life itself. I think the solitude and monotony of the cell often makes a man commit offences. He gets perfectly mad sometimes in a cell, and he has an outbreak without any reason whatsoever. Women have more than men. Women have simply a time when they break out, and you cannot tell why. Then I think degrading prison labour produces it too.

3074. You find more offences in local prisons than in convict prisons?—Yes, very many more. About three times as many as in convict prisons.

3075. Will you hand in a table on that?—Yes (the table was handed in, see Appendix VI.). There is a very much larger per-centage in the local prisons than in the convict prisons owing to the system of regulations. Our regulations in the local prison system produced three times as many offences in proportion to the daily average of population as you will see by that return.

Rev. W. D. Morrison.

31 July 1894.

3076. With regard to these returns which you have handed in, are they compiled from official figures?—Yes, you will find them in the last two Blue Books.

3077. They are taken out of the Blue Books?—Yes, they are taken out of the Directors' reports and the Commissioners' reports.

3078. Then to go on with the conditions which produce prison offences?—Well, I think that prisoners often get ill in the prison and they get miserable, and they break windows or do something, and they get into trouble in that way. Then the prison officers cause offences too, no doubt. Many prison officers are not very discreet or very sensible people. They do not understand prisoners frequently at all, and the result is that the prisoners gets into trouble. The officers charges him with being insolent, and the Governor sentences the prisoner to so much punishment; and I am sure that the outbreak at Wormwood Scrubs that arose two years ago or so, arose to a very large extent from the indiscreet way in which the prison was handled at that time. The officers were too young to begin with.

3079. You were not at Wormwood Scrubs?—No, I was not, but I know well about it, because Captain Schuyler was there, and from what I know, I believe we had some of the men who were at Wormwood Scrubs.

3080. Well Captain Schuyler will be here on Friday so that we can follow that up then?—One man who came to us had received what I conceived to be an inhuman amount of punishment.

3081. In consequence of what?—In consequence of bad management of the prison, I think. I think it arose because they had too many young officers there.

3082. I want to understand you. You say the prisoners who came to you at Wandsworth from Wormwood Scrubs had received inhuman punishment?—I think undue punishment.

3083. What punishment do you allude to?—I allude to flogging.

3084. At Wandsworth?—No; I allude to Wormwood Scrubs.

3085. These prisoners told you so themselves?—No. It is on their records. It is not their putting down at all. If you will call for the official record of a prisoner called J. E. you will see it.

3086. These official records come to you at Wandsworth?—Yes. There was an outbreak at the Wormwood Scrubs, and these men had to be dispersed all over England to quiet it, and some of them came down to us. This was about two years ago. I was away when they came down, but as soon as I returned I went to see these men, and I went into the cell of one man named J. E. I found him in a sort of collapse. I went to the doctor and the doctor took him and put him in a cell, and he had to remain, I think, under medical treatment for the whole of the remainder of his sentence, and if you look at the record you will see that there was too much punishment inflicted on the man. I do not say there was any but good intention, or that it was not done with the best of motives, but I say it was indiscreetly done. There was too much punishment.

3087. On the record which came under your notice, was it flogging?—Flogging, cells, bread and water, and all sorts of punishment. The man wrote a most pathetic letter to his friends which was not allowed to go out, because it was making observations on his treatment.

3088. These punishments being inflicted before the breaking out?—Yes, and I believe it was in consequence of those severe punishments that that breaking out took place. I do not believe it would have taken place at all if there had not been such severity exercised.

3089. And you think it is possible to remove some of those conditions?—I do, by a proper staff of officers. I do not think if you take a number of young fellows and put them in charge of old prisoners it is very effective. If you take a boy of 25 and put him in charge of prisoners of 40 or 50 who have been in prison before, and who know more about prison life than the boy himself, you would get the whole prison in an uproar. As far as the men who came to us, that man in particular, I think the punishment which was inflicted on him was what ought not to be inflicted on any man.

3090. The record would not state the cause of the punishment?—Yes, it states the cause why the man was punished and the punishment he received.

3091. But the record which you saw?—Yes, the amount of punishment he received, and the way the punishment was given is on the record. A prisoner has always a record, and this record states the prisoner's name, his sentence, and particulars about him, and also the punishment that he receives, and the reasons why he receives this punishment.

3092. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) And when he was transferred a copy of this record was furnished to Wandsworth Prison?—Yes; the man never got into trouble with us at all, he was a most peaceable man.

3093. (Chairman.) How long was he with you?—Six or seven months.

3094. Have you any other individual cases?—There were very few cases that came to us. I think most of them went out very soon afterwards, but I think that the records of all those prisoners that were transferred from that prison at that time ought to be called for.

3095. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Who were transferred to other places?—Yes.

3096. (Chairman.) Now with regard to your recommendations?—Well, I would recommend that in the first place if you have more workshop labour you will have far less punishment arising than with cellular imprisonment. In the second place I would abolish penal labour, such as the crank, except as a punishment and the offences under this head will disappear. In the fourth place I would only admit half the prison population to chapel at a time so as to prevent the punishment which arises from talking in chapel. In the fifth place I think first-class prison food often makes men miserable and causes them to commit offences. I think the prison food should be made better. In the sixth place I think you should instruct all your prison officers as to the character of the prison population and the severities of prison discipline in its normal form. It is only a knowledge of prison character and the effect of discipline upon the prisoner which enable you to get good management.

3097. With regard to that, what do you say about the diet? Do you say that this low diet injures the prisoner physically?—I think it destroys his self-restraint. He has at the best of times not very much restraining power over himself, but if you give him very little food he seems to have no restraint at all. Then I say, "do not give your officers too long hours." I say the hours put down on paper are mere paper hours; they are not the hours the officers work which are put down in the blue book. The officers are on duty about an hour longer I should say on the whole than is put down on paper. Then many of the prison officers are discontented. As I said before, the local prison officers think they are overlooked in favour of the convict prison officers because they are not known by the Prison Commissioners. Then another proposition I would make is, to abolish the power of the Prison Directors to inflict corporal punishment. I would certainly do that. What is done now? Gentlemen are appointed who have no experience at all of prisons. These gentlemen are given the power of inflicting a punishment on the prisoner which is refused to the highest judges of the land except in one or two special circumstances. If the offence which a prisoner is often flogged for was to take place outside he would be punished with a paltry fine by the magistrate in many cases. I do believe the Prison Directors are competent persons. I believe they are able men; but I do not believe they ought to have the power of flogging, because some of them have had no experience of prisoners at all. It is like taking me and putting me in command of a man-of-war; I may have any amount of ability, but I could not direct it.

3098. One witness has suggested to the Committee that, with regard to women, hand-cuffing should be substituted as a punishment for a penal diet?—Well, I do not like mechanical restraints at all if they can be helped; but it is a thing to think out. It is really a matter that the Committee would be able to form as good a judgment upon as I should be.

3099. You have had women prisoners under your charge?—Yes, I have.

3100. But you do not like to approve that suggestion?—I really do not like putting women under mechanical restraint.

3101. Would you be in favour of allowing long sentence local prisoners to have the power of earning remission?—It is a question I have often thought of. I do not see why one should object to it. If a convict prisoner is to be allowed to earn a remission I really do not see why the local prisoner should not. It is just possible it might have a good effect in the way of diminishing prison offences, because it would hold out the hope to a man that he would get out all the sooner if he would keep free from punishment.

3102. Now with regard to juvenile offenders. Of course under the present rules juvenile offenders must be under 16?—Yes.

3103. I should like to ask whether you think imprisonment has less of a deterrent effect on juveniles than it has on older men?—Well, I do not know that there is very much to be said for the one or the other.

3104. I will put it another way. They mind it less during the time it lasts?—No, they do not mind it very much. They do not understand it. They do not see the meaning of it or the effect it will have upon them in the future. They do not realise it much. They are immature and they do not realise it. The existing regulations as to juveniles are that a juvenile has a mattress under 16. He has the diet of a female prisoner; he has second-class labour; he has school for one hour daily; notification is sent to his friends of the date of his discharge with a request that they will be at the prison gate to meet him; and if he is under 14 the Home Secretary is apprised of the fact. Now in Belgium the Minister of Justice is always apprised of the imprisonment of all juveniles under 16, and all those cases he orders to be removed from the prison and placed in a quartier de discipline, a reformatory school.

3105. I think the Home Secretary here is only notified of those under 14?—That is all. I would recommend the abolition of imprisonment for children under 14. I think on this point our penal law should be brought into line with industrial legislation. The Factories and Workshops Act says "the expression 'child' means a person under the age of 14." Then I think that young children under 14 should be dealt with if the home was a bad home by sending him to an educational institute of some kind for his own good. If he has not exhibited a serious degree of depravity, finding a surety to come up for judgment if called upon might be resorted to; but if he exhibits a serious degree of depravity I would send him to some home, even if he has a good mother. The report, I think, should be more explicit than at present, and should go to the age of 16. It is impossible for the Home Secretary with the present reports to say what to do with the child. There is a report which is sent to the Home Secretary as to a child under 14, but it does not enable the Home Secretary to judge what sort of case it is.

3106. Of course the Home Secretary does not act upon that, but he would refer it to the authorities?—It would not be for action at all, but simply for his information. Then as to the young prisoners between 16 and 21, I do not think it is realised at all what a high per-centage of the general population between 16 and 21 come into our prisons. That arises from the way in which our figures are drawn up. It is only for five years, from 16 to 21.

3107. We have asked the Prison Commissioners to give us full information about that?—It is from 21 to 30, and from 31 to 40 in the case of other offenders, so that the proportion to the population of other offenders is much greater than it appears. For instance, 13·36 per 1,000 of young offenders between 16 and 21 are annually committed to prison; between 21 and 30 the per-centage is just the same, it being 13·88. So that you have as large a per-centage of young people between 16 and 21 committed to prison in proportion to the numbers of the population as you have of grown men between 21 and 30. That is a fact the statistics do not bring out at all, and they should be altered so as to bring it out. Here is a return dealing with that point, and it should be altered so as to bring that out. (The return was handed in. See Appendix III.) Now I should like to give you another return showing you the parentage and social condition of 100 male prisoners who on their last birthday were 16, 17, and 18 in Wandsworth Prison between the 14th and 20th of June. 54 per cent. of these young people were living at home; 46 per cent. were in lodgings; 32 per cent. had one or both parents dead. (The return was handed in. See Appendix III.)

3108. (Mr. O'Connor.) What does "at home" mean?—Living either with parents or with relatives of some kind or another. Then as to the occupations of these: 77 per cent. were at unskilled labour, 23 per cent. were at skilled labour. I may remark that the lower down you go in the scale of labour the higher up you get in the ranks of crime, and that comes out by looking at the general returns dealing with the population as a whole. For instance, general labourers form 64 per cent. of the prison population. They only form about 16 per. cent. of the general population, and you will find exactly the same thing here with regard to these young people. They form 77 per cent. of the unskilled labour. Then if you take the height of these children you will find that it is distinctly inferior to the height of the general population. In fact, 92 per cent. of the children of 16 and over were below the height of the general population. 94 per cent. between 16 and 17 were below the height of the general population. 89 per cent. of the age of 18 were below the height of the general population. It is the same with weight. But that I think will give you an idea as to the physical and social condition of young offenders who come into our prisons between 16 and 19. (The document was handed in. See Appendix III.) Then a very large number of those that have parents have bad ones, because as a matter of fact we have 86,000 cases of parents who are tried every year for not sending their children to school.

3109. These are included in the cases described as "at home"?—The 86,000 cases are. This is a different point altogether. The 86,000 cases tried before the school board of course would be "at home" cases. There is another return I was going to give you. If you look at the Reformatory and Industrial Schools Return you will find exactly the same state of things as in that return I have just handed in; those who are at home, and those who are not at home. This return that I have here shows the per-centage of labourers in the general population, and also the per-centage of labourers in the prison population. (The document was handed in. See Appendix III.) Then I have here a return dealing with the question of juvenile crime per 100,000 of the population, showing where most juvenile crime arises in the country, and you will see that it arises generally where there is the greatest density of population (The document was handed in. See Appendix III.

3110. Are those returns all taken from the Blue Book?—Yes, every one of them.

3111. You could append a reference to them?—Yes, I can give plenty of references to Blue Books, and everything. I may put in these returns now.

Rev. W. D. Morrison.

31 July 1894.

3112. If you please?—This is a return showing the relation between pauperism and crime. Where there is most pauperism there is least crime. (The return was handed in. See Appendix III.) Here is a return showing the relation between illegitimacy and pauperism both running together, showing that illegitimacy is not a serious factor in juvenile crime, because it occurs in the country. (The return was handed in. See Appendix III.) Here is a return showing the relation between density of population and crime, there being most crime as a rule where population is most dense. (The return was handed in. See Appendix III.)

3113. Even in proportion to population?—Yes, always where the population is most dense there is most crime. I hand in these returns to show the juvenile offender is the product of bad parental, economic, and social conditions, and I say the aim in the case of these juveniles should be to remove these adverse conditions where they are removeable, and in no circumstances to aggravate them, as we do now, by imprisonment, and with a view to doing so I recommend in the first place that these juveniles between 16 and 18 anyhow, or, if you like, between 16 and 21, should be in special establishments where the juveniles are sufficiently numerous, and in special divisions of the prison where they are not numerous. The article of the German penal code is to that effect, and I think you wanted me to give you that. It is at page 152 of the book I have where you will find the article of the German penal code. It is article 57.

3114. (Chairman.) We had better get a translation of it?—Yes, I will give you the translation. That is a book which might be useful to the Committee. This is my second recommendation. When placed in special establishments these institutions should be administered more on the reformatory than on prison principles.

3115. Will you translate it, so that we may have it on the notes?—Yes. "Imprisonment is to take place "in definite establishments or in definite divisions of "a prison in the case of young offenders." That is the translation. It is a free translation, but that is the point of it.

3117. I think you said that they should be administered more on reformatory than on prison lines?—Yes, they should be, "and the character of the "officers placed in charge of juveniles is of the "utmost importance." This is again from the German code. This is what the Prussian Standing Order says, "Whilst exercising strict supervision "over the young prisoner these officers shall regard "it as their special duty to awaken his better nature." Our prison officers, of course, are not allowed to speak to the boys. Then, Industrial occupation for juveniles shall be non-cellular. Cell life aggravates the morbid physical and mental conditions of a boy, and provokes them when they do not exist. At the present moment juvenile prisoners have more cell life than adult prisoners have in our prisons, because they are not fitted for service in the prison so that they have the worst time of it of all. They are kept more in the cells than anybody else. As a large per-centage of juvenile offenders are physically below the average, the prison scale of diet must be drawn up so as not to render them unfit for industrial life on discharge. Some of those children are not really fit to go to work to begin with. They are weak when they come in, and they are weaker when they go out, and I am never surprised to find them back again. On discharge juvenile offenders in large cities should be found occupation in country districts, for this reason, that they will be removed from temptation, if they can be kept in the country. "Up "to what age should a young prisoner be considered "a juvenile?" That is a point as to which I myself have not yet come to a definite opinion about. It is 16 in England at present; it is 18 in Germany; and in the new German Code perhaps it will be 21.

3118. In what state is that code?—It has been before the Reichstag but it has not yet passed. It was introduced by the Government. There is a strong opinion in favour of it in Germany; but they cannot get it through. The Factory Acts define a juvenile as a young person under the age of 18. In Lord Herschell's Act it is 21. That is the Betting Act. Age is a question I should not like to decide upon.

3119. Do you agree that there are many cases of habitual offenders between 17 and 21 who are as bad as any prisoners in confinement?—Do you mean that the offences they commit are as bad?

3120. That it is as difficult to reclaim them?—No, I do not. I think that they are all in a state of immaturity. All these children are in a more immature state than the children of the well-to-do in proportion to their age.

3121. You are speaking of persons up to 21?—Yes, they almost cease to grow when they reach the age of 16. You will see by that return the state of growth from 16 to 18. The growth is almost nil, whereas in the general population there is considerable growth after 16. If you look at Dr. Francis Warner's return as to industrial schools you will see he comes exactly to the same conclusion as I have done with regard to that (the document was handed in. See Appendix III.) The average for all schools is there. There is the per-centage of certified schools and there is the average for all schools. You will see there is a greater state of deficiency amongst industrial school children.

3122. What is that out of?—That was read before the Statistical Society by Dr. Warner.

3123. Would you propose to send these young criminal to a place in the nature of a reformatory?—I would.

3124. Would you send them to the existing reformatories?—Some of them I would. Many of those between 16 and 18 I would send to a reformatory. They are distinctly cases for a reformatory. Take a child now who comes into Wandsworth. He has got in the first place no home; in the second place he has got no occupation; in the third place he has no where to go when he gets out. What happens to him? He goes back into exactly the same condition of life that produced the offence, and therefore the offence is repeated. He goes on repeating the offence; he becomes an habitual criminal and goes away to penal servitude; that is how it is 3125. You think that sufficient discretion is not allowed under the present system by the rules to prison officials?—I do not think it is. I think if you are going to have prison officials put into positions of great responsibility you should in the first place see that they are competent men, and after you have found them to be competent men you should trust them.

3126. You think it is too centralised?—I think it is distinctly too centralised.

3127. I suppose it has always been open to prison officials to make representations to the Commissioners?—They can make representations. This is another return I should like to put in with regard to children eventually sent to reformatory schools who have been previously in voluntary schools.

Captain Schuyler.
3 Aug. 1894.

3128. (Chairman.) In connexion with prison offences, what is the practice at Wandsworth in obtaining evidence from the prisoners?—In the first place, a prisoner will come up and say "If you will "send for so-and-so, he will be able to state such-"and-such a fact." The governor invariably sends for that prisoner or the two in connexion with the case. We have an office, and they are kept outside and come in one at a time. He hears what the prisoner has to say about what he is being charged with, and then he asks the other prisoner if he was present, if he heard anything about it, and if he can give any evidence; he takes that evidence and weighs it for or against the prisoner.

3129. Is a prisoner against whom an offence is alleged allowed to call evidence from other prisoners?—Yes, as a rule he is.

3130. Then supposing a warder brings a charge against a prisoner for some breach of discipline or an assault, or any prison offence, would that prisoner be allowed to call other prisoners to give evidence on his behalf?—Yes, I think he would. In fact, it has been done at Wandsworth, I know.

3131. Practically then, in those cases you would call evidence, or rather you would receive evidence much as a magistrate would receive it in a court of law?—Quite so; and invariably in the case of officers. If a prisoner says that so-and-so was there he always does call him.

3132. Now with regard to prison labour, are you in favour of the unproductive crank system?—No, I am not. I have a gradation scheme here that I would show how I divide the labour if you would allow me to do so.

3133. Yes, perhaps you would go through it?—Yes, I will. I would divide the labour under four heads or classes from the lowest or degrading to the higher skilled remunerative or useful labour. The first would be non-productive. That is the cranks in cells of which we have 100 in Wandsworth. Under this head I would also class oakum picking as it can hardly be called remunerative, there being really no profit attached to it. It is only carried on to give employment to prisoners for whom no other work can be found under present arrangements, and although, perhaps, not degrading it is very little better. The second would be unskilled labour, such as cleaning, labouring, jobbing, cranks used for grinding wheat, and pumps, pumping water, cooks, whitewashers, gardeners, laundrymen, repairing sundry utensils, wood-chopping, and stoking. That is the second-class. Then the third-class would be skilled labour in simple industries such as mail bags, knitting, hammocks, repairing and making coal sacks, and so on. The fourth-class would be skilled labour in bonâ fide industries such as shoemaking, tailoring, brushmaking, waterproofs, bricklayers, carpenters, smiths, basket makers, painters, glaziers, &c. Those are the four heads I wished to class them under. Then I would abolish the unproductive crank labour, and would only keep sufficient oakum to employ very short sentence prisoners such as seven days or under, who could not in the time take up even unskilled labour, and for those prisoners who from some infirmity would be unable to do anything else, and are not tasked; and boys who at present only pick oakum; but, in passing, I advocate that they should be allowed to do simple industries. Then I would like to speak about the substitute for these labours (such as by the abolition of the cell cranks, and the majority of oakum picking), by which a large number of prisoners would have to have work found for them. I would suggest that prisoners of over seven days should be put to one of the classes tabulated as 2, 3, and 4. During the time the prisoners were not on the crank, that is the pumping water and the mills, they could be supplied with simple industries in their cells in lieu of oakum picking which is now done.

3134. Are you of opinion that the unproductive crank has a bad effect upon the prisoners?—Yes.

3135. Do they complain to you about it?—Well, not directly; but what to my mind proves it in one way is that we have a number of offences for idleness on the cranks.

3136. When you say that, do you mean the unproductive crank?—The unproductive crank in the cells as distinguished from the pumps and mills.

3137. How do you account for that?—Well, they are simply grinding away, and they have to do 8,000 turns in their cell knowing perfectly well that they are doing no good for the country or for anybody, and it is distasteful to them, I suppose, because they know that.

3138. I suppose the advantage of the crank is that there is no danger in it because it can be perfectly adjusted?—There is no danger whatever in it. They do tamper with it I know, but they can always be found out.

3139. Then the number of offences in connexion with the crank is very material—I mean the offences in connexion with the cell cranks and mills and pumps?—Yes, it is.

3140. Could you give us any figures demonstrating that?—I have left a Return behind me. I drew it out to show the number of offences on the cranks and on the pumps and mills for three months.

3141. Will you let us have it?—I will. I have drawn out the offences in the prison for three months showing all the different offences committed, and showing the number of cranks in cells and in the pumps and mills, and also offences in chapel, talking at exercise, &c.

3142. That will be a very useful return, so perhaps you will send it to us?—I think it is only for May, June, and July. It is only for the last three months. (For this Return see Appendix VI.)

3143. Have you anything to say as to the prison regulations as to the maximum and minimum hours of hard labour?—Our maximum is eight hours, and it runs from six to eight. I think myself that the hours are right.

3144. Does that mean that a man would work for eight hours at a corn mill, say?—No; perhaps he would be on before breakfast at the pumps. Then he would take his turn during the morning down at the mills in grinding corn, and then he might be again on the pumps in the afternoon; but as a matter of fact they do not do more than six hours.

3145. That is to say six hours absolutely turning the crank?—Absolutely turning it. Of course they have other work when they get to their cell, such as picking oakum, but they do not really do more than six hours roughly speaking.

3146. Would you like to add to the appliances for training prisoners in various industries?—Yes, I would very much, and the only way it could be done would be this. Of course for the first month the prisoners have to be employed in their own cells, and after that period we draft them out as vacancies occur into these shops. For the first month I would employ all prisoners in their own cells, and after that period I would draft them as vacancies occur into the shops. I have two reasons for that. One is to eliminate all the short sentence prisoners from the workshops, who during the time they are in prison could not be taught bonâ fide industries, and it would prevent these short sentence prisoners of one month getting with the old prisoners, and telling them what is going on outside in the world, which is no doubt what they would do. I would not advocate the first month prisoners being let out of their cells into the shops.

3147. Do you find amongst any considerable number of prisoners any dislike of the association in industries?—None at all. They are all eager for it.

3148. That is your experience, that they are all of them eager for it?—Yes, but they have a great distaste for picking oakum and also for the crank and wheels, I have been told that in the prison.

3149. We have had the evidence of one Governor to the effect that a great many prisoners are in such a position that they have the strongest dislike to meeting other prisoners, whether in chapel or in connexion with prison labour or under any circumstances at all, but that is not your experience?—I have not heard that. I have never heard it expressed myself in Wandsworth.

3150. You think that the effect on the prisoners is distinctly good?—I think it is decidedly good.

3151. Are you of opinion that the rules with regard to talking are too rigid now?—Well, of course there is a great deal of talking going on, particularly in chapel, and there is only one way of stopping that, that I can see, and that is by not allowing them all to go at one time. They are so packed together in chapel that unless they were allowed to go half one day and half another, talking takes place. Chapel is the great place for talking. There is no doubt about that, and there is also talking at exercise to a certain extent.

3152. Do you think it is a good thing to adopt the policy of enforcing silence the whole of the day and on all occasions amongst prisoners?—I think it is on the whole. I do not think it would do in a large prison to allow them to talk, because there is no doubt they do talk. That you cannot help.

3153. One objection that has been given to us against extending the practice of associated labour is that the prisoners have opportunities of talking when they are working in these shops?—Well, I do not think that they do to a great extent. I go round to the shops and I see them there under the officers being instructed. Some are taught in rows, and some of them are in boxes.

3154. At any rate do you think the advantages of this associated labour more than compensate for any dangers arising from talking?—Decidedly, I think so. Besides it is good for the prisoner. The idea is that when a prisoner comes in you should do everything you can to look after his life in the future, and that you should do what you can to teach him anything to set him on his legs again when he goes out That is what I should like to see.

3155. Do you find there is much surreptitious work in cells?—No, I do not think it could be carried out at all in any well-conducted prison. I do not quite know what you mean by "surreptitious work."

3156. I mean when a prisoner gets hold of a bit of paper and sketches on it; or when he gets hold of some bit of metal or wood and manages to work it?—And passes it out?

3157. To pass his time in the cell?—Well, I cannot say in my time that we have had one single case of that kind. We have had cases where they have got hold of pieces of paper and written a letter to go out which has been invariably stopped, but I have never yet heard of a case of their making things in the cell in our prison. I do not think it could be managed there, because the officers go round at different hours, and their cells are searched.

3158. You are of opinion, I suppose, that it is a very unfortunate thing that the manufacture of mats and other industries was withdrawn from prisons?—I am. I know it has been expressed by the prisoners at Wandsworth that they were very sorry when mat-making was done away with.

3159. In fact, there is only one opinion on that amongst all who are connected with prisons?—I think so, decidedly.

3160. Are you satisfied with the present arrangements as regards the distribution of books?—Yes, I think it works very well, but I am rather inclined to think I would allow prisoners to have books, say, after they have been a week in prison. It would not add very much to the labour, and I do not see why a prisoner should not have a book to read in his leisure hours. He has not got much leisure.

3161. You see no objection to allowing them to read as much as they can, provided it does not interfere with the prison regulations?—No, I see no objection whatever.

3162. Have you any view to express to the Committee about plank beds?—Yes, I would give every prisoner a mattress, and not adopt the system that we have now of only giving them mattresses after a time. A prisoner at the present moment in the first stage gets no mattress at all, and then in the second stage he only has it five nights a week; in the third stage, six; and in the fourth, seven. I would urge that every prisoner should have a mattress, and allow the Governor the discretion to withdraw that mattress if he misbehaved himself.

3163. Is it your opinion that the plank bed is deleterious?—Well, in this way, that a prisoner comes in perhaps for his first offence: he is put on first class diet, he has to do his six or eight hours on the crank, or whatever it may be; he is hard-worked all day, and when he gets to bed at night he has nothing to lie upon except a hard plank. It seems to me that the hardship is quite enough without depriving him of a mattress.

3164. Now, with regard to diet?—I would allow all prisoners of over seven days to commence on the second class diet, because at present a prisoner coming in for seven days is really only in for five days. He comes in late on the first day. He then has a special diet, a pint of porridge and a loaf of bread, and he goes out early on the seventh day; so that he is only practically in for five days, and I would not touch him at all; but it is hard on the prisoner who come in for longer sentences, because he would get seven days on 1st class diet if he comes in for a month; and then he goes on to the second class diet, which is not very much better; and I do not believe in lowering the prisoner It is bad enough in prison with the hard labour and everything else without making his diet so low when he first comes in.

3165. Do you think it has a bad physical and moral effect?—I think so. They come in and at once get very low diet. I think it could be easily worked to give them second class diet from the beginning. It would be no trouble whatever.

3166. Should you be in favour of any form of punishment, such as the use of fetters or hand-cuffs?—No, not at all. We have to do it occasionally, but only in case of violence.

3167. A proposal was made that handcuffs as a punishment should be substituted for the dietary punishment. You would not approve of that?—No, I would not approve of that.

3168. Would you be in favour of allowing prisoners in local prisons to earn a remission of part of their sentences, as they are able to do in convict prisons?—By good behaviour?

3169. Yes?—Yes, I do not see why it should not be so at all.

3170. But you could not apply that, could you, to short sentence prisoners?—No, I do not think you could do it for short, but you might for long sentences.

3171. Where would you draw the line?—Well, anything over six months I think would be the margin for it.

3172. Do you think the prison system as it exists is too rigid? I gather that in some respects you do?—I do to a certain extent. Do you mean with reference to the powers of officers; and whom?

3173. Of the prison authorities?—I think the Governors should have more power given them, so that they have not to make so many references to the Commissioners. There are lots of cases come up that can be dealt with by the Governor on the spot, who has a far better knowledge of what is going on; but these have now to be referred to the Commissioners.

3174. You have a great number of different classes of prisoners, men of different positions in society and different ages, differing in regard to physical strength: do you think that the prison discipline, as it exists at present, works equally and fairly with regard to all these different classes of prisoners?—No, I do not. I think that I should like to see, if it could be done, first offenders who come into prison put on a different footing. I would like to see the first offenders put in one part of the prison and not put on the cranks and mills and pumps, if you can prove that they are first offenders, but of course I am aware of the great difficulty there is in finding out the first offenders. If that could be worked out I think it would be a good system.

3175. Then would you have any differential system in regard to young prisoners say up to the age of 21 years?—I should not like to give an opinion on it without consideration. I have not gone sufficiently into it. It is a very intricate question.

3176. I suppose you will say that it is desirable to reclaim as many young prisoners as you can?—Certainly, I should.

3177. And having regard to the effect, especially in after life, of the imprisonment on young offenders, it would be desirable, if possible, to save them from that slur which follows imprisonment?—Certainly it would.

3178. In your experience do you think that you have many young prisoners who are as irreclaimable as older individuals?—No.

3179. Or do you think that it is possible there is a a fair chance of reclaiming nearly all young prisoners?—I think there is, decidedly so.

3180. Apart from young prisoners, would you approve of differential treatment between older prisoners who come from different states of society, bearing in mind the different effect which imprisonment has upon people who come in from differen states of society?—Would I make any difference?

3181. Yes?—If it could be managed, but I do not see in a large prison how that is to be done very well.

3182. You think that in a prison it is necessary to go to a great extent by hard-and-fast rules?—I think you must in a large prison. I think it could be worked easy enough in a small prison.

3183. You do not think it would be possible to give to Governors the power of applying a different treatment, for instance, to educated persons?—I think it might be given to Governors, but I cannot say whether it would work.

3184. Take the case of a highly educated man who comes into prison for forgery or some other offence; do you think it is a rational plan to treat that man exactly as you would treat the ordinary run of prisoners?—Well, I am rather inclined to think it is, because that man has got into prison through his own fault, and I do not know why you should make any great difference, except he were a first offender.

3185. Still, is not it the fact that prison discipline and prison rules have been drawn up in direct regard to the average class of prisoners; that is to say that the average class of prisoners are men of comparatively low intellect, low education, and low attainments. Now, that being so, when you do get an educated man, is it altogether rational in treating him to bring him down to the level in prison of the ordinary run of them?—Well, I suppose it really is not, but I do not know how it could be worked to make the difference.

3186. From the point of view of the punitive effect of imprisonment, is not the mere fact of an educated, cultured man going to prison, to say the least, as heavy a punishment as it is in the other case; and even if he is treated in a different way and allowed books and so forth, is not that at least equivalent to the effect of imprisonment on the uneducated and more degraded kind of prisoner?—Yes, I think you are right there.

3187. (Miss Orme.) Have you found that the occupation of picking oakum is as unpopular as working a crank on the whole?—Yes, I think I have.

3188. You would put them on an equality as to aggravation?—Yes, I would. I said just now that I would in my evidence. I called it "degrading "labour."

3189. And the offences that are committed respecting the oakum picking are very numerous, are they not?—Yes, it is for idleness; they throw it out of the window.

3190. They put it in their ventilators?—Yes, they put it in their ventilators and throw it out of the window. They have said themselves—"It is no "good; it is degrading;" and they do not like doing it. "Put me on other labour," they say at once.

3191. And some of the men at Wandsworth are doing knitting, are they not?—Yes.

3192. What kind of prisoner would you give an occupation of that kind to?—I would give it to those prisoners that I am advocating should, for the first month, be taken off the crank, because any occupation of the simple labour class could be taught in a short time.

3193. When they leave the prison do you imagine they could earn a penny by that occupation?—I do not see why they should not if they are taught properly.

3194. Men?—Men.

3195. But you know, as a fact, it is not an industry which men do earn money by?—No; but you have picked out knitting, which is very little done, and I suppose there are very few in Wandsworth who do knitting.

3196. I want to know what sort of prisoner you would give such an occupation as that to. Is it only the old men who cannot do anything else?—Not hard labour men; men who are not sentenced to hard labour, the men whom as you say we do not want to give oakum to, and whom we cannot give anything else.

Captain Schuyler.

3 Aug. 1894.

3197. Really it is for the want of anything else?—Yes.

3198. You only take it as a last resource?—That is so.

3199. And as to the men who already know anything of an industry like mat-making would you try to give them work of that sort?—Yes, we are only too glad to do it, and I think a great many more might be doing that.

3200. Then supposing such a system were adopted as the chairman suggested of making a difference of treatment between different kinds of prisoners, do you think that that would become known in a prison through the sort of conversation that takes place?—Certainly it would.

3201. So that the mass of the prisoners who received the old treatment would know that a few had been picked out for special privileges?—I think they would know it. It would get about. There is nothing that goes on that does not get about somehow.

3202. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I only just want to ask you one or two questions. At Wandsworth you have some workshops?—Yes.

3203. And they are much too small for the employment of anything like the population in prison?—Certainly.

3204. Now, assuming that you had a greater number there you could only do it by an increase of the staff?—Certainly, and the shops.

3205. The shops in the first instance; and a very considerable increase in the staff afterwards?—Yes.

3207. But the objection to the oakum-picking is rather imaginary, is it not? They do not like it?—And there are a lot of offences in connexion with it.

3208. But they see the result by the oakum being picked in pieces, whilst it is different with the crank?—It is not as bad as the crank, but it is next door to it.

3209. It is universally disliked?—Yes, and I do not see any object in it, because I should have thought the object was to teach the prisoner something.

3210. Is that ever used?—Yes, a lot do oakum picking the whole time. It is second class hard labour. It is done by a lot who cannot do anything else. Prisoners in their cells do oakum picking.

3211. If they cannot do anything else what would you give them to employ their time?—I would find out something. There is sewing of different sorts and there are some of the industries I put down under the No. 2 class.

3212. Then they could do it?—Occupation could be found for all these prisoners if we are allowed to extend the works of simple industries, as I call them, because we can get simple industries for the contractors and the Government, and carry it on. We could make coal sacks, for instance, and so on.

3213. But how often do the Visiting Committee pay you a visit?—They come twice a month: the second and fourth Mondays in the month.

3214. Do they make an appointment for the Governor or Deputy-Governor to meet them?—The Governor or Deputy-Governor always attends and hears of any reports or applications or complaints in the prison. Of course, one of the Visiting Committee also comes once a week, but he comes more in connexion with the "Surrey Aid Society." Their agent comes every day.

3215. And any complaints are made to them?—Any complaints are made to them by the prisoner.

3216. And if a prisoner prefers it, he makes it straight to head-quarters at once, does he not—I mean to the Commissioners or to the Home Office?—He generally makes it to the Inspector when he comes round, and the Inspector deals with it or refers it to the Commissioners.

3217. But have they got power to make their complaints straight to the Home Office?—I do not think the Governor would stop it. It must come through the Governor. If they came to the Governor and he said, "I wish to make a complaint," he would send their complaint on in writing with his remarks.

3218. Of course you see the prisoners when they come in?—On reception every day.

3219. And do you notice that a great many of them physically and mentally are of a low class?—Well, I should not like to give a decided opinion on that. It is more for the doctors: it is not for me to say: I might say what I thought and it might be contradicted by the doctor.

3220. You would not give an opinion on that?—No.

3221. (Dr. Bridges.) With regard to overcrowding, I understand what is meant by that is not overcrowding in the sense of insufficient breathing space?—No.

3222. But overcrowding in the sense of embarrassing the administration?—That is it, that there are not enough cells when there comes a pressure.

3223. Similarly in chapel, when you speak of the prisoners being crowded together in chapel, you do not mean that the atmosphere is vitiated by the numbers who are there?—Well, I should think it would be. That is a medical point I cannot very well speak about, but I mean to say we are so crowded that you have only got to sit as I do every morning of my life in chapel to see them all packed as tight together as can be.

3224. Apart from the medical question, have you found the atmosphere very oppressive at times?—Decidedly, particularly on Sunday afternoons in hot weather.

3225. I understand that you are in favour of keeping the existing No. 1 dietary for prisoners who are sentenced to anything under a week?—I am.

3226. With regard to people who have repeated short sentences of a week, have you many of those cases; I mean those who go out and come in again—The next day?

3227. The next day or very shortly after?—We have a fair number.

3228. Might it not be that with regard to those, they are kept on what is very nearly a continuous short diet?—That is a question that rests with the doctor. He has the power if a prisoner goes out one day and comes in the next to allow the sentence to run on if he thinks fit.

3229. Apart from the discretion of the doctor, there used to be a grievance in that respect?—He would have to put them on first class diet, as if they had never been in prison.

3230. And it is part of the doctor's business to check that?—Yes, there is an order upon him if a prisoner goes out and is arrested at the gate and comes in again, that he can use his discretion as to giving him better diet.

3231. You have spoken of the difficulty of finding suitable employment for various classes of prisoners. Have you ever considered the possibility of agricultural labour; I do not mean mere ornamental gardening, but hard digging labour for any class of your prisoners at Wandsworth?—No, because I do not see how it could be carried out at Wandsworth. They do a certain amount. They go out into the garden and dig the potatoes and all the different things we grow there; but we have no power, we have no means, and we have no place to teach them digging and all that sort of thing.

3232. Have you any land round the prison?—No, none at all. All the lands which belongs to Government is let out to the nursery people, Neal. We have only the officers' quarters and a piece of recreation ground.

3233. There is land adjacent to the prison, but which is now used for other purposes?—There is land belonging to the Government who let it out to Neal the nurseryman.

3234. With regard to those few people whom you do employ in your gardens for what class is that gardening labour used?—Chiefly for men who have got into the fourth stage, who have been some time in prison.

3235. It is privileged work?—Yes; it is for those prisoners for whom it is laid down that when they get into the fourth stage they should be given a post of trust in the prison. Of course that is very much sought after.

3236. Supposing the difficulty of land was got rid of, and supposing you had land at your disposal properly walled in, do you see your way to using agricultural labour to a somewhat larger extent, and for a somewhat severer form of labour than is at present the case?—Not under the existing arrangements, because it would necessitate a large increase of staff.

3237. It could not be done without a considerable increase of staff?—Decidedly it could not, and at great expense.

3238. Leaving the economic side for the moment out of view, would you see any physical advantage in employing an under-grown London prisoner at that kind of work?—I should think it would be a very good thing for him indeed.

3239. The Chairman has asked you a question about the differential treatment of the educated prisoner. You have said also that that differential treatment would speedily become known in a prison. Might it not be said that there was one treatment for the rich and another for the poor. Would not that be a criticism of outsiders. Would not outside public opinion take that form?—Yes, I think it might. It would be open to that certainly.

3240. Might it not be said also that the forger is the greater criminal because he has had the advantages of a good education, which the poorer prisoner has not had?—Yes, that might be said too, decidedly.

3241. With regard to the punishment of the plank bed, I understand that you are in favour of abolishing the plank bed in the first instance?—No, I did not say so.

3242. Then what did you say?—I said I would give them all mattresses on their plank beds.

3243. I perhaps did not express my meaning clearly, but you would place a mattress on the plank bed?—Decidedly, I would allow every prisoner to have a mattress.

3244. Would you be in favour of regarding the unmattressed plank bed as a form of prison punishment that might in some cases be used?—Yes, I gave that as an opinion just now. I said that I would allow the governor to use as a punishment the withdrawal of the mattress.

3245. I gather that you are in favour of first offenders being separated if the separation could be adequately performed?—Yes, if you could ascertain that they were first offenders. That is the difficulty.

3246. If they could be ascertained to be first offenders?—Yes, exactly.

3247. Have you paid attention to the discussion of the Bertillon system?—No, I have not. I would not like to speak about that.

3248. (Mr. O'Connor.) You say that the great object must be to set a man on his legs again when he goes out?—Yes.

3249. Do you think the average prisoner, after his plank bed, and his work, and his diet, is as a matter of fact sent out in a fair condition to earn his living? Is he on his legs in a proper way?—Has he also learned things in prison, do you mean?

3250. Yes, or is he in a physical condition to take part in the struggle for life?—I think on the whole, so far as physical condition goes, he does not increase in weight in prison. The idea is that he decreases.

3251. What is your objection to No. 1 diet?—I think when they first come in, the No. 1 diet to begin with is hard, and when they are getting on they go on the second class diet, which is very little better, and the work they have to do at first with the cranks and pumps is so hard, that it is likely to be detrimental to them; but as their time progresses in prison and they get on to the 4th class diet, and on to the industries, the diet does not effect them so much.

3252. I understand first class diet is given to all prisoners to begin with?—Yes, unless the doctor orders differently.

3253. The overwhelming majority of prisoners are short sentence prisoners?—Yes.

3254. The great majority, therefore, of prisoners would be on No. 1 diet for a month?—They would for the first week.

3255. Then when they go out, the majority of prisoners have been on No. 1 diet all the time?—No, they are on No. 1 diet for the first week. There is seven days for the first class diet. Then prisoners up to a month for the remainder of the time go on to second class diet.

3256. Do I understand that you propose to abolish No. 1?—Altogether for any prisoners over a week. I would not touch them under a week.

3257. Now with regard to the crank, supposing you had a horse in prison, could you put him to any more useless or unsatisfactory labour than you put these human beings to with a crank? What labour is there you could put a horse to, which is more unsatisfactory and useless than the crank to which you put the human beings?—None at all. I am dead against it.

3258. Do the men consider it inhuman to put them to this useless labour?—I cannot say they have ever said that, but I know they think that, as it produces no good, it is degrading to them.

3259. Has your experience led you to conclude that any actual inhumanity or even sense of inhumanity is calculated to do the prisoners any good?—I should say not.

3260. You are at Wandsworth now?—Yes.

3261. Were you ever at any other prison before?—I was at Wormwood Scrubs for three months.

3262. When?—In 1891. I think it was in September, October, and November. It was three months about that time.

3263. Do you remember clearly the condition of the prison when you went there?—Yes, I do.

3264. What was the condition of the exercise yards when you got there?—Well, they were under water in some cases at times when we had very heavy rains.

3265. And they could not be used, I suppose?—No, they could not at times.

3266. Did you make any representation about that? Yes, and I also represented a case about the condition of the corridors at Wormwood Scrubs.

3267. To whom did you make the representation?—To the Prison Commissioners.

3268. While you were there was anything done?—Yes. The drains were looked to now and again, and it stopped it to a certain extent, but not altogether.

3269. You were not there when there was an outbreak?—No. I went there directly after it had taken place. I was sent there suddenly from Wandsworth and asked to take charge, and I went.

3270. Was not there one later?—Yes, about 10 days after I left there was another.

3271. There was one before and one after?—Yes.

3272. There was none while you were there?—No.

3273. But there was one after you left?—Yes.

3274. In the case of Wandsworth, are the requirements of the Act of 1865 discharged in the matter of cells. Have you as many certified cells as you ought to have under the Act, do you know?—Well, not if you take it that there should be a separate cell accommodation.

3275. You were not in the service under the old system, I suppose?—No, I was not.

Captain Schuyler.

3 Aug. 1894.

3276. Have you ever looked at the estimates of the prisons?—Not to take any special notice of them at all.

3277. You do not remember whether pay is drawn for a larger staff than you have?—I could not say. I would not like to give a decided opinion on that.

3278. Have you a staff at Wandsworth fully adequate to all requirements?—No, I think not.

3279. Do you find on pressure you have to take in casual warders or assistants from outside?—Temporaries we do. We are only allowed them on certain conditions.

3280. Is this statement true: "It is literally a "fact that for years it has been the custom of Govern- "ment to call men from highways and byeways to "supplement the prison staff in times of emergency "or during the holidays of the permanent staff." Is that proposition true?—I should not like to say it is true because that is out of the paper, but we have to call them in where we can get them. It is not exactly from the highways, because we know pretty well where we get them from. We get them from discharged soldiers and old officers.

3281. Have you any reason to suppose that in your time either at Wandsworth or Wormwood Scrubbs any trafficking has been carried on?—No trafficking has been carried on.

3282. Has it been carried on principally through these outsiders, or would you think it likely that that was the case?—I should think if there was trafficking it would be done more by them than by anybody else, decidedly. I am strongly opposed to that. If we had an adequate staff we should never hear of it.

3283. You say you would keep the prisoners who are in only for one month working in their cells only, and not at the crank?—What I mean is that I would allow the one month prisoners to go out to do pumps and mills, and when they were not employed on that, and those who could not, because there were not enough pumps and mills for them, I would put on small industries in their cells instead of picking oakum.

3284. Are there some prisoners who are employed in their cells altogether at work?—Yes, there is bound to be.

3285. Is this proposition true: "Out of 24 hours "more than 22 must by the regulations be passed in "the cell, for the maximum time of exercise is an "hour, and even then can be curtailed for breach of "discipline." Is that true?—Yes, if a prisoner has to do work in his cell he only goes out for exercise, of course and chapel.

3286. Then it is true. Now with regard to punishment diet, how long can that be continued?—Punishment diet by the Governor is limited. He can only give him three days bread and water and other dietary punishments.

3287. Is this true: "The punishment diet which "may be continuous for six weeks is mere gruel bread "and potatoes"?—Well, if it were carried out, but it hardly ever is carried out.

3288. (Chairman.) Is it possible to continue that punishment for six weeks?—I do think it is with stated intervals for the diet of the class to which the prisoner belongs. The Visiting Justices can give it, but it is a case that never occurs in a prison to begin with.

3289. (Mr. O'Connor.) However, the punishment diet is mere gruel, bread, and potatoes. So far the proposition is correct?—Yes, that is correct, if you mean by "gruel" stirabout.

3290. The punishment diet which may be continued for six weeks is mere gruel, bread, and potatoes?—Yes, if you mean by "gruel" stirabout.

3291. (Chairman.) That is a newspaper article. That is not an official statement.

(Mr. O'Connor.) No. I want to ascertain the truth. Is this true: "The prisoner as a rule learns nothing "in prison that is useful to him"?—No, that is not true.

3292. How far would you qualify that statement?—I say the prisoners do learn something. As soon as they get out of the first stage they are put on to these simple industries and taught sack making and different things.

3293. How long would they have to be sentenced for to be put on to sack making?—Well, we do not carry out the exact letter of the law, because we cannot do it, but directly he gets into the second stage, that is after the first month, he may be put on to it.

3294. He may be?—Yes. We do it in fact at Wandsworth where we utilize as many as we possibly can.

3295. Is this true: "The rule prevails that no "prisoner is to receive other than religious and school "books until he has served two months of his "sentence"?—He gets school books when he gets into his second stage. That would be when he has done one month. When he gets into the second month he gets school books.

3296. That is not the question. The statement is that: "The rule prevails that no prisoner is to receive "other than religious and school books until he has "served two months of his sentence." Is that strictly true?—No, because he gets a bible and prayer book.

3297. But we call those religious books?—He does not get any library books or school books until he gets into the second stage.

3298. Let me read it to you again: "The rule "prevails that no prisoner is to receive other than "religious and school books until he has served two "months of his sentence." That is to say during the first month he does not get any books except school books or religious books?—That is quite right.

3299. In consequence of the proportion of your staff to the prisoners, and the work your staff has to do, would you say that they are overworked or not?—They are decidedly overworked.

3300. Is it true to say that the staff is overworked and under-manned?—I think so.

3301. Is it true that the warder's work per day is 10½ hours?—That is about it.

3302. Now, with regard to the schoolmasters, what schoolmasters have you at Wandsworth?—We have only one schoolmaster, but we have another warder schoolmaster who is allowed to act as schoolmaster.

3303. How many prisoners have you?—It varies.

3304. About how many on the average?—I should say we have an average of about a thousand.

3305. And only one schoolmaster?—Yes, and an assistant.

3306. An assistant who is a schoolmaster?—Yes, he is a warder who does nothing else, except occasional duty.

3307. Having regard to that number of prisoners, do you think that the assistant schoolmaster warder has not more to do than one man can do?—I think so. I think that both the schoolmaster and assistant schoolmaster have a large amount of work to do.

3308. Is there any difference so far as you know in the hours of duty and the leave out between the convict and the local prison schoolmaster?—I do not know. I could not give an opinion.

3309. Is it true to say that "the prison system is so "severe that discharged prisoners are often unfit to "enter the ranks of labour, needless severity unfit- "ting him to earn his livelihood"?—I do not think so.

3310. And it is your impression that the employment of men upon these kinds of labour such as the crank and the oakum picking, produce a sense of injustice in prison?—I think so.

The witness withdrew.

Rev. William Douglas Morrison, recalled and further examined.

3311. (Mr. Haldane.) From your book and otherwise I gather that you have given a good deal of attention to the study of the old prison system as well as to the modern one?—Yes, I have, as far as I possibly could.

3312. Am I right in thinking that one of the main features which distinguished the old system from the present was that there were very much more rigid rules defining the daily life of the prisoner; for instance, greater freedom in respect of intercourse?—Decidedly, very much greater freedom of intercourse.

3313. So that it may be, and from one possible point of view is, that while the modern system is a great improvement in respect of sanitation and all the elementary conditions of life, there are still other points in which the prisoner was better off under the old system?—I certainly think he was better off in many points. I do not think that he was looked upon so much as a mere piece of mechanism under the old system. He was looked upon more as a human being under the old system than under the new. That is, I think, a distinctive difference between the old and the new.

3314. Sometimes of course the old systems were very bad?—I am quite prepared to admit that the old system was very far from perfect and required serious alteration, but my opinion is that we went too far the other way.

3315. May I sum up your opinion in this way, that notwithstanding the admirable features of the new system, which we should all wish to preserve, it has carried things to a length of rigidity which it may be the time has come to relax?—That is exactly how I should like to express it.

3316. I should like to put to you one or two points on this. First of all with regard to young offenders, I understand from your evidence given last time that you are strongly of opinion that the law requires considerable alteration with regard to young offenders, for instance that children under 14 should probably not be imprisoned at all?—I decidedly think children under 14 should not be imprisoned, and that there are plenty of methods at present existing for dealing with those children without resorting to imprisonment.

3317. Between 14 and 18?—Between 14 and 18 I should say imprisonment might be necessary in certain cases, but between 14 and 16 I think all those cases where children are imprisoned should be reported to the Secretary of State just as all cases under 14 are now reported to him.

3318. And as is done in Belgium for instance?—Yes, as is done in Belgium.

3319. Passing now from 18 to 21, where you can influence people, would you make any difference in the present system?—Between 18 and 21 is a more difficult age to deal with, and each case I think ought to be decided on its merits. With regard to cases between 18 and 21 the magistrate would have to decide that, but I consider that as far as possible an educative influence should be brought to bear on these young people between 18 and 21.

3320. Do I understand you to say that even though 18 might be too great an age at which to send a prisoner to a reformatory, you would in prison have a mode of dealing with him which would have an educative purpose?—Yes, as far as possible considering the length of the sentence, but I do not say that 18 is too old to deal with them in a reformatory. I think it is possible that many young people might be committed to a reformatory up to the age of 18 with good results.

3321. One may summarise your evidence, I think, on this point as being to the effect that in the case of prisoners under 18 it is desirable to treat the prisoner from a reformative point of view?—Yes.

3322. Of course there may be exceptional cases with which you must deal?—Yes, but taking it as a rule I think that the reformation method is the way in which young people under that age should be dealt with.

3323. And you think the present system inadequate for that purpose?—I certainly think so.

3324. Let us pass now to another class of prisoners, and that is the class of prisoner you gave an instance of in your evidence on Tuesday, the case of a man who was in the City and who had been in a good position of life and who was in for three months and found himself in circumstances which drove him desperate; are you of opinion that it is desirable to provide greater elasticity in the prison system to deal with cases like that?—I think far greater elasticity should be given to deal with a class of that kind, where you have distinctly first offenders. I have not a doubt, if that man had been allowed to see his wife more often, it would have had a good effect on him. The poor woman used to come to the prison morning after morning, entreating me to do everything I ought not to do, in order that she might get some intimation as to what was going on. Now, I am expressly forbidden to make any communications of that kind or do anything whatever between a wife and husband. The man was in a great state of anxiety about his wife, and she was in a frightful state of mind about her husband.

3325. In a case of that kind, it might amount to inhumanity?—Distinctly inhumanity, as far as the innocent person is concerned, because you are really inflicting as much mental punishment on the innocent person as you are on the guilty.

3326. We have dealt with the point of visiting. That is a point in which you think discrimination or classification should be allowed?—Certainly.

3327. Now, let us take another point. Let us take the point of mental occupation. As I understand it (I may be wrong) there is a rule that for the first two months no books, other than religious and educative works of a low standard are allowed to the prisoners?—It is to that effect.

3328. That is by a rule which the prison officials have no power to relax?—We cannot relax that. We ought not to relax it, but as a matter of fact we do.

3329. So that if a man of the condition we are speaking of is brought into prison he is necessarily provided with a class of literature which may be wholly inadequate to his capacities?—Decidedly so.

3330. That is another point on which there might be classification?—I think so.

3331. Now, on the question of food. Have you formed any opinion about the possibilities of classification?—I think the first-class diet is diet that is too low for the prisoners altogether. My own conviction about it is that it ought to be abolished. Remember that many of these prisoners come into our prison in a very low condition; they are weighed when they come in, and it is thought sufficient if they are the same weight when they go out; but we do not take into consideration that they are very often in a very miserable state when they come in, and it is no answer to say that they are the same weight when they go out. So that if the first-class diet does not reduce the weight of these people in certain circumstances it is because they are in such a reduced condition before they come in that it is hardly possible to reduce them more.

3332. Of course, one knows the great difficulty of discriminating between rich and poor in a matter of this kind, but has your observation led you to form any judgment on the question whether prison diet and the present conditions are not very much severer punishment for a man of luxurious habits than they are for a man who has come into prison off the street?—It must be ever so much more severe to the man who has been accustomed to what we may call the luxuries of life than to the man who has not.

Rev. W. D. Morrison.

3 Aug. 1894.

3333. Now, bearing in mind the difficulties of discriminating, have you formed an opinion as to whether an attempt should be made at classification in that regard also?—I should not mind making alterations. Still, I fear the public would hardly tolerate them.

3334. You think it would be very difficult?—I think it would be very difficult on account of the state of public feeling.

3335. Might the same object be accomplished by giving a larger discretion to the prison officials?—It could be easily accomplished by giving a larger discretion to the medical officer.

3336. I take it the medical officer acts only for medical reasons; he will not interfere unless there is a danger to the health?—He ought not.

3337. Would you suggest he ought to have a wide discretion?—I think he ought to have a wide discretion in these matters.

3338. In point of view of occupation is the existing system defective in discriminating between prisoners in different ranks of life, different antecedents and habits, and so on?—The only thing the Governor or doctor can take into consideration is whether the prisoner is fit for first class labour, or whether he is not. If he is certified by the doctor to be fit for first class labour the Governor must put him on first class labour, no matter what his previous occupation may have been.

3339. That is to say, the crank and oakum-picking?—Precisely. I have seen clerks come in, for instance, to prison, and put to oakum-picking, who were absolutely useless, when they went out some time afterwards, on account of their fingers being cut and bleeding with it.

3340. In other words, when they went back to resume the occupation to which they had been trained they could not do it?—They could not do it.

3341. Do you think that should be altered?—I think that in a case of that kind the doctor should certainly have more latitude allowed him.

3342. Your evidence seems to point to this, that more latitude should certainly be allowed to the prison officials in discriminating between the class of prisoners. Do you think it is enough to give that discretion to the doctors, or to distribute it amongst other officials in the prison, say the chaplain or the Governor?—I should not like to lead to any collision among the authorities, and I think it is better the responsibility should, as far as possible, be placed on one man.

3343. And you think the medical officer would be a suitable man?—Yes, I think the medical officer would be a very suitable man.

3344. From what you have seen of medical officers in prison, do you think that as a rule he is generally possessed of authority which goes rather beyond medical grounds?—He has no legal authority to go beyond medical grounds. He cannot consider social or economic antecedents. The great difficulty with all of us in prisons is that we are so accustomed to see people under punishment and under suffering, that we are apt to get a little hard in the matter unless we take very great care; we have to bend our minds as much as possible the other way. That is my experience of prisons.

3345. Just let me ask you about this question of discretion. You have told me that in your opinion there ought to be wider powers of classifying prisoners according to their antecedents in the points of which you have spoken. Do you think much of that classification might be provided for by altering the rules as they stand at the present time, or do you think it ought to be left wholly to the medical officer?—I think it would be very difficult to lay down general rules for classification, and that each case stands on its own legs, and each case must be dealt with, to a very large extent, individually. Therefore, general rules always bear harshly upon a certain number of people, and they bear perhaps too leniently on another set of people; so that if you have a good class of men in the service who are actually working the system, you ought to give them as much discretion in these matters as you possibly can.

3346. Now would you extend that to the question of association of prisoners. I observe your criticisms on what I will call the silent system for shortness. Would you make that a matter of rule or a matter of discretion?—I should make it to a considerable extent a matter of discretion.

3347. Would you make it a rule that the present system of non-association should be maintained with a power to relax in some officer?—That is a way in which it could be dealt with.

3348. You say the prison system is practically a silent system?—Yes, it is practically a silent system.

3349. Would any departure from that,—say such a departure as allowing the prisoners under supervision to exercise during part of the time—be a matter which would have to be dealt with?—Yes. I should not allow local prisoners to associate or to talk together at all; only certain cases of convicts in convict prisons.

3350. Then, for instance, take the case of the man from the City, of whom we spoke before, would you make his relief from solitude depend on visits?—I should make it depend on visits to as great an extent as possible.

3351. Your idea is that in the local prisons you do not think association is desirable?—In the local prisons I do not think association with conversation is desirable, and I think a system of what I may call semi-association is very desirable, that is to say, such as we have in the workshops at Wandsworth. You take a prisoner out of his cell and you put him in what you could not actually call association, but still it is away from the cell, it is a sort of a little box by himself where he knows he is near others, and where he has a certain amount of space around him, and where the monotony and depression of prison life is removed to a certain extent.

3352. He is side by side with his fellow convict?—Yes.

3353. But he never says a word to him?—No, he does not.

3355. Is the rule of non-association and silence absolute in the convict prisons?—The rule of silence is practically absolute, as far as I can gather.

3356. And that is under the rules of the Prison Board?—That is under the rules of the Prison Board.

3357. And there you think in the convict prisons the system should be different?—I do for certain classes of offenders; for a man, for instance, who is not an habitual criminal. We have sent men to convict prisons who have been charged with murder, and who have had their sentences commuted by the Home Secretary. These are not habitual criminals. We have men charged with manslaughter, and sent for long periods to penal servitude. They are not habitual criminals, and they will not contaminate anyone. Again, there are a number of men who are habitual criminals who are sentenced to a long period when they are 50 or 60 years of age, and then they would be 60 or 70 years old when they go out. Supposing this class of men were allowed, as they used to be, a certain amount of conversation with one another, that could not possibly produce any harm, and it used to be allowed.

3358. It used to be so in the convict prisons?—Yes.

3359. And in the local prisons also?—No, not in the local prisons; in the convict prisons.

3360. You think that should be given back to them?—I think that would be a very good thing to do, because I see a number of these convicts before they go away, and I know them so well. I know they are not habitual criminals; those who are are too old to get into trouble again; a system of silencing them for 10 or 15 years, as it may be, is a horrible thing, and there is no necessity for it.

3361. Now about prison labour which that brings us to, I gather you are of opinion that it is extremely desirable that there should be a very much larger latitude of prison labour?—I think so.

3362. Have you gone into the question of whether it is possible to extend the system of prison labour without coming into conflict with the views of the trades unionists?—I think the views of the trades unionists are undergoing somewhat of a modification as far as I can make out with regard to prison labour. They seem to be much more favourably disposed towards it than they used to be, and I think that the prisons, for instance, might produce numbers of things, say for exportation, which would not interfere with industry in this country at all, or at all events which would not materially interfere with it. You allow anybody to send anything at any price to any of your possessions; you allow France, Italy, and Germany, and I do not see why the prisons of England should not be allowed to send anything to these possessions which they can produce, and there must be numbers of things which they could produce if they were allowed to do so.

3363. You are of opinion that it is very desirable for the moral well-being of the prisoners that there should be a greater scope of prison employment than there is now?—I certainly think so.

3364. Is there much less than there was under the old system?—Yes; very much less, indeed.

3365. Does that apply to convict as well as local prisons?—I do not know about convicts. Of course, all convicts' work is done for the State, and I think our local prisons might do a very great deal more for the State in the way of producing materials for the Army and for the Navy, and for the innumerable branches of the Civil Service that require things of one kind and another.

3366. Is there difficulty just now in finding proper occupation for the prisoners?—I should say there is very great difficulty. The only industry we did have or the most important industry we had has been destroyed in recent years.

3367. That is mat-making?—Yes.

3368. Let me ask you a question about the women prisoners. They are, of course, under the charge of women warders, but is there any general provision for their being visited by ladies?—I am not sure that the Prison Commissioners have not made some regulations recently. I am not quite positive about that as I am not working among women now, but if there is not, I think that ladies would have a most beneficial influence upon women prisoners, and I also think that they would be of extreme use to them whenever they go out. When a woman goes out of prison she is the most hopeless creature in the world, and the creature most to be pitied in the world, I think, because everybody looks askance at her.

3369. Then you think, therefore, that the power of extending visits to women by women might be given?—It might be most profitably extended. I have a strong feeling about that.

3370. Have you had an opportunity of studying with any degree of particularity the prison system abroad. I do not mean on the spot, but through documents?—Yes; I have looked a good deal at the prison systems abroad. In fact, there is a very admirable book which was published a few years ago dealing with the whole of the systems of the world. It was published by Baron von Holtzensdorff.

3371. And could you form any opinion as to the merits of the British system as compared with the merits of foreign systems?—Well, it is very difficult to form an absolute opinion upon a point of that kind. There is one system that I think we might imitate in many ways. That is the Belgian system. They have a much better way of getting officials than we have.

3372. Of getting good officials in the prison?—Yes.

3373. How do they do that?—They used to select officials haphazard as we do, but now it is a special service of itself, and when a man enters the Belgian prison service, his career depends upon his capacity, and he can become anything in that service.

3374. In our prison service the persons employed are selected from anywhere outside?—Yes.

3375. Largely from the army?—Entirely, as far as regards the governors of prisons.

3376. And do you think that we should do well to follow the Belgian system?—I think it is a system which this Committee ought to consider very carefully.

3377. Has any other feature struck you in the prisons as compared with ours?—On the spur of the moment I should not like to say. I should not like to commit myself.

3378. (Sir Algernon West.) You entered the service, I think, in 1882?—I did as far as I recollect.

3379. You had no knowledge then from your own experience of the system that was in force before the jails were handed over to the Government?—No, except from what I heard the magistrates say, and from reading about it, or from looking at the Blue Books.

3380. You had no personal experience?—No, no personal experience.

3381. Have you ever taken the place of the chaplain?—Many a time. When the chaplain has been away I have always taken his place.

3382. We have had it in evidence from the Rev. G. P. Merrick, that it is the duty of the chaplain to report any abuse or impropriety coming from where it will. Do you consider that to be your duty?—I should.

3383. Have you made any reports?—No, it is not my duty to make reports.

3384. Then you do not agree with Mr. Merrick?—I do not agree that it is my duty to make reports if the chaplain is there.

3385. But I asked you whether you had been in charge when the chaplain was not there?—I have.

3386. And would not you consider it your duty to report "any abuse or impropriety coming from where it will"?—Not unless it arose while I was in charge; if anything arose I should report it.

3387. When you state "there is a smouldering spirit of dissatisfaction," was that during the time of your holding the place of chaplain?—Well, it has been in existence for the last—well, I do not know how many years.

3388. Therefore it was existing at the time you were chaplain?—Of course it would.

3389. But you did not think it your duty to report it?—There was no special duty to do so at that time more than at any other time; it was in existence all through.

3390. Now you say "That except a few magistrates "like Lord Leigh or Lord Norton, the public has no "one to whom it can turn for an independent ex- "perienced opinion." I am not very intimate in my knowledge of these things, but I do know that there have been a good many magistrates in the country who have devoted a great deal of time to it, who are still on visiting committees?—That is perfectly true.

3391. Do none of those know anything about the system?—Not so much as they used to do.

3392. You give that as your opinion not as your knowledge?—I might give it as my knowledge.

3393. But I thought you told me you were not connected with prison establishments before the transfer?—But I can judge whether a man knows or not if he has been in the prisons some years before. Supposing a magistrate comes and talks to me about prisons, and he was a visiting magistrate under the old system, I can tell whether that man knows more than a man who has been appointed under the new system, and who goes and visits prisons.

3394. Well, you can give your opinion about it?—I can tell to a certainty.

3395. I do not see how?—I know the prison system, and I know that the magistrates that come now have no responsibility practically and cannot have the same knowledge as the men who had the responsibility.

Rev. W. D. Morrison.

3 Aug. 1894.

3396. You think there are very few who know anything about it?—I do not say anything, except that they do not know it as they used to do.

3397. In your opinion?—In my opinion that is so.

3398. They do not know what they used to do?—No, they do not.

3399. I got rather confused (which was, no doubt, my fault) when you were talking the other day about prisoners being put into association, because, I think, you talked in your evidence of prisoners being huddled together in a room of a quarter or half the size of this room?—That is perfectly true.

3400. I do not dispute it, but what I wanted to arrive at is this—I think, in my own mind, I have got into some confusion as to the association of prisoners who are put there because they are not fit to be alone; that is to say, epileptic cases. I do not know whether you meant that simply, because there is no room in the prisons—a great many were huddled together in a small room without any supervision?—That is quite true.

3401. Could you give us a few dates?—There is no necessity for my giving you dates, they are in the blue books.

3402. But can you give us any?—They are in the blue books.

3403. But can you give us any yourself?—I do not have any in memory; they are in the blue books.

3404. I want to know when these things occurred if you can tell me?—They are in the blue books.

3405. You mean prisoners who had no illness?—Yes, prisoners who had nothing the matter with them.

3406. That is what I was rather confused with in my mind. Now, you talked of these officers of societies who visit the prisons. Are you aware how often they visit the prisons?—Which officers?

3407. Officers of societies such as the Prisoners' Aid Societies and that kind of thing?—They would visit at irregular intervals.

3408. About how often in a week?—Well, at Wandsworth, Colonel Ross, who is the secretary of our Surrey Aid Society usually visits about once a week. Sometimes I take his duties when he is away, and do his work, and sometimes the chaplain will do his work.

3409. Does not Mr. Wheatley visit at Wandsworth?—Yes.

3410. How often does he visit?—Not much at all now, he has got a great deal to do and he does not visit very often. Perhaps once a month or so.

3411. Then I think he visits other local prisons?—I think he does, at least he tells me so.

3412. I see you say "we get our opinion from men "whose knowledge of prisons is mostly paper know-"ledge." Do you think that is a fair way of speaking of these men who pass their lives in visiting prisons?—I am not speaking with reference to that. I am not speaking with reference to Mr. Wheatley or Colonel Ross, nor of those gentlemen who come into contact with our prison population.

3413. Then are you only talking of the secretaries because you say, "It is from secretaries of benevolent "associations and other highly placed officials whose "knowledge of criminal offenders is mostly paper "knowledge that the public are just now deriving "their opinions on criminal matters." I ask you whether you think these men—I will give Mr. Wheatley as an instance, Colonel Ross and others—who are working in this way, can be considered as men only having paper knowledge?—I do not say Mr. Wheatley or Colonel Ross have only paper knowledge; I say they have a real knowledge.

3414. What is Mr. Wheatley?—He is the secretary of the Saint Giles' Mission.

3415. But you actually say "secretaries of benevolent associations"? Is not he a secretary of a benevolent association?—I am not referring to Mr. Wheatley.

3416. But you make an accusation against secretaries of benevolent associations?—I am making no allegations against secretaries of benevolent associations as a whole.

3417. Let me read it to you again. "It is from "secretaries of benevolent associations and other "highly placed officials, whose knowledge of criminal "offenders is mostly paper knowledge that the public "are just now deriving their opinions on criminal "matters." What does that mean?—I think it is perfectly plain.

3418. You mean that Mr. Wheatley and others derive their opinion on criminal matters from paper knowledge?—No, I do not mean Mr. Wheatley, and I have already said so.

3419. But you make no exception of Mr. Wheatley?—I do not include him or except him.

3420. He is a secretary of a benevolent association?—He is one, but I do not say "all secretaries." "A secretary" does not mean "all secretaries." You cannot, in writing an article like that, begin to make exceptions.

3421. But you make an exception in the case of Lord Leigh and Lord Norton?—Well, I have mentioned them as they are prominent men in connexion with the philanthropic movement.

3422. Is not Mr. Wheatley a prominent man?—He is.

3423. And he is included amongst these secretaries?—I am not including him.

3424. I only want to show you that you do make these statements?—No, I do not. I do not think that anybody who reads that article will say that I do.

3425. I have read out the words, and the Committee will say for themselves what they think it means.

3426. Now you have given your opinions on several points in the convict system, and you have talked a good deal about "the cruelty of a lifelong silence"?—I have.

3427. You have had no personal experience of the convict prisons, have you?—I have been in convict prisons. I said I had not, but I remember I have.

3428. You told us you had not been the other day?—Yes.

3429. And that there was nothing worth seeing in them?—That was rather a hasty expression. I do not want to bind myself to that. That was said on the spur of the moment. I do not bind myself to that at all.

3430. Are you aware that there are regulations which are issued to Governors of convict prisons?—I ought to be aware of that surely.

3431. Perhaps you will tell us then what those regulations are?—I do not have them in my possession.

3432. I ask you whether you are aware of it, and you say you ought to be aware of it?—Yes.

3433. Then I ask you what are the regulations that are issued to Governors as to silence of convicts?—There are no distinct regulations at all as far as I can recollect.

3434. I think you are in error?—I have not looked just recently. It is difficult to bind a man on a sudden in a vast field like this.

3435. I may take it that you have no experience of the convict system at all?—I have looked at it.

3436. You have looked at it once?—Yes, more than once.

3437. It is a pity you did not write to the Secretary, correcting your statement, that you never visited one because you did not think it was worth going to see, (at least I think so) when you were making a statement of that kind. Now I ask you if you have visited a convict prison at all, and you say more than once?—I had no time to write to the Secretary. I only received the evidence this morning, and have had no time to look at it.

3438. And you say you are aware of the regulations?—Yes.

3439. Are you aware that there is a regulation that all these orders about silence are distinctly laid down as being able to be relaxed by the Governor?—They may be relaxed by the Governor no doubt. The general order is "silence." That is the order to the best of my recollection. Of course I have not the order book before me.

3440. I did not expect you to know the orders of the convict prisons when I asked you, and you said you ought to. I do not see why you should, but you said you ought to?—It is a small point.

3441. I do not think it is a small point when you are telling us the "terrible hardships of a lifelong silence"?—It requires very small imagination to see that without going to see the man. I should not be in any better position if I went to see the man as to knowing whether a lifelong silence is a hardship on him. I know what it is in the local prison, and I know it must be worse in the convict prison.

3442. The Governor may temper them?—Yes, he may temper them, but the regulation is that silence is the rule.

3443. In your evidence the other day you made some very serious accusations against the authorities of Wormwood Scrubs. You went so far, I think, as to say that the outbreak at Wormwood Scrubs was the outcome of what I think you called inhuman cruelties or inhuman punishments?—I think that was partly the outcome of excessive severity. I think that was the word I used.

3444. I think you said "inhuman"?—That might be the phrase I used at the moment, but I have not seen my evidence.

3445. Recollect that "inhuman" is a severe word. Did you think it your duty to report that to anybody?—I reported it to the doctor of course.

3446. That the punishment had been inhuman?—No.

3447. It was not your duty you thought?—I did not think it was my duty to do that, as the Commissioners of Prisons had already sent down these cases and dealt with them.

3448. You know that it is in absolute contravention of what Mr. Merrick said?—I cannot help what Mr. Merrick said.

3449. That you absolutely saw as chaplain a prisoner who was subjected to inhuman treatment and you did not think it sufficient to report it?—I thought my duty was done when I put it in the hands of the doctor.

3450. You did not tell the doctor?—No; the doctor had him put in the infirmary.

3451. Did you report to the doctor that the punishment previous to his coming to you was inhuman?—The doctor does not want a report of the kind. He sees the prisoner's record as well as I do.

3452. Did you report it?—It is not necessary for me to report it, as the Commissioners had had it through their hands.

3453. I asked a simple question, did you report it to the doctor?—I reported to the doctor that the man was in this condition.

3454. I am not in the habit of cross-examining. When you found from the record of this man that you conceived the punishment was inhuman did not you consider it your duty as a chaplain to report that to anybody?—I reported it to the doctor.

3455. In writing?—No, not in writing. We do not do these things in writing.

3456. You did not think it your duty to make any report at all about it?—I told you I reported it to the doctor.

3457. The doctor not being your superior you reported it to no one then?—It is quite sufficient for me to report it to the doctor after the Commissioners had dealt with it.

3458. And therefore you come to us and make these accusations upon this case, and the only evidence you give us is J. E. I think the Chairman asked you if there were any other prisoners besides J. E.?—I know there were a great many who were sent down from Wormwood Scrubs to other prisons.

3459. "These prisoners told you so themselves?—No. It is on their records. It is not their putting down at all. If you look for the official record of a prisoner called J. E. you will see it."

3459*a*. Therefore, you found it all on that case, that punishment had been inflicted on J. E. which you say led to the outbreak?—Not at all. I founded it also upon what I knew was going on.

3460. At Wormwood Scrubs?—Yes; quite so.

3461. Will you tell us how you knew what was going on?—I knew from the deputy governor and the officers, as I have told you already.

3462. Have you got anything in writing?—No; but the officers have only to be called to find that out.

3463. I suppose the matter was inquired into at the time. I think there was a committee which reported on the Wormwood Scrubs outbreak at the time?—Yes, the Commissioners inquired at the time, and that is another reason why there was no need for me to report.

3463*a*. Mr. Haldane asked you a question about ladies visiting women prisoners. You know that they do visit them?—I do in some cases.

3464. Is there any prison where they do not?—I do not know whether there is. I am not dealing with women now.

3465. Mr. Haldane asked you a question about that, and you gave it as your opinion that ladies should be allowed to visit female prisoners?—Yes; I gave that as my opinion.

3466. But you are aware that they do?—Yes, in some cases.

3467. (Dr. Bridges.) I will begin by asking you a question which I have asked another witness. When we speak of overcrowding in prisons, I understand what is meant is such overcrowding as interferes with the administration, and not an actual deficiency of cubic space?—Well, that I could not say. I have not measured or examined the amount of cubic space there is in our rooms so as to be able to say.

3468. If you would speak of overcrowding, you rather refer to the administrative difficulties that are caused by their being too large a number in the prison at any particular time?—That would be so to a large extent.

3469. I think you suggested to the Committee on the last occasion a new form of report?—I did; which would obviate that difficulty for the future. It would let the public see whether there was sufficient cell accommodation according to the Act of Parliament or not, and if that is done it will always be found after this whether there is sufficient cell accommodation or not.

3470. In this return which you have put in, you show, do you not, from 1889 to 1893 inclusive, the number of certified cells for each year, and the maximum number of prisoners for each year?—Yes; I do.

3471. Am I right in saying that in the existing form of return we only see what is called the average maximum?—No; in the Commissioners' Blue Book you do not see the average maximum for five years. You do not see anything dealing with the legal maximum. At the present time you have to look at two Blue Books in order to know whether there is overcrowding or not. You have to look first at the Commissioners' Blue Book and then you have to look at the judicial statistics; but then in the judicial statistics you do not see it, because it only gives one year. The judicial statistics give the maximum for one year; that return I presented gives the maximum for the five years, which shows you whether the law is being complied with or not. These figures are taken from the judicial statistics for the London prisons. See Appendix.

3472. But getting merely the average of the maximum for five years would not quite represent the fact?—To get the daily average would not represent the facts at all, but to get the maximum for each year would give it, and if you add the maximums together then you get the legal maximum.

Rev. W. D. Morrison.

3 Aug. 1894

3473. You want not merely the maximum for five years, but you want the actual maximum for each year?—Yes; and then if you divide that by five you get the average maximum of the five years, so that if you get that then you get what would be in consonance with the law.

3474. And you want that to be put in one return so that the facts are easily accessible?—Yes, so that the facts can be ascertained easily. At present it is very difficult to do so.

3475. With regard to the question of diet, I think you have already expressed an opinion. Have you noticed any effects resulting from repeated short sentences?—I think that if men are sent in over-and-over again repeatedly within very short intervals that it has an exceedingly bad effect upon them. There is one young fellow who comes to us or did come to us (I suppose he is dead now) for short sentences, and, of course, under the short sentence system, each time he came in he had to be put on the No. 1 diet, and I saw that young fellow get, what seemed to me to be, old very soon. I have not seen him recently. The last time he was in prison I thought he was very ill, and I do not suppose he is alive now; I do not know. He never comes to us now.

3476. I suppose you have a large number of cases that come in very frequently with short sentences?—Yes.

3477. And that the short sentences follow one another very closely?—They do very often.

3478. So that if the strict diet were conformed to, such persons would be kept continuously upon a very low diet?—They would, on a very low diet indeed.

3479. I am right, am I not, in assuming that the doctor has full discretion to modify that?—Yes, he can modify that diet if he chooses to do so.

3480. As a matter of fact is it within your knowledge that he does modify it?—Yes, he does modify it very often, but, of course, a doctor cannot arbitrarily modify a diet. It would be against the rules if he were to modify a diet, unless he thought there was an absolute necessity for it, and when it is on the border line it is very difficult for a doctor to decide sometimes.

3481. That brings me to the question of the medical examination of the patient. I do not wish you to express an opinion on a medical question further than you are disposed to do so, but what time has a medical officer for the examination of a patient. Are you able to answer that question. I do not know whether you are or not. I will put it in another way, what would be the largest number of receptions in one day?—Who would require to be seen by the medical officer?

3482. Yes?—Sometimes we have 80 receptions in one day.

3483. In Wandsworth you have known as many as that?—Yes, and in Holloway I should think there would be sometimes even more, because it is a remand prison.

3484. Would it be your opinion that it is very difficult for a medical officer, however skilful, to form a careful opinion as to the physical and mental condition of these persons?—I think it would be difficult for him to form an opinion as to the mental condition, because there would not be time, I think, to form a very close opinion as to the mental condition, and I think the medical officers themselves will admit that too.

3485. As far as their physical ailments went it would be a much easier matter?—No, I should not think a comparatively easy matter; when they have a very large number they must finish their work, because they have to see the complaining sick and the hospitals, sick officers and their families, and all those things. I am positive the medical officers do their very best, and their opportunities should be enlarged.

3486. You have expressed an opinion, I think, somewhere, that the medical officer should have had before his appointment opportunities of studying lunacy?—Yes, I think they ought all to do so. I think that is being done now more than it was.

3487. Have you formed an opinion that the medical staff of such a prison as Wandsworth should be increased?—Well, the doctors are very hard worked.

3488. There is a point upon which, I suppose, we may say that the duties of the doctor and the chaplain come into contact?—Yes, very close contact.

3489. I mean with regard to mental condition and character?—Yes, because we go and see every prisoner in his cell. The doctor only sees those prisoners who are brought down to him, but we see the whole as far as we possibly can.

3490. Do you say that the majority of prisoners are with regard to their mental condition much like ordinary prisoners?—I think that the majority of prisoners are below the average of the ordinary citizen.

3491. In mental condition?—Mentally, I think so.

3492. I am not speaking of whether they know how to read and write and of their education, but of their power of mind?—That is not a test. Their power of mind is weak, as far as regards the balance of mind especially. They are very fitful. Their power of mind as a class is inferior, I should say, to the average intelligence of the average member of the community.

3493. That is the impression that you have got from your experience?—It is more than an impression. It is a firm conviction.

3494. When a prisoner is being recognised, I do not say as insane, but as being mentally unsound, and partially imbecile perhaps, the rule is, I believe, that he should be placed under medical observation?—Yes.

3495. Can you tell me at the present moment how many of that class there are in Wandsworth?—Well, the doctor at Wandsworth adopts this principle. When he has men who are a little unsound in any way he generally takes them away and puts them in a large room rather bigger than this with infirm people and people of that kind; and there is an officer always over them there, and in that way he is able to make out what sort of men they are.

3496. The rule in Wandsworth then would be to keep such persons as we are talking of in association?—Yes, that is the doctor's method as far as I can understand.

3497. That is left entirely to the discretion of the doctor?—Yes.

3498. I was rather asking you a question as to the numbers of this class that you have in Wandsworth. Are you able to say?—I could not say how large a number it is. Of course some that are in a sort of weak mental condition are all right otherwise, and are not always sent into this association ward.

3499. You mean that there are several with regard to whom the symptoms are not so strongly marked?—That is so.

3500. And it is thought necessary to place them under observation?—That is how I should put it. It is not thought necessary to put them under observation.

3501. I understand you to say that in your opinion more individual attention should be given to the constitution and the character of each prisoner than is given at present?—I think it would be well if it could be done, and I think many doctors are of the same opinion.

3502. With regard, for instance, to the staff of chaplains, you have at Wandsworth two?—Yes.

3503. For 1,000 prisoners?—Yes. Of course 1,000 prisoners does not really represent the facts very clearly, because although our daily average may be, say 1,050, and although that may be the number in a given time, yet the number that come in in the course of a year is very large—about 11,000—and we have so many fresh cases continually coming in and continually going out that we have not the time to know the men as we should know them if they were convicts and under our care for years it may be.

3504. Then in taking a local prison as it stands at present what in your opinion is the number of cells (I put it in that way because of your last answer) which a chaplain can properly supervise?—Well, I think if a man has 300 of these men under his charge he has as much as he can properly do. I think so. When it gets beyond that, the work must to a certain extent be hurried over.

3505. I understand when you speak of having 300 under your charge that would correspond to a very much larger number passing through in a year?—Yes, it would correspond to 3,000 and you have a great deal of work to do in connexion with these men going out, writing to their friends, hearing from them afterwards, and writing to them again, so that really there is quite enough to do.

3506. I think you have paid a good deal of attention, in fact you told Mr. Haldane you had paid a good deal of attention, to the subject of criminal administration in various countries?—Yes, I have, as far as my opportunities would allow of it.

3507. You have formed the opinion that there should be a more systematic study of the constitution and of the previous environment of each prisoner?—I decidedly think so; I most emphatically think so.

3508. Was that the object of your putting in for instance a chart showing the connexion of juvenile crime with the density of the population?—It was. Where you have a dense population you have always a large amount of juvenile crime, and always a large amount of crime in general, because you have then a large amount of degeneracy amongst the population.

3509. You put in also a chart showing the connexion or disconnexion, whichever it may turn out to be, of crime with pauperism?—I did. And by putting in that chart I meant to show that pauperism was only one factor in the production of crime, and a most important one, but that unless it was combined with other factors, as, for example, a dense population, the existence of a large amount of pauperism alone did not, in this country at any rate as far as we can see, produce a large amount of crime.

3510. In these charts you speak of the density of population in each county?—Yes.

3511. Is it not that in the case of some counties somewhat fallacious. For instance, in such a county as Northumberland where you have large tracts of empty country?—Yes, it is fallacious up to that point, just as it is a little fallacious in Surrey again, where you have a dense population but not very much crime because of the character of the population—a villa population.

3512. However, we may take it, speaking generally, that you think there should be a more systematic study of the character of the population in which the criminal was born, of his physical and mental constitution, and may I also add, of his parentage and hereditary influences?—I decidedly think that all these things should be studied, so that we may know the conditions which produce the criminal population. It is no use attempting to grapple with the criminal population unless you know the conditions which are producing them.

3513. The study of the environment of the antecedents and the physical constitution of the prisoner constitute what is known on the Continent, I think, as criminal anthropology?—It does.

3514. And may I take it that you think that these studies are not merely matters of speculative interest, but lead to immediately practical conclusions?—I do. The Belgian Government has appointed a medical specialist to go round all the prisons and to examine the mental condition of the prisoners in the prison. Dr. Jules Morel is his name, and he has been in correspondence with me.

3515. Has he published any work of importance?—Not of importance. He is very busy with practical work.

3516. With regard to the question referred to us of the classification of first offenders, presuming first of all that we have got to know and distinguish first offenders from other prisoners, would you think it important to deal with them separately?—If we could get to know who the first offenders were, and when they were first offenders, I think in many cases it would be most important if we could deal with them separately.

3517. We have had a great deal of evidence with regard to juvenile crime, how far would you be disposed to carry your classification of first offenders—up to what age?—The first offending juveniles, you mean?

3518. Up to what age would you be prepared to carry that classification, that distinction of first offenders from other prisoners; I mean, would you classify prisoners of the age of 20 as a class apart to be dealt with separately. May I put it in this way, would you classify first offenders of whatever age, as a class apart?—Yes, so far as it is possible to do so.

3519. I mean, supposing you had the power of doing so, would you think it a good thing to do so, or not?—I should leave a good deal of discretion to the authorities in the prison, because a man might only have committed a first offence—but it might be a very bad one, and it might show greater depravity than the man who had committed two or three more.

3520. You have studied, to some extent, the Elmira Reformatory?—I have.

3521. Have you ever visited it?—I have not had time. Our holidays are too short for that.

3522. We shall probably have the report of that before the Committee, but I will ask you only one general question. First of all, at the Elmira Reformatory they receive people up to the age of 30, do they not?—They do; but I think that is too old. I think that to receive men of 30 with boys of 16 or 17 is a mistake, and that is one, I think, of the mistakes of the Elmira system.

3523. Are there any points in the Elmira system that have struck you as particularly valuable?—I think that the system of dealing with young offenders in the way of physically fitting them for the battle of life is a most admirable one.

3524. The educational system?—Yes, I think it is most admirable.

3525. In what way in your opinion is it superior to the plan adopted in our own reformatories?—In our own reformatories we do not deal with them in the same systematic way at all as they deal with them over there, and I do not know that we have as a whole the the same class of officials who could deal with them in the way they are dealt with at Elmira.

3526. Do you happen to be aware of anybody connected with Elmira who would be likely in the course of the year to be in England?—I could not say for certain. Perhaps Mr. Brockway might be. I think it is possible he would, because he might be at the Paris International Prison Congress which will be held next year. I do not know whether that will be time enough or not.

3527. Mr. Brockway is the Governor?—Yes.

3528. The Elmira system has been commonly spoken of in this country as an utter and complete failure. Do you agree with that?—No. I certainly totally disagree with that.

3529. You think there are points in it which might be studied?—I think there are many admirable points in it. I think there are some points in it which ought not to be copied, but there are points in it which would be of great use to ourselves.

3530. I come to the question now of prison labour, on which you have been asked several questions. Are you acquainted with the experience of Dr. Mouat who was for many years inspector of the Bengal gaol?—Yes, and Dr. Mouat is strongly of opinion that industrial labour is the proper form of labour. In fact, his Report to the Prison Congress at St. Petersburg is very strong on that point.

Rev. W. D. Morrison.

3 Aug. 1894.

3531. Do you know Dr. Mouat's Report before the Statistical Society of 1891. Do you happen to be acquainted with it?—Yes, but I think he has dealt with it more exhaustively in his report to the Congress of St. Petersburg. He was called upon to give a report, and he gave a very good one then. Dr. Mouat is by a long way the ablest prison expert in England at this present moment.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time.

3532. (Mr. O'Connor.) I want to ask you about the prisoner J. E. His record, I suppose, was open to the doctor as well as to yourself?—It was.

3533. Then his experience in the prison from which he had been moved was common knowledge between you?—Precisely so.

3534. There was no room or ground for a formal report by you to him?—Not in the least necessary. He saw his record just as well as I did. He had to mark it.

3535. On the point of punishment, I should like to ask you about flogging in prison. I believe the Visiting Committee can give floggings?—They can.

3536. Can the Commissioners?—No; the Commissioners cannot. In local prisons they cannot, but as directors of convict prisons they can.

3537. In cases where prisoners are reported for misconduct either to the Visiting Committee or to the Directors or Commissioners of convict prisons, is there any publicity given to the proceedings?—None at all.

3538. Is the flogging prescribed without their being present, either where the Directors give it in convict prisons or the Visiting Committee?—There is no Visiting Committee of convict prisons.

3539. Are there no visitors?—There is an honorary visitor, I believe, Sir Algernon West.

3540. Is he required to be present?—He is not.

3541. Where the Visiting Committee prescribe flogging in a local prison, is no outsider present to watch the proceedings?—No outsider; merely the officials.

3542. None but officials. Neither inmates nor those who live outside have anything to do with it or are witnesses in any way of the sentence?—No.

3543. How often did the magistrates who used to be visiting magistrates, before the taking over of the prisons, visit the prisons?—Before they were taken over?

3544. Yes?—I really could not say that. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the facts.

3545. How often does the Government Inspector visit a prison now?—Once a month.

3546. Suppose there was overcrowding in a prison, would that necessarily come under the observation of the inspector at his fortnightly visit, or is it the sort of thing that he would take cognizance of?—It is the sort of thing that he would take cognizance of, if he observed it.

3547. And if he reported it, to whom would he report it?—I am not absolutely certain how the inspectors report, but I think they ought to report to the Home Secretary direct.

3548. With regard to reports of the local officials, the Governor, the doctor, and the chaplain, to whom do they go?—They go to the Commissioners.

3549. I notice that in the Blue Books which are published there are extracts given here and there from reports. The chaplain reports, for instance, I see?—That is Part 2, which I think you are looking at. Those are really inspectors' reports.

3550. After a number of sentences on different matters the report goes on, "The chaplain reports "that, 'so-and-so.'" The exact words of the chaplain are not given?—I really could not tell you.

3551. Do you know who it is that has edited this Sixteenth Report?—It is the Prison Commissioners.

3552. But are the chaplains or the doctors or the Governor's reports published in any way?—No, that is the only publication of them.

3553. And these reports of the Governor, the doctor, and the chaplain go to the Commissioners?—They do, but they do not necessarily appear.

3554. No. That is what I was trying to elicit. Who is the inspector of your prison?—I think it is Major Lennox or Captain Lennox. I am not sure which.

3555. An ex-military officer?—Yes.

3556. I think you were at Wakefield before?—Yes.

3557. Who was inspector there?—Major Griffiths.

3558. Another military officer?—Yes.

3559. I was looking to-day at the report of a commission of which I was a member some time ago, the Ridley Commission on the Civil Service, and I notice that Sir Edmund Du Cane gave this evidence, that "the inspectors are appointed by the Secretary of "State, as a matter of fact; but when these inspec- "tors were all appointed Sir Richard Cross referred "to me. They were appointed under my recom- "mendation. There has been a vacancy since, and it "has been filled up." Can you tell us if the existing inspectors were all inspectors appointed under the circumstances referred to here? Are they all original appointments?—I think all of them, except the last one.

3560. Then this vacancy has been filled up, or perhaps there was another vacancy?—I do not know whether there was a vacancy or not, but there was a fresh inspector appointed recently, I believe.

3561. Who was that?—Colonel Garsia, I think.

3562. In your book at page 216 I see you speak of the Belgian prisons and I gather from what you said this morning that you are more or less conversant with the system adopted there. Can you tell us anything about the inspection of Belgian prisons?—The inspector of Belgian prisons is a barrister, Professor Prins. The head of the Belgian prisons is Monsieur Gautier.

3563. Who appoints the inspectors?—I do not know who appoints them there, but there they work on the civilian principle.

3564. What would you say to the suggestion that if the prisons are in the hands of the central authority there should be independent inspection by the local authority, and conversely if the prisons are in the hands of the local authority the inspection should be by the Imperial authority?—The inspection was in the hands of the central authority when the prisons were in the hands of the local authority.

3565. Now the prisons have been taken over by the central authority, and the inspection is by them?—The inspection is by the central authority, although of course, the magistrates have admission to the prison.

3566. But the official inspection is by officers responsible to the central authority, and appointed apparently on the nomination of the Director-General?—That is so.

3567. By whom are the visiting justices appointed?—By the bench of magistrates themselves, or by the body of the magistrates at quarter sessions.

3568. Subject to the approval of the Home Secretary?—I do not know whether his approval is absolutely necessary or not, but I think it would be.

3569. There are one or two points I should like to ask about. There have been certain publications made with reference to prison administration, and among other allegations I find this, "Magistrates "used to visit prisons regularly once a week. Now "the inspectors who replace them pay a visit once "a month." As far as you know is that correct?—I really do not know. I know that inspectors visit once a month, and with regard to magistrates I should say the practice would vary. In some prisons they might visit once a week, in some perhaps more often.

3570. Another allegation is, "Sir Edmund Du Cane "has an almost indisputable office in the selection of "the inspectors." However, I need not press that. Is this allegation true, "That a prisoner, as a rule, "learns nothing in prison that is useful to him."

That is, as a rule, having regard to the general stream of prisoners?—As a rule, they do not learn anything that would be of much use to them.

3571. Can you say anything with regard to punishment diet. What is the longest time that you have known it, as far as you can recollect? Perhaps you have not had occasion to notice it, but what is the longest time, as far as you have known, that the punishment diet was inflicted?—That is laid down in the regulations I think.

3572. Punishment diet can be inflicted for as long as 14 days, by whom?—I do not think the governor can inflict for so long as that. It must be the magistrate.

3573. And can that sentence be repeated within a limited time?—If the doctor consents to it, it can be.

3574. But with regard to the doctor's consent in these cases, I suppose the doctor starts from a normal arrangement, from which arrangement he cannot depart without cause. I mean whether the normal standard is high or low, that is the doctor's datum line?—That is how he would begin, I should fancy; that is what he would start from.

3575. Therefore if the datum line is lower than it ought to be the doctor will not depart from it unless in a specific case he could allege a specific reason?—I suppose he would have a specific reason before he could depart from it.

3576. You think he would not have authority to depart from the established regulations even if he thought they were too stringent?—Well, of course, he must obey the regulations.

3577. With regard to schoolmasters, who are also warders, Captain Schuyler told us to-day that he thought the warder who is acting-schoolmaster at Wandsworth Prison—that is the same prison as you are at?—Yes, it is.

3578. He told us he thought he was worked excessively. I asked him whether he could say if there were any difference in the hours of leaves between convict prisons and local prisons for prison schoolmasters. He said he could not say. Do you happen to know anything about that point?—I could not say, but I should imagine the convict schoolmasters would have more leave, because they are taken from a different class. The convict schoolmaster is not a warder.

3579. I want to get this from you, is the following allegation true:—"Prison treatment has become so "severe that the prisoner when liberated is in many "cases so reduced physically, and so disorganised "mentally, that he is quite unable to re-enter the ranks "of labour"?—I think he is often unfit for labour when he comes out.

3580. I remember that in your evidence last time you gave some information with regard to suicide, I do not remember the detail, but you are not altogether in accord with some other authorities in connexion with suicide. I should be glad if you could make it clear?—I think Mr. Gladstone said, Did I think there was more suicide in the local prisons than in the general population; he said did I think that, considering the class, there was more? Well, all I can say is, that the amount of suicide during the last five years in the local prisons is five times higher than the amount of suicide in the general population over the age of 10 per 100,000.

3581. The suicides in local prisons of persons over the age of 10 is five times as high?—It is five times as high as in the general population over 10.

3582. Will you kindly say how you came to that conclusion?—By looking at the Registrar-General's return and also by looking at the local prison reports. The local prison reports for the last five years gives a certain average of suicides. The Registrar-General gives you the average of suicides in the general population and all you have got to do is to strike off the population below 10 and then see the ratio of suicides to the population and you will find that there is five times as much suicide even now in our local prisons as there is in our general population.

3583. Is there anything else by which you wish to supplement any other point?—I forget at the present moment.

3584. Either with regard to labour, diet, prison labour, or juveniles?—No.

3585. There was one point. I think you told us that juveniles had a larger proportion of solitude in cells than adult prisoners?—Yes, because they are not suited for work outside the cells to the same extent as grown up prisoners; therefore they have longer solitude.

3586. I remember now a very important point I want to ask you about. You have at Wandsworth some convict prisoners?—Yes.

3587. They remain with you for nine months?—No they do not. When I was at Wakefield they remained for nine months, I think.

3588. How long do they remain. The bulk of them do not remain very long?—The convicts go to Wormwood Scrubs to begin with, so that we do not have so many convicts as we used to have.

3589. How many have you at present?—I could not say. Sometimes we may not have any, and sometimes we have a certain number. It depends on the circumstances and the courts. If the assizes and sessions were sitting we might have a few convicts.

3590. When you were at Wakefield did the system obtain of causing convicts to serve their probationary nine months in the local prisons?—Yes, it did.

3591. Then you had convicts at Wakefield?—Yes, and we had to deal with them.

3592. For the nine months?—Yes, as far as I can recollect.

3593. What was the number of prisoners you had there?—I should think the number when I entered there would be a daily average of about 800 or so.

3594. How many convicts would you have there?—I could not remember, but it might be 30 or 40.

3595. Some of them, perhaps the great majority of them would receive your ministrations?—Yes, the great bulk of them would.

3596. Were there any that did not belong to the Church of England?—Yes.

3597. There were some Roman Catholics?—Yes, of course they did not. There was a Roman Catholic priest and he attended to them.

3598. At Wakefield they have a daily church service?—Yes.

3599. When the prisoners were at church service in the morning what did the Roman Catholics do?—There were two chapels at Wakefield for men and women, and the Catholic prisoners went to the women's chapel.

3600. Daily?—Daily.

3601. Did the Roman Catholic chaplain attend daily?—He did; he was a regularly appointed official there.

3602. Oh, there was a chaplain there?—There was a regularly appointed chaplain there.

3603. You have not a regularly appointed Roman Catholic chaplain at Wandsworth, have you?—His duties are not entirely connected with the prison; he is a visiting chaplain who comes in.

3604. Does he have a daily service?—I am not sure whether he does or not, I could not be sure about that.

3605. (Mr. De Rutzen.) You were saying just now something about the visiting justices?—Yes.

3606. Now, as a matter of fact, do you know that the visiting justices are appointed by the quarter sessions?—I think that is so.

3607. And their names after they have been nominated are sent up to the Home Secretary?—That is so.

3608. And then the appointment virtually comes from the Home Office, but upon the nomination alone of the quarter sessions?—Those are the facts.

3609. And the visiting justices have, since the last Act was passed, very considerable powers to inquire into any grievance which may take place in the prison?—Yes, they have certain powers.

Rev. W. D. Morrison.

3 Aug. 1894.

3610. And power to hear if they consider it desirable any complaints which may be made and they can hear them in private?—That is quite correct.

3611. Then their duty if they can find any grievance is to report it at once to the Home Secretary?—That is perfectly true.

3612. And I suppose you have every reason to believe, or have you any reason to doubt, but what they fulfil those duties perfectly?—I think that they fulfil those duties.

3613. Do you think that it is true that criminals taken as a whole exhibit a higher per-centage of physical degeneracy than the rest of the community?—I am positive of it.

3614. Do you also say and think that the bulk of the criminal classes are of a humbly developed mental development?—Yes, I do.

3615. And therefore you are of opinion that the great majority of the people who go to gaol are physically and mentally considerably below the level of the general population?—Yes, I believe a very considerable proportion of them are physically and mentally below the level of the general population.

3616. Would that lead you to believe that the effect of having such a population in the prisons would be that it should have a very serious effect upon the health as well as the mental stability of those who are in it as compared with the outside community?—I certainly think if a prisoner comes in more feeble physically and mentally that imprisonment would have a worse effect upon him than on the average portion of the community.

3617. But would it in the ordinary course of things produce a greater amount of disease or death?—Yes, it would.

3618. And a greater proportion we will say of insanity?—It would; it would be likely to do so.

3619. And therefore you would expect to find those two things in excess in the prison population to what you would find outside?—I certainly should.

3620. I suppose really the great difficulty which you, as a chaplain, or anybody else taking part in the administration of a prison, have, is short sentences?—Yes, that is one difficulty.

3621. Is not it a very great one?—It is a great one.

3622. Is there any greater?—Well, it is a serious difficulty. I should not like to say there is not a greater, but it is a serious difficulty.

3623. Can you do anything that is of a reformatory character up to, we will say, three months?—Very little with adults.

3624. May I take it that all you can do really amounts to next to nothing?—It amounts to very little. All we can do is to help them as much as we can when they go out.

3625. Up to three months may I take it that solitary confinement is a thing that you recommend?—Yes, it is a thing I should leave as it is up to one month.

3626. The solitary confinement you would recommend?—I think it would be difficult to propose anything different.

3627. Then up to that time you must rely entirely so far as your opinion is concerned upon the punishment as being of a deterrent character to prevent a person returning?—I say it does not deter. It cannot deter.

3628. And up to that time, I take it, as you have already said, nothing of a reformatory character could be carried out worth talking about?—Not easily; and the punitive system is just as inefficient, because it is during the first three months that they have the severe system of feeding, so that that is a great difficulty.

3629. But it is only the punitive side we can rely on, and not on the reformatory side of it for, say, three months. Now is it true that up to three months the punishment which very often is given is to people who are perpetually in and out of prison as habitual criminals?—Is it suitable for them?

3630. No; is it true that up to three months represents the lot of a great many whom you call habitual criminals who keep coming in and out?—Yes, it does; a very considerable number.

3631. And they represent a large bulk of the prison population?—They do; a very considerable number.

3632. And up to that time you say that nothing reformatory could be done for them?—I do not say that nothing could.

3633. But not much worth talking about?—I do not say nothing, but not much can be done in three months for the habitual offender.

3634. I will just quote from the book of yours which we have read with satisfaction. You say: "Now this is exactly the position of many habitual "criminals that where he is below the mark, physically "and mentally, should it be the case that such a "person as I have described is below the average in "body and mind to earn a livelihood becomes almost "an impossibility?—It does.

3635. Then you go on saying: "Now this is "exactly the position of many habitual criminals"?—It is.

3636. "And more especially of that large class of "them which is being continually convicted and "re-convicted for petty offences"?—That is quite true.

3637. Now what would you recommend, if you can recommend anything for that class?—I would recommend that a certain proportion of that class should be detained indefinitely, not in prisons, but just detained as you would detain a lunatic, and in that way a very considerable proportion of the prison population would disappear.

3638. Would you lock them up altogether?—I would not call it locking up. I would call it mere detention.

3639. I will quote this now with reference to that: "What can be said of them, except to repeat that "they are unfit to take a part in working the modern "industrial machine. What can be done, except "exclude them in such a way that they will be no "longer able to injure themselves or the world"?—That is just my opinion.

3640. What does that amount to?—It amounts to this; that a certain proportion of the class of offenders who are continually coming before magistrates are at the present moment utterly incorrigible as far as the prison is concerned, and that they are a burden to society, whether they are in prison or whether they are out of prison, and it would be just as cheap for society to detain them indeterminately without anything in the shape of punishment; because you cannot punish people who are not responsible for their physical condition or mental condition; but you can detain them for an indefinite period it may be.

3641. Lock them up altogether?—Yes, for an indeterminate period. That is not a complete solution.

3642. That would be a rigid means of cutting off and reducing the prison population?—It would. A considerable number of them would disappear then, and the magistrates would be relieved from what I consider must be a most trying thing, having to sentence men over and over again, and feeling at the same time that the sentences are useless.

3643. Just one word with regard to contamination in prisons. I take it contamination can only arise by means of talking, or signs, or something of that sort?—Yes, that is so. It is by means of talking, and by means of leaving men together without supervision that you have that. Of course they are the same thing.

3644. It does take place in association?—Yes, talking certainly does take place in association.

3645. And that it is impossible to avoid?—It is impossible whether you have association or whether you have not.

3646. Then we understand that the contamination which alone can arise through talking can be indulged in up to a certain extent, even in labour in association?—It can.

3647. With supervision? — With supervision a little, but not much, because if the officer is there the prisoner feels that if he is caught talking he would lose his privilege of association, and he is very careful, as a rule, not to talk in association.

3648. But talking goes on to a certain extent, as you told us the other day, in chapel?—Yes it does, very considerably.

3649. And I think I heard you say that it was continued to a certain extent in chapel; and then you said unless a man is charged with it. Is that looked upon as a prison offence?—Yes.

3650. And he is reported for it?—He is reported for it and punished for it.

3651. And that could be minimised, I think you said, by having fewer prisoners in chapel at a time?—Yes.

3652. But that would not apply to labour in association?—No, it would not apply to labour in association, but I think the labour we have in association should be only limited association, and that it is possible to have labour in association without having prisoners too closely associated with one another.

3653. Take Wandsworth, where, we will say, two smiths are working at a smithy?—Yes.

3654. There it would be perfectly impossible for them in that particular trade to be isolated where they are working in conjunction?—Yes, in that instance, but in most occupations prisoners can be isolated.

Rev. W. D. Morrison.

3 Aug. 1894.

3655. And the talking in chapel which might be obviated is not capable of being carried out in the same way in labour in association?—No, it is not; not in the same way.

3656. Do you think that there is anything which militates against the success of prison discipline so much as the contamination of an older prisoner?—Yes, the contamination of the younger prisoner by the older is a very bad thing when it does take place.

3657. You know as a matter of fact, I suppose, that the conditions of labour in the prisons subsequent to the Act of 1877 were very considerably limited?—Yes.

3658. And a great many of the hardships which prisoners had to undergo before the passing of the Act of 1877 were very serious, three times as hard in many instances as they are now?—The sentences were longer, no doubt. I am not wholly blaming the existing system. I am not running it down in toto. What I say is, it is capable of very important improvement.

3659. But you are of opinion, so far as you have been able to learn, that the improvements by the Act of 1877, and the state of things which existed before and after the Act of 1865, were very considerable?—There were considerable improvements in some ways, and as great disadvantages in others.

The proceedings then adjourned until Tuesday, the 7th of August, at 12 p.m.

EIGHTH DAY.

Albert De Rutzen, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
Miss Eliza Orme.

James Granville Legge, Secretary.

Dr. Walker called and examined.

Dr. Walker.

7 Aug. 1894.

3660. (Dr. Bridges.) I think you are now the medical officer of Holloway Prison?—I am.

3661. How long have you held that office?—Only since the commencement of January last.

3662. You have been connected wtth the prison service for a long period, I think?—For over 21 years. I believe I entered the service in February 1873.

3663. You have, if I understand rightly, been principally connected with convict prisons?—Yes.

3664. Will you kindly mention your first appointment?—My first appointment was assistant surgeon at Parkhurst Prison, where I remained I think for three years and a half. I was afterwards assistant surgeon at Portland Prison, where I remained I think for nearly four years. I was afterwards transferred to the medical officership of Parkhurst Prison, to which I was originally appointed, and I remained there until May 1884 as medical officer. I was afterwards appointed as medical officer to Chatham Prison, where I remained as medical officer until it was closed at Christmas, 1892. I was then appointed to the medical officership of Dover Prison, where I remained a year, and I was then transferred to the local prison service last January.

3665. I will ask you a few questions first with regard to Holloway Prison. On page 9 of the 16th report of the Commissioners there is a statement of the maximum and minimum numbers in each prison, is not that so?—Yes.

3666. Will you kindly read from that what the maximum and minimum numbers of Holloway had been according to that report. First tell me the men and then the women?—I see it is stated from month to month on pages 10 and 11.

3667. It is page 9 I am referring to?—The daily average is 366 males and 341 females, total 707.

3668. What is the greatest number?—The greatest number of prisoners in custody at one time was 433 males and 393 females, total 826.

Dr. Walker.

7 Aug. 1894.

3669. And the lowest number?—The lowest number is 285 males and 269 females, total 554.

3670. What is the number of certified cells in Holloway prison?—That I could not tell you just at the present minute.

3671. The Committee are informed that the male side in Holloway is entirely for remand prisoners?—That is so; at least not entirely, because they are a few ordinary prisoners kept for cleaning up and general purposes; but otherwise it is entirely for remand prisoners.

3672. And the female side is for convicted prisoners?—No, it is for convicted prisoners and remand female prisoners.

3673. It is both for convicted and remand as regards the females?—Yes.

3674. Please refer to the 13th Appendix of that report on page 25. That is a report of the total number that have passed through in the course of the year?—Yes.

3675. Can you mention that, first taking the number of men who passed through?—There were 12,467 men and 9,701 females, total 22,168.

3676. With regard to the general sanitary condition of Holloway since you have been there I want to ask you some questions. I will take it first with regard to its ventilation. What do you say about that?—I think the ventilation is very good. As far as prisons are concerned I think it is as well ventilated as any prison.

3677. Comparing it with the prisons that you have seen?—Yes, I think it is as good as any other prison. The system of ventilation is very good and the warming is good.

3678. The air is warmed by means of a central tower?—Yes, the air is admitted up this tower. It comes into the top of the cell warmed, and it is extracted on the lower side.

3679. On visiting the prison in June I noticed that the fire was extinguished, and I suppose that would acount for the fact of the ventilatiou not being quite as good as usual?—Was it quite extinguished?

3680. Yes, the officer told me so. However, that really happens sometimes?—It rarely happens I think. There is no smell in the cells and they seem to be very well ventilated.

3681. With regard to the rate of sickness in Holloway will you please refer to the 17th appendix, at page 45, the number of infirmary cases in Holloway?—Sickness treated in hospital?

3682. Yes, the total number of cases of sickness treated in hospital?—It is 443 males and 440 females.

3683. Then I wanted to clear up a point. In the second part of the Commissioners' report, which I think you have before you, you will find a special reference to Holloway on page 35?—Yes.

3685. I do not quite understand how that is made up or how that quite squares with the other statement that the infirmary cases of men appear to be quite as numerous as those of women?—It depends upon the time they are in the hospital. It varies. The daily average for each day is added up for the whole month and divided by the number of days in the month. That gives the daily average for that month. Then all these daily averages for each month are added up and divided by 12, which gives the average for the whole year.

3686. Why is the denominator of the fraction 311 instead of 365. Do you know that?—I cannot say how that is.

3687. Would one reason be that they leave the Sundays out?—I do not know.

3688. However, that is a point you have not considered?—No, I have not seen this report before, I think.

3689. You probably will in due course send in a report of a similar kind on the same form?—Yes, I shall, certainly.

3690. In what shape do you make the report that is mentioned at the top part of the page, where it says, "The medical officer reports that the sanitary "condition of the prison has been satisfactory, and "that the health of the prisoners has been good." Is that part of the general report that you send in?—No, it is not. No general report is sent in from Holloway prison. It has not been the custom to send in a general report from the prison. In convict prisons we always sent in a long report, but in the local prisons it appears that that is not the custom.

3691. Well, of course this refers to your predecessor's report, and therefore I will not ask you any more questions upon that. The duties of a medical officer of a local prison are, I suppose, pretty much what is stated in the standing order?—Certainly.

3692. There is a paragraph at the end of the standing order saying that all the duties are not included in that, but practically for all purposes we may take it that the standing order represents your own duties?—Yes, certainly, but of course I have other duties besides.

3693. One of your duties is to inspect all prisoners upon admission, whether remand prisoners or convicted prisoners?—Yes, whether remand prisoners or convicted prisoners.

3694. Are you able to say roughly what the ordinary number of prisoners who come daily into Holloway is?—I should say the daily average was about 70.

3695. And without committing you to exact precision what would be the largest number?—150 or 160 have come in in the afternoon and evening; quite that.

3696. Do they come in mostly in the morning or the evening?—They principally come in in the afternoon and evening.

3697. May they come in at any time?—Yes, they may come in as early as 10 o'clock in the morning. They are brought in as stragglers and stragglers come in sometimes as late as 9 or 10 o'clock at night.

3698. Could you give the Committee a general idea of your day's work. When does it begin?—It is laid down, I think, to begin at half-past 9, but as a matter of fact, I begin between half-past 9 and 10. Then on certain days I am on duty the whole day. On Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays I am on duty for the whole day. On Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays the assistant surgeon is on duty for the whole day. On the day that I am on duty for the whole day I visit the male and female hospitals.

3699. That would be the first thing?—No, I first begin by signing books, and doing anything that may be required in that way.

3700. Would that take you a considerable time?—It varies; sometimes there is a good deal to do in that way, and sometimes very little. Sometimes it may perhaps take me half an hour, and sometimes it may take me an hour. Then there is the male hospital and the female hospital to be visited. After that I examine prisoners who are remanded for medical observation by the magistrates or who otherwise require examination. This generally takes me until about half-past 1 or half-past 2 in the afternoon. Then I go home and I may be called into the prison again shortly afterwards by what we call "specials" coming in; that is prisoners who require to be seen immediately, such as prisoners who have attempted to commit suicide, or have commited murder, or some other serious offence. At half-past 4 I come in again to see the receptions, and my time is occupied according to the numbers who come in. There may be only 20 or 30 to examine, or there may be 80 or 90, and it would take me from half-past 4, say, to half-past 6; then at half past 7 I come in again to see the evening reception prisoners who have come in since the afternoon. This will take me, perhaps, from half-past 7 till 9 or 10. I am sometimes out of the prison at 9 o'clock, and occasionally I am not out till 10. That would be a day's work. Then in addition to that there may be sick officers to see outside. Of course, this does not include a good deal of official writing which I do at my own house. I have also a good deal of outside work. (This remark refers more especially to attendance at Sessions and visits to Newgate Prison, of which I am also the medical officer.)

3701. With regard to the examination of the afternoon prisoners whom I understand from you are the most numerous——?—No, I think the evening prisoners are the most numerous.

3702. The evening group is the most numerous?—Yes.

3703. You might possibly have 100 to examine?—I might have 100 to examine in the evening, certainly.

3704. And you would have about a couple of hours to give to them?—Yes, the males are only remands and they are not examined with the same care that the females are who are prisoners and have to do work. A male prisoner who is a remand case is not examined at all unless he complains of anything. If a man says he is quite well he is not examined. There is no time to do it. Besides it is not necessary.

3705. With regard to visiting the cells that is what you have mentioned as included in your visit to the infirmary?—What cells?

3706. I meant with regard to your visits to any kind of cells. Are your visits confined to the hospital cells?—My visits are confined to the hospitals, and it is the assistant surgeon's duty to see the complaining sick who are visited in their cells. There are the male and female sick to be seen every morning by me.

3707. Then I understand it is one of the rules to record the result of your examination in writing when a prisoner first comes in?—Yes, we have a book supplied for the purpose.

3708. Have you that book with you?—No; I did not bring it with me, I did not know you would require it. It records the state of health bodily and physically. Then there are any restrictions—any peculiarities about the prisoner, and any restrictions as to the diet and any recommendations we have to make.

3709. Is the height and weight of the prisoner taken?—Yes, it is.

3710. That would be taken by some warder, perhaps?—Yes, that is taken by the warder at receptions.

3711. Are you supposed to make an examination of the principal organs of the body?—Of the females?

3712. Yes?—Of course one examines the chief organs of every convicted prisoner—the heart, the lungs, for instance; but one cannot make an examination beyond that. There is a certain delicacy with regard to examining women which there is not with regard to men.

3713. You have not much time to give to each prisoner?—No, certainly not. One has to go through them very quickly.

3714. With regard to the remand prisoners I think you said that there was not the same need for examination as for the females; but are not a considerable number of the remand prisoners what may be called, roughly, mental cases?—Oh, no, certainly not. The majority are not.

3715. I said a considerable number?—They vary. Perhaps we may get from two to ten a day. I should say from three to four would be a daily average of mental cases.

3716. On the average?—Yes, that would be about a daily average.

3717. It might sometimes exceed that of course?—Certainly.

3718. When you have that very large number of which you spoke—150 or 160—there might be, I suppose, seven or eight such cases?—The greatest number of those cases I have ever known in one day was 13. That has been the maximum since I have been there.

3719. I suppose that with regard to those cases that are referred to you for examination of their mental condition, you find a certain number of malingerers, do you not?—Very few indeed. There are very few malingerers in the local prisons—nothing like the amount there are in the convict prisons. As far as my experience goes the number of malingerers is very few.

3720. You do not think then that as far as your comparatively short experience goes of a local prison that it is much of an object for a prisoner to get put into a hospital cell?—You see my experience with prisoners extends only to females. I have had no experience whatever with regard to male prisoners in the local prisons, but with regard to the female prisoners they do not malinger.

3721. In the case of the remand male prisoners are not some forwarded from the police courts?—A large number.

3722. And of those forwarded from the police courts, are not some forwarded with a view to their mental condition being examined?—A large number.

3723. That part of the work, I suppose, would require a good deal of care?—Yes, very great care indeed.

3724. And also a certain amount of time?—A considerable amount of time. In fact it is one of the most important duties I have in the prison.

3725. To examine the mental state of the remand cases?—Yes, it is by far the most important duty of the medical officer in the prison.

3726. Would that be sometimes done by yourself and sometimes by your assistant?—I do that as nearly as possible myself.

3727. You look upon that as highly responsible?—As the most responsible work, certainly.

3728. Does not the necessary examination of that take sometimes a very long time?—It varies of course. Sometimes it takes a very short time to examine a man. At another time it will take an hour to examine a prisoner, and then one may have to examine him again before one is satisfied. In fact two or three examinations are occasionally necessary.

3729. I come now to the convicted side—the women's side of the prison. I will refer you first, if you please, to the 13th Appendix of the 16th Report which states the punishments. Will you look at the Holloway table. I think you will see that the total number of prisoners punished in the year ending March 1893 is 653 males and 734 females?—Yes, it is 653 males and 734 females.

3730. You have then nearly as many punishments on the remand side of the prison as on the female side?—Yes, I suppose so.

3731. At least that would be the case in that year; for which I know you were not responsible?—Yes, I should think that would be so too.

3732. And, as far as you know, that would be the case now?—Yes, I think so.

3733. Now I observe with regard to those punishments five males and 78 females were punished by the punishment cell; 276 males and 208 females by dietary punishment, and 369 males and 465 females with punishment by the loss of stage. As far as your present experience goes in Holloway would that fairly represent the kind of proportions?—Yes, it seems to be about that.

3734. With regard to the remand prisoners for what sort of offences are these punishments inflicted?—Some of them are for violence or using threatening language. Some of them are for petty breaches of discipline. They bring in tobacco, or they deface their cell walls by writing on them, and doing things which they have been told not to do.

3735. Have you formed any opinion with regard to dietary punishments as to their expediency or otherwise?—Well, for my own part I must say that I am opposed to dietary punishments as far as possible for prolonged periods.

Dr. Walker.

7 Aug. 1894.

3736. What would you define as a prolonged period?—The maximum amount that is allowed. You can give in convict prisons 42 days which I should call a long period.

3737. I was not at present on the convict prisons, but on the local prisons, where the maximum is 14 days, is it not?—It is 14 days, I believe.

3738. There are a considerable number of punishments here both for the remand and for the convicted prisoners of dietary punishments. As far as your experience of this year has gone, would they be for long periods?—No, I think the majority of them are for short periods.

3739. Do you mean for two days or what?—Yes, for two or three days the majority of them are. There are very few for long periods since I have been there.

3740. With regard to the punishment cell, I see you have only five amongst the remand prisoners, but you have 78 amongst the women. Have you had anything like that sort of proportion this year?—In numbers?

3741. Yes. Have you had several cases of punishment cells for women?—Do you mean in using them?

3742. Yes. Have you had several cases of women who have been placed in punishment cells?—Yes, they have been placed in punishment cells, certainly.

3743. What in your experience has been the longest time?—Well, you see it is rather hard for me to say this, because this duty is really performed by the assistant surgeon, so that I can hardly tell you from my own experience. The assistant surgeon sees nearly all the punishments, and I scarcely see any.

3744. The assistant surgeon is Dr. Pitcairn?—Yes.

3745. He has been there for how long?—He has been there for six years. You see my duties are so extensive that I cannot do everything.

3746. Now with regard to the labour done, what do you regard as hard labour of the first class for women?—There is very little labour at Holloway at all. The first class is working in the laundry and in the cookhouse. That is the only hard labour there is.

3747. Associated labour in fact?—Yes, associated labour. The other labour consists in needle work, picking oakum, and generally cleaning inside the prison.

3748. What class of female prisoners pick oakum?—All sorts.

3749. I mean is that recorded as hard labour of the first class?—They are all short term women, up to a month. The majority of them have seven days.

3750. A woman sent to prison for seven days?—Yes, a woman sent to prison for seven days would pick oakum.

3751. What amount?—One pound.

3752. Without the assistance of any instrument?—Yes.

3753. That is called "unbeaten oakum"?—Yes.

3754. Have you been able to measure at all the time that is required by an average woman for picking that quantity?—No, I have not. That has not come under my notice at all.

3755. You have it in your power to modify or to suggest to your Governor that he is to modify any punishment that you think is unsuited to the prisoner?—Certainly; if I thought she was not fit for dietary punishment I should say so.

3756. Have there been many cases in which you have thought it expedient to do that this year?—No; very few indeed.

3757. With regard to the first class diet of which a great ingredient is stirabout, some of us noticed when we visited the prisons that a great deal appeared to be thrown away. I do not know whether that is a usual experience or not?—Yes. Since I have been there I have called attention to the fact that three-fourths of it is thrown away.

3758. Do you attribute that to the Indian corn or to the oatmeal or what?—I attribute it to the Indian corn which is very unpalatable.

3759. You have found great objection to it?—Yes, I have found great objection to it. Women will beg to be given gruel in place of it; large numbers of old prisoners will.

3760. You have a large proportion of prisoners who are sent to Holloway for very short terms?—The majority of them are for very short terms.

3761. You have comparatively few whose term is for six months?—Very few indeed.

3762. And most of them would be for a month or a week, or something of that sort?—The majority of them are from 7 to 14 days.

3763. Then would all of them, unless there were some reason to the contrary, be placed upon No. 1 diet?—They would for the first seven days.

3764. Some of those prisoners would go out again and come again, and so on very frequently, will not they?—Yes, they very often go out on Saturday and come in again on the following Monday.

3765. You have already had experience of many such cases?—Yes, I have of an immense number.

3766. Then in those cases this No. 1 diet would be practically continuous?—Yes, it would.

3767. And for a considerable period?—Yes, it might be.

3768. Have you made any suggestion with regard to that No. 1 dietary?—I have.

3769. Would you mention to the Committee what it is?—Well, I suggested that the No. 1 diet should be revised altogether, and what I suggested was that if half a pint of milk were given night and morning with the same allowance of bread, namely, 5 ounces, and gruel in the middle of the day instead of stir-about, that it would be a much better diet, and it would be more suited as a diet to the class of women who take it, the majority of whom are habitual drunkards.

3770. The total amount of nutriment would be somewhat increased?—Yes, the amount of fats would be greatly increased.

3772. And, therefore, in your opinion, you would not think it necessary to keep this distasteful dietary from the point of view of prison discipline?—I think the diet ought to be made to a certain extent distasteful. You do not want to make it an attractive diet. I certainly object to making it attractive. I think it ought to be a diet that they can eat, and not a diet that they will return. It is only a suggestion of mine with regard to milk as, of course, there may be other better suggestions than that.

3773. Comparing your own long experience of convict prisons with your short experience of a local prison, would you say that your work at Holloway was more or less onerous than the work you have had before, generally speaking?—It is so entirely different. I think the work at Chatham was very responsible work indeed, but I think the work at Holloway is more responsible.

3774. Would that be from the very large number of cases that come before you?—The large number who pass through and the mental work. I am more especially referring to the mental work.

3775. I am now coming to that part of the subject; and I think we have had on official authority that some 600 cases pass through Holloway commonly in the course of a year, with a special instruction that they shall be examined with regard to their mental condition?—Yes, that is so. I have the exact numbers with me. I have here the number which was remanded for observation from year to year since 1886 and 1887. Perhaps you would like to have the last year's figures.

3776. Yes?—Last year there were 537 remanded by the magistrate for observation.

3777. For medical observation?—For observation as to their mental condition. That does not include all the cases that we examine mentally.

3778. What other cases would there be besides that?—Every prisoner who comes in, for instance, charged with a serious crime such as murder or attempted suicide. Attempted suicides are not always sent by the magistrates for examination into their mental condition, but they are always regarded by us as requiring mental observation, and all those special cases are considered as requiring special examination. The total number so examined last year was 1,056.

3779. Can you separate them into sexes?—No, I have not got them separated into sexes here.

3780. We see from the yearly report of the Commissioners, details as to the cases of insanity that come under the observation of the Holloway authorities. This paper I see appears to be in your writing and it would refer to a prisoner. Will you kindly read that, which is a report which you sent to the magistrate?—This is a report I sent to the magistrate of a prisoner after he had been under my observation, and I had determined on his mental state. "Register 6971", then comes the name: "appears to be of low mental type but has shown no indication of insanity whilst here."

3781. I see in the report of the Commissioners that the year ending March 1893 that 88 cases of insanity are recorded in connexion with Holloway prison. Now speaking from your own experience an enormous number of those were remand cases?—The great majority of them are cases remanded by the magistrate.

3782. In this 16th report out of 88 cases it would appear that 72 of them were remand cases?—Yes.

3783. And that would accord with your experience?—Yes. Certainly it would accord with my experience.

3784. So that by no possibility could the insanity of these 72 cases have had anything to do with their life in Holloway prison?—Absolutely nothing.

3785. They may be put entirely out of reckoning so far as prison life is concerned?—They were insane before they came in.

3786. I was going to ask you with regard to certain of those cases; but you are not able, of course, to supply the evidence?—Because the cases have not been under my immediate observation.

3787. No. Would they have come under Dr. Pitcairn's observation do you think, or would it be your predecessor?—It would be my predecessor, Dr. Gilbert, but they have also come under Dr. Pitcairn's observation. All those cases come more or less under the observation of the assistant-surgeon.

3788. But they would be specially examined by Dr. Gilbert?—Yes.

3789. Is Dr. Gilbert still in the service?—Yes, he is medical officer at Dover prison.

3790. A very large number of those 88 cases had been very frequently in asylums before, and some of them had been frequently in prisons before. Is not that so?—Yes that is so, I believe.

3791. Some of those that you have seen, perhaps, are of that class?—A few have been in asylums and a few have been in prisons certainly.

3792. I will read you out a passage from the third report of the Commissioner of Prisons in 1880. Speaking of those prisoners who come frequently in and out of the prison the remark is made:—"A study "of facts such as these, cannot but suggest whether "means should not be devised which should insure "proper care being taken of persons whose im-"becility or low mental power has conduced to their "their becoming criminals and who for the same "reason cannot be deterred by remembrance of past "punishment from repeating the crimes and suffering "the penalties." Would you agree with that remark?—Yes, I certainly should.

3793. That is not a class of case which has probably come very much before you in your convict prison experience. They were all convicted, of course, of serious crime, and, of course, were all sentenced to long periods?—Yes, they were all for long periods. When I was in the convict service there were none for less than five years until within the last year. At all events I had none under my care for less than five years.

3794. With regard to these persons of low mental type such as you have spoken of your practice is, I suppose, to keep them under observation in connexion with the hospital, is it not?—There are special cells in the prison for the purpose, which are specially set apart and which are convenient for observation. There is a light kept in the cell all night, and they are visited every hour.

3795. They are separate, and they are kept in separation?—Certainly they are kept in separation.

3796. I am speaking of local prisons?—The remand cases?

3797. Yes?—They are kept separate, unless they are so very imbecile that they require special attention. Then they are put into a ward of the hospital.

3798. But if not very bad, what then?—If they are not very bad they are kept in the ordinary observation cell.

3799. And they might be there, I suppose, for periods varying from a week to a fortnight?—Yes; that depends on the number of remands; they are generally remanded for a week.

3800. How would they be employed during that time?—I do not think they have any employment. They simply have books to read, and they have their ordinary hour's exercise in the morning. I believe sometimes they are employed in cleaning outside their cells. Some of them are employed as cleaners.

3801. With regard to the convicted women, I suppose some of them are also of a very low type of intelligence, are they not?—Some of them certainly are.

3802. Would they be in associated labour, or would they be in cells?—They are generally in for a very short period, only for a week, and consequently they are employed in the same way as the others, in picking oakum.

3803. No special pains could be taken of them during the very short period that they are there?—No special pains, considering the very short period that they are there.

3804. I think you have paid special attention to the vital statistics of convict prisons?—I have.

3805. Dr. Gore put before the Committee a very interesting report of yours in some scientific journal?—In the "Sanitary Record."

3806. That, I think, deals with the vital statistics of convict prisons for 1890?—Yes, I believe it does.

3807. In that report which the Committee have before them, you point out very properly the importance of dividing the prison population first of all into sex groups and secondly into age groups?—Certainly you cannot arrive at any conclusion without doing that. That is impossible.

3808. Each age group has its average rate of mortality?—Yes.

3809. You found, I think, some difficulty in that owing to the different mode of the Registrar-General's tables as contrasted with the records kept in prison?—Yes, I did. It was one of the most laborious tasks in the whole of my statistics. It was laborious, but not difficult.

3810. The groups of age are divided in prison from 20 to 30, from 30 to 40, and from 40 to 50; whereas by the Registrar-General's report you have them 25 to 35, from 35 to 45, and from 45 to 55?—Yes.

3811. And your method was to alter the English table in conformity with the prison table?—Yes.

3812. I suppose you say it would be desirable if possible that the two standards should in future conform?—I think so. Certainly it would be much more convenient.

Dr. Walker.
7 Aug. 1894.

3813. Coming to your age groups, some of your groups showed this, that those relating to women which are recorded in Table 2 of the paper before us are very small?—Yes, I think there was only one death amongst the women.

3814. But I mean the prison population from 20 to 30 in a convict prison is only 40 women; from 30 to 40 they are 91, and from 40 to 50 they are 88. Those are very small groups to found any statistical foundation upon?—You cannot do it. I think the statistics are really worthless as regards the women.

3815. Then we will confine our attention to the male prisoners. Between 20 and 30 the number is 1,391, in the group from 30 to 40 the number is 1,519, and in the group from 40 to 50 the number is 952. With regard to them I understand you make out that in the prison population of the males from 20 to 30 the death-rate per thousand is 7·9; from 30 to 40 the death-rate is 6·5; and from 40 to 50 the death-rate is 15·7. Will you kindly refer to Table 2 and see if I accurately interpret you. I am confining myself at present to those three groups, and I have accurately read your figures, have I not?—Yes.

3816. Then you contrast that with the English death-rate which for the population between 20 and 30 is 8·31; which between 30 and 40 is 11·52; and which from 40 to 50 is 16·9?—Yes.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time.

Mr. De Rutzen took the Chair.

3817. (Dr. Bridges.) Are you aware whether any similar statistics have been drawn up with regard to the local prison population?—I am not aware of any. I think not.

3818. Would it be possible, do you think, from what you have seen of local prisons to do so?—It is a much bigger question. The numbers to deal with would be very much bigger, but such statistics, of course, could undoubtedly be drawn up.

3819. It would be a matter of considerable difficulty?—Of great difficulty.

3820. Would the difficulty be increased by the fact of the prisoners in local prisons being for the most part short sentence prisoners. Would that complicate the matter?—Yes, it would very much; in fact, I doubt whether statistics worth anything could be drawn up for that very reason that the sentences are so short.

3821. I will only ask you one or two more questions upon your experience in convict prisons. What do you say with regard to the effect of imprisonment on prisoners in convict prisons; I mean upon their minds. Have you noticed any of the effects, good or bad?—I should say that as a rule a prisoner's mental condition is improved rather than deteriorated. Taking the average prisoner his mental condition certainly is not deteriorated. I do not think so.

3822. You have not noticed any cases of a prisoner coming in in a somewhat unstable condition of mind where the effect of life in a convict prison has been to deteriorate his mind?—No, I think not, certainly not. They work in association; they are not isolated as they are in the local prisons.

3823. What do you say generally about the effect of association, or on the other hand, of separation upon the mental condition of the prisoner?—I think that for long sentences you cannot separate them entirely like you do for short sentences, but I should say that for short sentences separation can be borne without any injurious effect upon the mind.

3824. Then I take it that in the case of long sentence prisoners in convict prisons you would not be in favour of keeping prisoners in separate confinement if such a thing had been proposed for five years?—Certainly I should not.

3825. You think that would have a bad effect upon them?—I think it would.

3826. In what way do you think?—I think their mental condition would deteriorate.

3827. As a matter of fact, however, nothing of the kind is done?—No.

3828. The labour in the convict prison is all associated labour?—Yes.

3829. What do you say about the present communications between prisoners, for instance, about the rule of silence. Is the rule of silence a very rigorous one?—No, it is not very rigorous. It is not so rigorously enforced as perhaps would be imagined. I mean prisoners undoubtedly do talk to each other when they are at work. A man will talk to the man who is nearest to him, not out loud but in a whisper, but they do talk to each other.

3830. You mean the warders do not interpret that with absolute rigour?—No, I do not believe they do, but of course they are supposed to.

3831. Are there any cases in which the rule of silence is entirely abrogated by the wish of the Governor or at the suggestion of the medical officer?—At labour?

3832. The rule of silence on medical grounds, I mean?—No, I have never known a case.

3833. (Mr. O'Connor.) Then do I understand you to mean with regard to the talking at work that the warders are better than the rules?—I mean to say that I think a warder might wink at such an irregularity. Of course, if a prisoner persisted in talking after being cautioned he would be reported.

3834. You have been at Parkhurst, Portland, Chatham, and Dover, and then at Holloway?—Yes.

3835. Your predecessor at Holloway or at Newgate has gone to Dover?—Yes.

3836. What is his name?—Dr. Gilbert.

3837. Was he in the convict service?—No, he was never in the convict service.

3838. But he has now gone into the convict service?—Yes, to a small convict prison.

3839. And you who have been in the convict service altogether have now come into the local service?—Yes, I have.

3840. Does that make any difference with regard to your position or his?—In what way, may I ask?

3841. Well, I do not understand the figures I have before me, but I am looking at certain estimates which were before the House of Commons as to the condition of medical officers of local prisons and convict prisons respectively, and I see that in certain respects they are not on the same footing?—I think they are. I am not aware of any different footing. They are divided into classes: 1st class medical officer, 2nd class medical officer, and so on.

3842. Yes, there are 8 altogether?—Yes, Holloway has been made into a 1st class prison.

3843. Yes, that is the next question I want to ask you about. It appears to be 1st class in so far as it has a 1st class governor, and it has a chaplain and an assistant chaplain, and it has a medical officer, and an assistant medical officer. Has it been made a 1st class prison in any other respects?—Well, the number is not up to 1,000 prisoners, which is one of the considerations.

3844. I mean with regard to any other officers?—That I could not tell you. The only other superior officer who I believe is not a 1st class officer is the Deputy-Governor.

3845. Yes, he is 1st class?—I did not know that.

3846. I notice you have not a 1st class chief warder, but only a 2nd class chief officer?—They are discipline matters which would not come under my notice.

3847. Do you know how many principal warders there are there?—I fancy there are 4, but I could not tell you.

3848. I believe as a matter of fact there are 5?—I would not be quite sure about that.

3849. Although pay is taken for six, I think there are only five. Do you happen to know how many warders there are?—I could not tell you the exact number.

3850. Tell me the approximate number ?—I fancy there are about 40.

3851. 30 I have got it ?—30 is it, sir ?

3852. Then pay is drawn for 20 only. So that you are one principal warder, and 7 warders short on your establishment. Now with regard to your own work. I understand you that normally it begins at half-past 9, and after signing the books and other clerical work, you have to visit the male and female hospitals ?—Yes.

3853. Now with regard to the male hospital you have two wards, have not you ?—Two wards and some cells.

3854. Am I right in saying that on the occasion of a visit sometime ago to Holloway there was an officer in charge of one ward, but there was not an officer in charge of the other ?—That is so.

3855. Now we have to inquire into the association of prisoners, and a great many questions have been put to different witnesses about the advisability or inadvisability of prisoners being allowed to associate three in a cell, but in this hospital ward, if I remember rightly, there were none but prisoners ?—There were none but prisoners.

3856. And I think there were six or seven of them ?—The ward holds 10.

3857. But, at any rate, they were prisoners in association ?—Yes.

3858. Were any officers in constant attendance ?—No ; there were no officers in constant attendance.

3859. Will you kindly tell me why that was. Had you an officer available ?—I cannot tell you. You see, having been only at the prison for six months I could not tell you for certain why he was taken away. I only know by rumour.

3860. I suppose your being short of one principal warder and seven warders would furnish a reasonable ground for you not understanding why that was ?—Probably the staff is not sufficient to supply a warder. I believe it is under consideration to supply another warder for that purpose.

3861. Well, after having visited the male and female hospitals you then have to observe those who are under remand for observation. Have you a large number of attempted suicides ?—An immense number amongst those who are sent specially to us.

3862. Take this morning, for instance. How many attempted suicides do you think you have under your observation to-day ?—I have not counted them up.

3863. Tell me approximately ?—I daresay there are 18 or 20.

3864. And I suppose sometimes you may have even more than that ?—Yes ; that is on the male and female sides together.

3865. I suppose most of the attempted suicides are females, are they not ?—No, I think they are equally divided amongst the men and the women.

3866. That takes you until half-past 2. Then you have special cases and an afternoon reception, and then again a reception of prisoners in the evening ?—Yes. With regard to these receptions of course in the afternoon and evening the assistant surgeon and myself would take it in turn to do the work.

3867. Yes, but I am asking you as to a normal full day ?—Yes.

3868. You told us the number would sometimes go up to 160 ?—Yes.

3869. You might have as many as 80 or 90 in the evening ?—Yes, we might have as many as that.

3870. From those you would have to distinguish the insane or mentally doubtful ?—No, those insane are what are called "specials," and our attention would have already been called to those cases.

3871. Supposing that in the 60 or 70 brought in in the evening there should be insane patients ?—Yes.

3872. Would not you be responsible for not detecting their insanity ?—Yes, certainly.

3873. Then you have to discriminate and distinguish and separate those ?—Yes.

3874. You have to make a diagnosis sufficiently carefully ?—We have to make the most perfect diagnosis we possibly can in the time.

3875. I suppose these people are, many of them, very dirty when they come in ?—Filthy. They are all bathed.

3876. Of course they are bathed before you see see them ?—Yes, in nearly every instance.

3877. But still you have to see them ?—Yes.

3878. That takes you up to 9.30 ?—That varies.

3879. But to about that ?—Well it varies. Sometimes we might get away by 9.

3880. And sometimes by 10 ?—Yes, sometimes by 10. I should say it would be more often 9 than 10. 10 would be very exceptional.

3881. Is there any prison in England where there is so large a stream of prisoners as there is in Holloway in the year ?—No. I believe Liverpool is the nearest approach, where they have about 18,000 a year.

3882. And you have 22,000 ?—Yes, we have over 22,000.

3883. You have from 3 to 13 mental cases admitted every day ?—Yes.

3884. Under constant observation day and night ?—Yes.

3885. Now the point I want to put to you is this : do you believe or do you feel that you and your assistant surgeon are, without further assistance, equal to the work that you have to do ; or that any two ordinary men would be equal to doing year in and year out the work you have to do ?—It can be done by two men, but it cannot be done properly. That is my opinion.

3886. I see that in Parkhurst there are two assistant surgeons. At least there are two assistant surgeons charged for ?—I was not aware of the fact.

3887. There is one medical officer of the first class and two assistant surgeons ?—Then he has been recently appointed.

3888. Well it is in the estimates of the year from the 1st of April 1894 to March 1895. It is the current year. In Parkhurst the daily average number of prisoners is 700, but then those are convicts ?—Yes, and invalids. It is now the invalid prison for the whole of the convict prisons.

3889. The convict service has a more steady population ?—Certainly.

3890. It is more easy from the medical point of view to administer a convict prison than such a prison as Holloway ?—Yes, much more easy.

3891. You told us I think that some three quarters of the stir-about is thrown away by the women ?—That is so ; I have had it measured.

3892. Did you notice that, when you came to the prison first ?—Yes, I did or soon afterwards.

3893. That was in January 1894 ?—Yes.

3894. You made a representation about it ?—Yes, I spoke to the medical inspector.

3895. When was that ?—I could not tell you. I do not think I have any record of the particular time.

3896. Was it January, February, March, April, or May ?—I could not tell you whether I wrote about it, or spoke to him when I saw him. It might have been as late as March last.

3897. Has anything been done yet ?—I believe the subject is still under consideration.

3898. Nothing has been done yet ?—No ; nothing has been decided. It is still being issued out.

3899. Stir-about is still being issued out ?—Yes.

3900. And it is still being thrown away ?—It is still being thrown away.

3901. Is there sufficient work at Holloway, according to your estimate of the proper way in which work ought to be done, for a second assistant medical officer ?—Certainly there is.

3902. You say there is ?—Yes, there is plenty of work.

3903. The assistant surgeon is fully employed now ?—He is very hard worked indeed ; as hard worked as I am.

Dr. Walker.
7 Aug. 1894.

3904. And you have as much work to do as you can manage?—Quite as much—rather more.

3905. (Sir Algernon West.) Mr. Gladstone asked me to ask you one or two questions. The first one you have already answered in reply to Dr. Bridges which is, what is your general experience of prison discipline and life on the mental condition of the prisoners. You have answered that already?—Yes.

3906. The next question is, have you ever known of any serious physical mischief resulting from punishment?—In local prisons or in convict prisons?

3907. I do not know which he means, but that is his question, and I think you might reply to it as to both?—From what kind of punishment?

3908. From punishment of any sort. Mr. Gladstone's question is, "Have you ever known of any "serious physical mischief resulting from punish- "ment." That is what he has written down?—No, I have not that I can remember.

3909. Now I want to ask you one or two questions on my own account. When I was at Holloway I think I was there at the time the reception was beginning for the day of remanded prisoners, and I think they were all put into cells; but I want to know whether your inspection of them was after they had had their baths?—That would be so.

3910. I wanted to ask, what is the extreme length of time a prisoner could be kept in a cell before you are asked to inspect him?—The time is rarely very long. He might be brought in in the morning and not be seen till the afternoon receptions.

3911. Is it possible that three remanded prisoners could be in a cell together?—Not all that time, certainly not; because those that come in in the morning are very few indeed; perhaps not more than a dozen or so, and they would always be put into separate cells by themselves. They are only put in two or three together when there is a rush.

3912. That does not happen very often, does it?—I suppose it would in the afternoon and evening when the vans are coming in.

3913. I asked you the extreme period a man can be kept there. Now I ask you what would be the ordinary time when the vans are coming in, in the afternoon that three men could be kept in a cell together?—They would not be there more than perhaps an hour or so. It might perhaps be two hours.

3914. As to those poor fellows that come in in the morning and are not inspected till the evening, we saw the cells they were put into. Are they put there without any book or anything of the sort during the whole day?—I could not tell you that. It has not come under my observation.

3915. But you have not come across a man with a book?—I do not see them in the cell; they are brought from the cell to my office.

3916. I have one other question to ask you; have you formed any opinion from your experience in both the prisons, convict and local, as to useful and useless labour with regard to the effect it has on the prisoners. You have no useless labour in convict prisons, have you?—Except as a punishment.

3917. But the ordinary convict is always put on work which is of a useful nature?—Yes.

3918. In local prisons you know there are people—at Holloway for instance—who are put on a wheel. At Holloway have you a wheel?—No, we have not.

3919. At Pentonville there is a wheel?—Yes.

3920. I do not call pumping useful labour?—It is considered as useful labour.

3921. Let us take only then the wheel and the crank. Have you any opinion about them?—I have never had any experience of a wheel in a prison. It is not used in the convict prisons at all.

3922. Nor at Holloway?—No.

3923. (Miss Orme.) You have the care of the health of the staff of officers besides the prisoners?—Yes, we have 3924. With regard to female warders, have they generally good health?—Yes; as a rule, they have very good health, I think.

3925. You do not notice any effects from overwork?—I cannot say that I have done so.

3926. Are you acquainted with the hours during which they work?—No, that does not actually come under my notice.

3927. Then you have not noticed any effects of over-work?—No, I have not.

3928. With regard to those women who come in for short sentences, you say the greater number of them are habitual drunkards?—A large number of them are.

3929. I suppose some of them have habits of drinking, but would not be actually called "habitual drunkards?"—Yes.

3930. With regard to that class, should you think the low diet during some days makes it more likely than it would otherwise be that they should fall back into drink when they go out?—Well, it depends on whether they eat the food that is given to them. We have no record as to prisoners who reject their stirabout, and those that eat it. If a woman ate her stirabout (which is certainly a nutritious diet as far as it goes), I do not think she would be more likely to turn to drink when she went out, because she would not be starved. The stirabout is a subsistence diet, but if she did not eat the stirabout, but simply took the bread and water, she certainly would be so.

3931. I suppose a number of them are brought into the prison who are suffering from the effects of drink?—Yes.

3932. Their stomachs would be suffering from nausea?—Yes.

3933. And in that case they could not eat it?—No.

3934. Then if they go out for a few days and anybody offered them drink, it would have a much greater effect than if they had had nourishment?—Yes.

3935. Have you had many children born since you have been there?—Several.

3936. Have you any rules for a mother leaving the ward, or does she go into the cell as soon as she is fit for it?—We have no absolute rule on that point. We keep her in hospital until she is quite recovered.

3937. Do you know much about the women or the infants who are in the cells? Does that come under your observation itself?—That comes more under the assistant surgeon.

3938. Have you had many cases of mothers with young infants getting into bad health through living in the cell with the infant?—No, I have not had a single case. As a matter of fact I think there have been only four since I have been here, and in nearly every instance the sentence was a very short one; perhaps a fortnight or so.

3939. Is the staff at your command sufficient to give comfortable attendance to those women who are confined in the prison infirmary. Have you got sufficient for that?—I think our infirmary staff is too small.

3940. Are prisoners ever employed as nurses in cases of that sort?—No, the female infirmary warder attends to them.

3941. And she is a skilled nurse for that special purpose?—Yes, she used to attend at the London Hospital, I believe.

3942. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Taking the bulk of the prison population, do you think that the bulk of them show physical degeneracy to any extent?—I think they do so, certainly the confirmed criminal class does.

3943. And do you think that the bulk of them, apart from these cases to which your special attention is called, are mentally weak?—Well, that is a very difficult question to answer.

3944. I am putting the question from a book that is before me; but would you say that the bulk of the criminal classes are of a humbly developed mental organisation?—I should hardly think so.

3945. Any large proportion of them?—No, I should hardly think so. Of course their mental condition depends very much upon the circumstances. The class of crime they commit seems to have some bearing upon their mental condition. There are some crimes which seem to me to be committed by people of weak intellect, but that is a very difficult question.

3946. Perhaps that is too general a question for you to answer, but may we take it that they are a class of people as a rule from which you might expect possible cases of insanity to arise?—Certainly the criminal class is the very class from which the lunatics are derived.

3947. Very much more than in the community out of doors?—Yes.

3948. And may I take it that from the general physical degeneracy of some of them you might expect early deaths?—Yes, certainly.

3949. So that early deaths and insanity might arise in considerable proportion in prisons over and above what you would expect out of doors?—Yes, certainly I should say so.

3950. (Sir Algernon West.) I should like to take the advantage of asking you a very general question. Have you anything you would in any way like to suggest to the Committee as an improvement in the treatment either in a convict or a local prison of the prisoners. Perhaps I had better confine my attention to convict prisoners?—The only subject that ever struck me was the question of diet.

3951. That you have, I think, already mentioned?—Yes, I think the system that is carried out is excellent, and is capable of very little improvement.

3952. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I will only ask you one more question. That is with reference to the exercise the prisoners get. Do you think the hour a day exercise which they get is adequate?—It is adequate, but I think it would be advisable if they could get a longer exercise. I think if they could have it in the afternoon as well as in the morning it would be more advantageous for their health.

3953. And the reason, I suppose, practically, why they do not get longer exercise is the fact of the insufficiency of the staff?—I believe that has a good deal to do with it.

3954. And no exercise on a Sunday?—No.

3955. Do you think that would be possible?—I think it would be very difficult to give them exercise on a Sunday, because the warder wants to be off duty on a Sunday. They require a holiday.

3956. Yes, for the same reason?—Yes.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Edwin Witheford called and examined.

Mr. E. Witheford.

3957. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Are you the Governor in charge at Dorchester?—Yes.

3958. How long have you been in the service to begin with?—For 18 years and upwards.

3959. And how long have you been in Dorchester?—Two years.

3960. Where were you before?—At Wormwood Scrubs.

3961. You went straight to Dorchester from there?—Yes.

3962. What were you at Wormwood Scrubs?—Chief warder.

3963. And then you were appointed chief warder in charge at Dorchester?—Yes.

3964. What number of prisoners have you on an average at Dorchester?—About 70, but that is above the criminal population of Dorchester. I have a lot of military and naval prisoners there; and some convicts.

3965. Then on the average how many would you have, including the military and naval prisoners?—That would be about the average.

3966. About 70?—All told.

3967. What cell accommodation have you?—I have accommodation for 160.

3968. You are never quite full then?—No.

3969. Does that take in the prisoners for more than Dorsetshire. Where do you get your military prisoners from?—Well the last party I got from the troopships on arriving from India, and the sailors from the Mediterranean Fleet.

3970. Have you any large proportion of long sentences?—Not local prisoners; that is to say not of Dorset prisoners. Some of the military and naval prisoners are on two years' sentences.

3971. What labour do you employ?—At present oakum picking.

3972. Nothing else?—Nothing else. The treadwheel is used for first-class labour.

3973. What includes first class labour?—Able-bodied prisoners for the first 28 days.

3974. It is simply the treadmill?—The treadmill; that is all.

3975. Have you cranks?—No, we have no cranks in the cells.

3976. Nothing but the treadmill?—Nothing but the treadwheel and oakum picking.

3977. The first class hard labour lasts for 28 days?—Yes, for 28 days.

3978. How do you employ them in the second class?—At oakum picking and the ordinary work about the prison.

3979. Do you keep your prisoners entirely separate?—Entirely.

3980. With no association?—None whatever, unless there are men in hospital; and that is very seldom.

3981. Do you give them any kind of profitable employment in their cells?—No, we cannot get it there. You see we are in an agricultural district, and there is difficulty in obtaining any profitable work for prisoners.

3982. I suppose if you could get profitable employment for them it would be of advantage, would it not?—Oh yes, it would be much better for the prison.

3983. You have never had, since you have been there, any matmaking or anything of that sort?—Yes, Post Office bags; mail bags.

3984. You have had some?—Yes, but that has been stopped for the last eight or nine months.

3985. Why was that stopped?—They did not require any more at the General Post Office, I believe.

3986. It was simply by orders?—Yes, by orders from the Commissioners, but we are about to start it again.

3987. You are?—Yes, I have got the invoice for the material now. I have got an order for a few thousand bags to make.

3988. And there is no labour, excepting that in the early part of the time there is the treadmill and oakum picking; and there is also this employment of bag-making?—This bag-making.

3989. What is your staff?—Eleven officers.

3990. Have you men and women?—Yes.

3991. What is the relative proportion of your male prisoners to your female?—Well, at the present moment we have 71 males and two females. The average number of females is generally two or three. We may go up to five, but they are short sentences, and we seldom exceed five.

3992. Have you any ground round the prison?—Yes.

Mr. E. Witheford.

7 Aug. 1894.

3993. On which the people can be employed?—Yes; it is divided into allotments for the officers. The ground outside the prison is used for that purpose.

3994. Is the prison labour used for that?—No.

3995 Then there is no part round the prison which is used for prison labour for cultivation?—Not for cultivation, for the use of the prison. It is simply to keep the grass in order, but they are not allowed to work on the gardens.

3996. You say you have some convicts?—Yes.

3997. Do they simply pass through your prison, or are they people who are simply undergoing the nine months' probation?—It is the separate confinement; that is it.

3998. So that they are doing their nine months?—Yes, and then they are passed on to the convict establishment.

3999. You have a visiting committee, of course?—Yes.

4000. How often do they attend?—Their general meeting is once a quarter, but they appoint monthly visitors.

4001. Monthly visitors of the committee?—Yes, but they visit more frequently than that.

4002. How often do you say, every week?—No. I should say about every third week.

4003. But they do attend regularly?—Yes, and see every prisoner and take considerable interest in them.

4004. And when they come under the prison rules they inquire into everything which is brought to their notice?—They see every prisoner and speak to every prisoner.

4005. And does every prisoner apparently open his mind to the visiting committee?—Yes, he can do it freely. There is no obstacle in the way.

4006. And do you find that prisoners, as a rule, treat the visiting committee a little more like their friends (of course I only mean in a particular sense) than those who are immediately in command of them? Oh, yes; they are pleased to see the committee at any time, and the committee know most of the prisoners. The committee are the owners of the property all round about the county and have most of these men as their tenants.

4007. And they speak freely to them about any little grievance which they may have?—Anything they choose to speak about.

4008. Do you ever have any visitors from outside?—Who come to visit the prisoners, do you mean?

4009. Yes?—Oh, yes.

4010. And all the work that they have to do is done in cells?—Yes, with the exception of the ordinary work of the prison, such as cleaning, cooking, and washing, and all that.

4011. May I assume that they are not put on to do that kind of work in the prison until they have shown themselves fitted for it?—Fit for such employment, and trustworthy, so as to be trusted out of their cells.

4012. And they look upon that, I suppose, as a privilege?—Yes, as a great privilege to be out of their cells.

4013. Have you anything to suggest as to anything that could be done for the improvement of the system as it at present exists?—No, I do not know that I have; especially where I am, at Dorchester, in one of those small prisons. The crime that is committed in that part of the country is such a mild type of crime that the men give very little trouble indeed when they come to prison. There is hardly any crime there at all.

4014. I forget what number of officials you just now said there were?—Eleven.

4015. And their hours are reasonable hours?—Very reasonable hours indeed.

4016. What kind of exercise do your prisoners get of a day?—One hour.

4017. (Miss Orme.) Have you any Prisoners' Aid Society?—Yes.

4018. Does it work well?—Very well indeed.

4019. How is it conducted? Are there meetings at the prison?—Yes, the honorary secretary is one of the members of the visiting committee himself. Captain Mansel attends every Monday, and he sees all prisoners three weeks in advance of their time, and asks what he can do for them and what they propose to do. He writes to their former employer to see if he can get the prisoners back again, and several of them he has found employment for at sea. He sends them to Cardiff. Inexperienced men get on as stokers, or something of that sort, and the females are very well cared for.

4020. How is that conducted?—Well, the matron there is an elderly person and she enters into everything with her prisoners. She understands them thoroughly, and she represents what she thinks is the best thing to do to the committee, and they invariably carry it out.

4021. There are no ladies on the committee, I suppose?—No.

4022. Are there any ladies who visit your prison in a philanthropic sort of way?—General Henning's lady has been there and has interested herself in the work.

4023. But not as a regular thing?—No.

4024. You have no periodical visits from the ladies?—No.

4025. In the same way as the visiting committee of justices visit?—No.

4026. With regard to prison offences do you consider you have many in your prison?—No, they are a different type of prisoner from the London prisoner.

4027. They are much easier to manage?—Oh, yes, much easier. There is very little vice in them.

4028. You do not get many offences with regard to picking oakum?—Well, I make every allowance for that. I find the agricultural labourer is not so sharp as the London prisoner at that kind of labour. He is slow, and I make every allowance for him.

4029. And you do not have very many punishments with regard to that?—No.

4030. I want to ask you one other question. About how many of your prisoners do you generally occupy with these prison duties such as cooking, and so forth?—There are two cooks and six cleaners. There are five in the laundry. We have frequently to do the washing of the clothes on account of the low number of female prisoners. It would be 12 or 13.

4031. You have about 12 or 13 on associated work?—Yes.

4032. Then you do not bake your own bread?—Yes, we do.

4033. How many cooks have you?—One officer. The cook does that with the assistance of a prisoner.

4034. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I forgot to ask you one question. Do you have many juveniles at your prison?—Well, I cannot say that we have many, but we do get them. I had one little boy last week under 12 years of age.

4035. Sentenced?—Yes, to seven days; and he was not 12 years of age. He was named in his warrant as a child. There was his name, and then "child." He was described as a child.

4036. Of course that is one case; but you have occasionally, some who are under 16?—Yes.

4037. What is your view with reference to juvenile offenders? Do you approve of their being sent to prison?—No, not if they are of tender years; certainly not. That boy we sent out of prison last week was perfectly delighted with the treatment he got in prison. There is nothing to deter that boy from coming again. He was treated with the utmost kindness; the boy was quite pleased. He was treated kinder in prison than he would be in his own home.

4038. You know the reformatory system, of course?—Yes.

4039. Are you of opinion that the age at which they may be sent to a reformatory could be extended with advantage?—I can hardly speak very favourably about the reformatory schools. My general experience is that those boys come back again to prison. I do not know whether it is that they are released from school when they are of an age at which they are neither boys nor men. I do not know whether it is the age that does it; but it is not so much so with boys sent to industrial schools. There is the difference.

4040. But they would be sent to industrial schools at an earlier age than they would be sent to a reformatory?—And they would be discharged from the school at an earlier age; so that their employer would have more influence over them.

Mr. E. Witheford.

7 Aug. 1894.

4041. I am assuming a boy, say of between 16 and 18 committing an offence which rendered him liable to be apprehended and tried. Would you consider it would be better to send him to prison than to a reformatory?—It is a very difficult age to manage.

4042. You would not like to express an opinion upon that?—I would not.

The proceedings were adjourned until Thursday, August 9th, 1894, at 2.30 p.m.

NINTH DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Monday, 5th November 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN).

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.
SIR JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
Miss ELIZA ORME.
JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

CAPTAIN HELBY, R.N., called and examined.

Capt. Helby, R.N.

5 Nov. 1894.

4043. (Chairman.) You are Governor of Wandsworth Prison?—Yes.

4044. How long have you been in the prison service?—29 years on the 1st of January next.

4045. Will you state to the Committee the different posts which you have held during that time?—I was first of all Governor of the Sussex county prison at Lewes, and on the transfer of the prisons to the Crown I became Governor of Coldbath Fields. After being seven years there, I was transferred to Pentonville, on the closing of Coldbath Fields. I was there for three years.

4046. As Deputy-Governor?—No, as Governor; and then I have been rather more than six years at Wandsworth.

4047. I must first put to you a general question on the transfer of the prisons. Does your experience lead you to think that the transfer has been a success?—Yes, undoubtedly it has been beneficial to the management of prisons.

4048. Do you think it has brought about a large and considerable improvement in the treatment of prisoners?—Certainly, almost all round.

4049. With regard to the points referred to this Committee, I will ask you first a question about association. On some occasions there has been a difficulty in accommodating the prisoners at Wandsworth?—There has been a difficulty. Perhaps you will allow me to go a little into detail on that matter, in the first place, as to the extent to which it has prevailed. I have taken out some figures for the last five years. The amount of association during the last five years has been 29 days in all. Prisoners have been associated on 29 days only in the whole of those five years. In two of the years, 1890 and 1892, there was no association whatever.

4050. Not even for medical reasons?—Yes; I am speaking with regard to association necessary through excess of population over the separate cell accommodation.

4051. What is called overcrowding?—Yes. In 1891 there were 18 days on which prisoners were associated in three different periods; that is to say two periods of eight days each, and one period of two days. In 1892, as I said before, there were none. In 1893 there were five days on which prisoners were associated; and in 1894 there were six days; that is to say, not separate days, but consecutive days. Five days in one year, and six days in the other year. There was one period in each year; one of five days in 1893, and one of six days in 1894. These consecutive days would be until we could get the means of reducing the numbers by removal. That is to say, there were three occasions in 1891 on which we had to associate for short periods. There was one occasion in 1893, and one in 1894. When I say we had to associate, I would like it to be understood that in my opinion the statutory regulation with regard to cell accommodation has been complied with throughout the period at Wandsworth. The statutory regulation with regard to the provision of separate cell accommodation has never failed.

4052. Then turning to that part of the Act which deals with the question, how do you interpret it?—I have got the figures here, the maximum population for those five years. The average of those maximums would be the amount of cell accommodation required, less the convicts who might be in the prison at the time.

4053. But with regard to the 26th rule in the first Schedule of the Act of 1826, it is laid down that "every male prisoner shall sleep in a cell by himself"?—Yes.

4054. "Or under special circumstances in a sepa- "rate bed placed in a cell"?—Yes, I interpret those special circumstances, in one particular at all events, to mean when there is a sudden and unforeseen increase of prisoners for whom separate accommodation cannot be found. I think that must be included within the special circumstances. There may at any time at any prison, no matter what accommodation has been provided, be a sudden rush, through some special circumstances which would cause an insufficiency of separate accommodation.

4055. You are of opinion, I suppose, that it is very undesirable to associate prisoners?—I am indeed, but I think you can never entirely eliminate the possibility of having to associate them on special occasions when there happens to be a sudden increase from some special temporary cause. Certainly the statutory requirements only provide for the average maximum of five years. They do not provide for the absolute maximum that has been the population during those five years; they only insist that there shall be separate accommodation for the average maximum for the five years.

4056. Since that Act you have had to take the convicts for the first nine months?—No, we do not take the convicts for nine months; sometimes we have had them for three or four months, but recently the period has been shorter. We had them formerly for three or four months until arrangements had been made for their removal.

4057. But that adds to the demand?—And the statute provided that the cell accommodation may be reduced by the number of convicts which we may have.

4058. Shall be reduced?—Yes, I had better go into the figures. The average maximum during the five years I have quoted is 1,135. That maximum has to be reduced by the average number of convicts during that period which is 11, and that reduces the statutory requirements to 1,124. The statute requires us to provide separate accommodation for 1,124 prisoners during those five years.

4060. Quite so, I understand you, but I take it that you are strongly against associating ordinary prisoners where it is possible to avoid it?—Yes, I am; but I would like to say one word on that point, which is, that we do not associate indiscriminately, but when when it has been necessary to associate, we are careful only to associate prisoners with short sentences, that is to say, the ordinary vagrant or men of that class, and those who will be discharged in two or three days so as to minimise whatever evil there is in it. We do not associate indiscriminately, for instance, men of all classes. We are careful to pick out short sentence men of the vagrant class, and men who would be going out in the course of two or three days.

4061. Have you anything more to say on that point of association?—No, except this, that the class of men I am speaking of would probably be in precisely similar association before they came in and after they went out; that is, in the common lodging-house or the Salvation Army shelter, where the association would be as complete as it was here.

4062. Still you do not wish to follow that example?—Not at all, but I merely wish to reduce the effect of it.

4063. You have some suggestions to make with regard to letters and visits to prisoners?—I thought possibly the Committee might like to ask me some questions, but I have no proposals to make on the subject. I think the arrangements are sufficient at present to provide for every contingency.

4064. You think the Governor has sufficient discretionary power?—Yes. I always use my discretion, at any rate. I assume the discretion where time will not admit of reference, and I act upon it.

4065. But still you are bound by rules which are more or less hard and fast?—Yes; I do not depart from the rules unless there is urgency which would justify me in so doing; and then of course I should expect to be cleared on explanation of the circumstances. I do not think there is any intention that the rules shall be so cast iron and hard bound that a Governor is never to use his discretion. I do not interpret it so myself.

4066. If it was pretty clear that the receiving or writing of letters, or the receiving of visitors, was good for the prisoners from a moral point of view, I suppose you would see no objection to extending the existing privileges?—No. If there was time for a reference, I should not take the responsibility; but supposing a prisoner was going out to-morrow, and his friends wanted to make provision for his welfare, and there was no time to refer to the Home Office, I should certainly act on my discretion in the matter, and I should think the Home Office would expect me to do so.

4067. Take another point. Supposing the prisoner was one of the class who are liable to become habitual, and who has relations or friends who are likely to act in a good sense for him, do not you think that it is advisable rather to relax the present rules in order to give his friends freer access to him?—I do not think it would be well that every governor should have discretion in that matter. I think the rules should be adhered to in these matters, and that the discretion should be left with the central authority.

4068. Or with the visiting committee?—Yes, with the visiting committee, certainly; there is no objection to that.

4069. But would you agree that it would be desirable to extend these privileges to prisoners, provided it were found that there were friends who might influence them?—In very exceptional cases. As a rule, I should say it was not advisable.

4070. Then you would not be inclined to relax the three months' rule?—No, certainly I should not relax that. I think it is one of the deterrent elements of imprisonment, and I think they must be preserved.

4071. Upon this question of offences and punishments do you think that the present system is generally good?—Yes; I think the Governor has sufficient power, and not more than sufficient, to maintain the ordinary discipline of the prison; and he has the visiting committee to support him in any more serious matter. I do not think anything calls for alteration there.

4072. Are you in favour of the plank beds?—Yes, I see no objection to the plank bed whatever. It is part of the deterrent discipline of the prison, and I think that has already been relaxed as far as it is prudent.

4073. Then you are satisfied with the dietary punishments?—Yes, they are moderate in character.

4074. But still the effect of a dietary punishment is to lower the vitality of the prisoner?—It is, but he is carefully watched by the doctor. The doctor has power to take the man off the diet and to interpose at any time.

4075. Under what rule are these dietary punishments inflicted, under what part of the Act?—The Act of 1865 provides for that in a general way; but the details of the dietary punishments that may be inflicted are given in the "Local Prisons' Code."

4076. Could you tell me the section of the Act of 1865?—It is all in the "Local Prisons' Code," for the Act of 1865 is quoted in the "Local Prisons' Code." The provisions of the Act in regard to dietary punishments are quoted in the "Local Prisons' Code."

4077. I was rather puzzled myself as to where the power was conferred. I have been unable to lay my hand on it?—Do you mean to inflict dietary punishment at all? Page 80 of the "Local Prisons' Code" gives the dietary scale. I think it comes under the head of "Discipline" of the Act of 1865. It is page 56 in the "Local Prisons' Code."

4078. We are going to adjourn for a short time now, and therefore, perhaps we may as well stop at this point?—If you will allow me the book in the meantime I will turn up that part of the Act of 1865, which refers to it. We do not refer much to the Act of 1865, because everything that governs us is quoted and carried into the "Local Prisons' Code." We do not, as a rule, deal much with the Act of 1865.

Adjourned for a short time.

4079. You were going to find us something, Captain Helby?—Yes, I have looked up the two or three points in the Act of 1865 where those marks are, which refer to the visiting justices' power to impose punishment. That is all I can find.

4080. The Prisons Act of 1865 seems clearly to give authority and power to the Governor to inflict three days bread and wate r—It does.

4081. But I do not see that it makes any reference to the visiting justices' power to order dietary punishments?—No, I cannot find it in the Act of 1865, I apprehend it must have been in the byelaws of the prisons. I certainly cannot find it in the Act of 1865, but I have distinctly a recollection of the visiting justices (that is the old representatives of the visiting committee), having power to impose bread and water for period not exceeding one month; and I know it was their practice to do so; but I cannot find it in the Act of 1865, I apprehend it must have been in our local byelaws. Each county had separate byelaws besides the provisions of the Act of 1865. This book is our present local code which does not provide for it, and I think it must have been fixed and provided for by the county byelaws. I think the powers of inflicting dietary punishments by the visiting justices—(not the visiting committee) must have been in the byelaws.

4082. Schedule 1 to the Prisons Act of 1865 specifically authorises visiting justices to punish by confinement in a punishment cell for any time not exceeding one month?—Yes.

4083. And felony prisoners, or those sentenced to hard labour, might be punished by personal correction?—Yes, that is so.

4084. But I do not see any reference to dietary punishments?—No, I do not see anything in the Act of 1865, nor in the local code which particularises that power.

4085. As a matter of fact dietary punishments are frequently imposed by the visiting justices, are they not?—By the visiting committee. It is assumed that they have powers to impose greater punishments in that regard than the Governor. The Standing Order 94 defines the Governor's power for these diets, limiting them in a certain way; but those diets are laid down in the code for idle and ill-conducted prisoners, and I have always supposed the visiting committee had the power to impose those diets, and they have always so considered themselves.

4086. You do not find any difficulty in giving the necessary dietary punishments to prisoners under the present system?—I do not find it necessary myself to go to anything like the limit that I am empowered to go. I always take my serious cases to the visiting committee. I refrain from imposing heavy dietary punishments myself.

4087. I suppose you think that one of the most effective punishments is the removal of privileges?—No, I do not. I think the most efficient punishment is a short sharp one in the way of diet, in order to deter prisoners from misconduct, I do not like dragging punishments; nor am I fond of the reduction of privileges to any large extent.

4088. Take the question of associated labour?—Well, of course, if a man does not behave himself he is removed from association. That is a privilege which is of course at once withdrawn when a man does not behave himself.

4089. Then that is an effective form of punishment?—Yes, up to a certain point. It does not carry very much with it.

4090. The point depends upon whether or not the prisoner likes associated labour?—Yes, it would not go very far. Merely withdrawing from associated labour would not go very far in the way of deterring him from misconduct.

4091. Supposing certain other privileges were introduced into the present system, such for instance, as some special dinner on Sunday, do not you think that you would have in the possibility of withdrawing those privileges, a very useful form of punishment to preserve discipline?—Anything in the way of dietary punishment is I think always very effective. It appeals at once to the man's grosser nature, and I think it is more effective than any other sort of punishment, but I am not advocating it in any severe degree, or in any extremity; only in moderation.

4092. With regard to the system of stages and marks and gratuities, do you think that there is any improvement to be made in the present system?—No, I think it works exceedingly well. It is a modified system from what I was accustomed to under the county. They instituted a very similar system to that at Lewes under the county, and I worked it for some five years before the transfer to the Crown. The only thing I think is that the money value might be carried a little further with the long sentence prisoners. It stops at 10*s*. Well, we carried it further under our county system at Lewes. It was possible for a man in a two years' sentence to earn up to the full extent of the power the visiting justices had to give him; that is to say up to 2*l*. I do not say I would advocate it quite up to that extent.

4094. Apart from that special difficulty you see no objection to encouraging prisoners to extra work by some slight premium?—Where there is task work; but it is not all task work in a prison, and it would work unfairly with those who are not at task work, men who are cleaning or working about, doing work that cannot be tasked, or working as artisans. It would be an unfair thing not to extend it to them.

4095. You mean it would be very difficult to work it equally?—Yes, I think the limit of eight marks a day is fair on the whole. It is better not to go beyond that.

4096. Would you approve of a proposal to enable local prisoners to earn remission of sentence?—No, I do not think it would be of any value whatever.

4097. Not even those under the long sentences of two years or one year?—No, I think it would be of very little value. I remember a case at Pentonville where some men rendered good service when a prisoner lost his life in the well. Some of these men rendered good service in going down and endeavouring to rescue him. A report was made and they got a month's remission of sentence, but they were very much disappointed because they did not get a gratuity. They would rather have had the gratuity than a month's remission of sentence.

4098. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Would that sentiment apply to four or five persons, or only to one?—It would apply to the whole who were concerned, I think.

4099. How many were there in that case?—Two or three, I think.

4100. It was not an individual it applied to?—No, I think it applied to them all and they were dissatisfied that they did not get a gratuity.

4101. (Chairman.) What is your experience of the results of the associated industrial labour which you have at Wandsworth?—I think it works very well. It is an inducement to the men to behave well and get out in a modified form of association. I see no objection to it whatever, but I should not extend it too far. I think that short-sentence prisoners should be kept in separate confinement, otherwise all the deterrent effect of the imprisonment would be gone.

4102. Then what class of men do you put to industrial work?—The longer sentenced men, after a portion of their time has been spent in separate confinement. I make it a rule generally that a man should not go out of his cell until the first half of his sentence has expired; but we do not adhere to that very rigidly.

Capt. Helby, R.N.

5 Nov. 1894.

4103. Would you put a six months' prisoner into that work?—That would depend. I am obliged to consider the cases individually. It would depend upon whether he had been in prison before, and what his conduct had been during his imprisonment. But supposing his conduct had been good and he had never been in prison before I should put him to some form of labour outside his cell if I could, that is if I had the employment for him.

4104. You would not put a habitual prisoner there?—No, I avoid doing that as much as possible, I have had a good many contentions with convicts on the subject.

4105. In fact you would put the best conducted men?—Yes, we sift them in that way.

4106. Have you had any difficulty at all with regard to talking?—There is occasionally talking, but there cannot be talking to any great extent, so as to have a demoralising effect. There is no possibility of prisoners getting together to hold anything like unrestricted conversation, they may occasionally have a few words, and do undoubtedly, and they are reported and punished in a mild way for it.

4107. But you have no reason to think that there have been any evil results from it?—No, I do not think so. I do not think it can happen with the restricted opportunities that they have. I do not think that anything like concocting crime or demoralising one another by conversation can exist to any extent. I should say not.

4108. Do you imagine that these workshops pay their way?—I do not know. We work almost entirely for the Government, and we do not charge any profit. We merely charge for the wear and tear of tools and materials.

4109. Assuming there was no financial difficulty, to what extent would you be in favour of extending workshops at Wandsworth?—I do not think there would be need for any great extension of the workshops. I will just quote some figures on that point. On Saturday we had working out of their cells in some form or other—either in the infirmary or cleaning or in the shops, or working on the repairing of the buildings, and for things of that kind—330 prisoners out.

4110. (Mr. O'Connor.) Out of how many?—Out of a total of 989; and 66 of those 989 were discharged that morning; so they must be eliminated. They were regarded as our prisoners for the day as they show on the books for the day, but they went out at half-past eight in the morning, it being the last day of their imprisonment; but they were on the books. The total will have to be reduced by that, and of course the receptions who come in at night would not show, because they would be still in the reception ward; and we had 330 actually out of their cells working on that day. I do not think there is much room for extension on that point.

4111. (Chairman.) I see at Wandsworth there are 267 engaged in picking oakum, or coir or wool?—Yes, that is by the last annual return. We have now got some sack making, which we are doing for private firms which has considerably reduced the number on oakum picking.

4112. Do you care for oakum picking as an employment?—We cannot do without it. The statutory requirements of hard labour oblige us to employ the prisoners in some form or other.

4113. But do you think it is a good form of hard labour?—No, we do not use it if we can possibly get anything else, and if the prisoners are fit to do anything else.

4114. That is to say you only give them oakum picking when you cannot give them a better form of hard labour?—Quite so.

4115. But per se you do not think it is a good form of hard labour?—Yes; but I see nothing degrading in it. I see nothing particularly objectionable in it. It is not very enticing or attractive work, but I see nothing objectionable in it myself. Oakum picking is an industry. The oakum when it it picked is used for caulking ships, and I see no reason why it should be degrading to pick it. Sailors employ themselves sometimes by picking oakum at sea.

4116. Then I see you have 148 either at the crank or grinding wheat or pumping water?—Yes.

4117. Do you think that that form of labour which is in its nature unproductive is advisable in the interests of the prisoners?—Well, I think it is very advisable in the interests of society that there should be some real form of hard labour more than mere nominal labour, and I think as long as hard labour stands on the statute we should provide it at all events, for some portion of the sentence. A prisoner is sentenced to hard labour during his entire term. In point of fact we do not give him hard labour beyond the first month, because the lighter forms of work cannot be reckoned hard labour as required by the statute.

4118. We all agree that hard labour must be imposed in some form or another, but should not you say that these particular forms of hard labour mean necessarily that the prisoners engaged on that would be in a state of mental emptiness all the time. No mental effort is required for doing work mechanically, and to that extent it must have a more or less unfortunate effect?—A man breaking stone on the roadside has not mental occupation. It is about as mechanical a thing as turning a crank.

4119. Well, he has to use his eyes, his arms, and his legs in a somewhat different way?—The difference is very small. Our labour in point of fact is really not unproductive, for instance we save 85*l.* a year by pumping water; that is not unproductive.

4120. Of course, that you could get done by getting water from the water company, or using a gas engine if it came to be a question of economy?—Yes, we get water from the water company, but we save to the extent of 85*l.* a year by pumping our own water from our own well, and we also grind our own corn by the mills. That is not unproductive labour because we get much better meal than when we purchase it.

4121. Still the nature of the work means that for six hours a day a prisoner at hard labour on the crank or the mill has to perform a single mechanical action the whole time?—Yes, that is so.

4122. He might be asleep so far as any mental effort is concerned?—Yes, that is so, but I think he would be during that time reflecting on the folly of getting there, and having subjected himself to that discipline. I cannot see the harm of punishment pure and simple myself. I think it is wholesome discipline.

4123. I suppose you say that supposing under favourable conditions you could put a man to hard labour in digging or some hard manual labour which was immediately profitable it would be preferable to putting him to these mechanical contrivances such as turning a crank?—Yes; but I do not think there would be much more profit got out of the digging if you judge of it by taking the experience of the Salvation Army. It might be an advantage, but the powers of doing that are very limited. We should require an extended area and a large wall built at great expense to prevent escapes, and we should require a large extra staff to superintend these men.

4124. I can understand the difficulty of carrying out any such proposal at Wandsworth, but I observe you do make use of every available space within your prison walls?—Yes.

4125. And you find that a good sort of employment?—Yes, and very much sought after as far as it goes.

4126. How do you manage with regard to teaching your prisoners their work in these shops. Have you special artisan warders?—Yes, we have warders who know something; some of them pick it up in the shops in the prisons; for instance, our brushmaker entirely learned brushmaking in some other prison and was sent to Wandsworth to superintend it.

4127. Then you make boots?—We have a proper shoemaker.

4128 A shoemaker warder?—Yes, we have a shoemaker warder to superintend them, and we have two tradesmen to superintend the pouch-making for the postmen, and legging-making, and so on.

4129. Do those men get any extra pay?—No, they do not. If I may express an opinion on that I think it would be desirable if it could be accomplished.

4130. And probably if there were some additional pay you would have better opportunities of getting skilled men?—No I think they could not come in straight in that way to superintend work of that kind. You must have experienced officers and select them. It would be no inducement to men in the first instance, I think.

4131. But they might serve some probationary period?—It would be certainly an advantage if those who were superintending industrial labour and qualified to instruct men, could get some special acknowledgment of their services.

4132. Now, with regard to the question of contamination, is it your experience that there is greater danger of contamination among the younger prisoners than the older ones?—Yes, if they get together; if they get a chance of communicating. That is my opinion undoubtedly. Boys will corrupt each other vastly more than men, and more than men will corrupt boys.

4133. Therefore in any special methods of classification under which the younger prisoners were kept together you might run very great risk of harm?—I think so. I do not know how they get over that in the reformatories; I must say, associating lads together in the numbers they do, seems to me to be fraught with a good deal of risk in that way.

4134. Would you be prepared to give as many books to the prisoners as they wished to read, assuming you had sufficient staff available for the purpose of distributing them?—I do not think I should go beyond our present limits, they get a new book every week and their time for reading, if they do not take it out of their working time, is somewhat limited.

4135. But, still, providing the literature is profitable, it is a good thing for the prisoners to read if they like, is it not?—But I do not think they read their books, I think they skim them. It is not a discipline of the mind at all, but a sheer amusement. I should say if they get a book once a week and get through that, it is a great deal more than I can do. I have not time to read 52 books in a year.

4136. Still, as a matter of fact, you have discretionary power to give them books more than once a week if you thought fit?—The chaplain might do so in special cases, and no one would interfere with the chaplain's discretion in the matter. He has, I think, a free discretion in all those matters.

4137. With regard to the diet, have you any special remark to make on the present system?—No, I think it is more a doctor's question than for me to observe upon. I have not observed any ill-effects of Number 1 Diet. I have heard it commented upon, but I cannot say I have observed it myself. Prisoners appear to me to go out in quite a fit condition to resume their ordinary employment.

4138. How often do the inspectors visit you in a year?—The rule is once a month, but in point of fact the inspector comes to us twice a month. It takes him two days to do his inspection, because ours is a large prison.

4139. Two days each visit?—Not immediately following each other, but he comes two days a month.

4140. (Mr. O'Connor.) How many hours a day?—He would be there the whole afternoon, three or four hours.

4141. (Chairman.) Is it a rule that they visit the prisons once a month?—Yes.

4142. Even the small ones?—Yes, every prison.

4143. Their duty, of course, is to report to the Commissioners?—Yes, that is so.

4144. They have no powers to give orders?—No, they have no power of giving orders. They can call the Governor's attention to any matter, and they make notes in their minute book, and perhaps in 99 cases out of 100, though not an order, it will mean the same thing. The thing will be attended to; but if they should put anything in their order book that the Governor would think he was not justified in carrying out, he would not carry it out without referring to the Commissioners. At least that is my interpretation of the relative position of the Inspectors and the Governors. They do bring round, of course, special orders from the Commissioners, but those are distinguished from their own notes. They bring round from time to time some general order from the Commissioners which is entered in their book, and understood to be the Commissioners' orders.

4145. Then with regard to the Prisoners' Aid Societies. At Wandsworth, I think, that work has been done chiefly by the visiting committee?—Yes, we have a very efficient Prisoners' Aid Society worked by the visiting committee, in fact they spend several hours every week when they visit in going into cases and administering assistance and relief. Besides that, the St. Giles' Mission also has a mission room outside, and every man who goes out of the gates has a card of invitation given him to go and have coffee and bread there, and he has an opportunity of making his case known to whoever is attending as the agent of the society, so that, in point of fact, nobody can possibly say that he has not had an opportunity offered him.

4146. If a prisoner desires to see the agent of any particular society is there any difficulty about it?—No; if he expresses a wish to see the agent of any particular society he is allowed to do so. That society is communicated with, and if they choose they send an agent down to see him.

4147. Do you know how much money the Wandsworth Prisoners' Aid Society gets from the Treasury?—No, I do not quite know; I daresay it would be shown in the statistics, but I do not know.

4148. We have got them in the Commissioners' Report perhaps. Are you satisfied with the average standard of the warders in point of character?—Yes. I must say I think I have got a very fair set of men. They are quite equal to what we had in the county. I think altogether they are quite equal to what I found at Coldbath Fields when I first went there, and they were all county men then.

4149. There is no falling off when you get young men?—No; the new men of course have to learn their way and so forth. I certainly consider my staff now quite as good in point of character as the staff I found at Coldbath Fields when I went there.

4150. I suppose the tone of the warders depends largely upon the Governor. If you get a bad or inefficient Governor that will permeate the whole staff?—Yes, the Governor's tone will unquestionably affect the tone of the staff.

4151. If a prisoner brings a charge against a warder for striking him or alleging that he has struck him or something of that sort, is he allowed to produce evidence from other prisoners?—I should get every possible light that would bear on the subject from prisoner or officer. Of course I should very carefully consider the value of the evidence that came from fellow prisoners. I should have to consider what opportunity they had of collusion or making up a story against the officer or anything of that sort. One would have to consider all that, but I should certainly endeavour to get all the information I could from every source.

4152. And from prisoners as well as from other people?—Yes, certainly.

4153. With regard to young prisoners, do you think that it would be advisable to extend the age of admission to reformatories?—Do you mean beyond 16?

4154. Yes?—I should not say so. The working-class boys, I think, practically become men between 16 and 17, and unless they have been taken in hand earlier than that, I think you cannot treat them as children any longer.

Capt. Helby, R.N.

4155. But still, is not it conceivable that a lad of 17 might do well in a reformatory when he, perhaps, would become an habitual criminal if he went to prison?—Yes, I would not say that it may not be so in some few instances, but, generally speaking, boys of that age have gone out to work for a year or two, and they have acquired all the habits and notions of men. It would require at all events a separate kind of reformatory treatment altogether for them, quite distinct from the child's treatment.

4156. They would have to be treated as a separate class in the reformatories?—And in separate reformatories I think. I do not think it would do to mix them with the younger boys.

4157. Still you think it would be desirable to give to the court, if it were thought fit, power to send lads to a reformatory up to 18?—I should not like to give much opinion on that.

4158. You have not been connected much with reformatories?—No. I think the reformatory people would be better able to judge upon that.

4159. Have you any opinion upon the question as to whether short sentences upon habitual criminals have a very slight deterrent effect?—I should say they had absolutely no deterrent effect at all. Short sentences on an habitual prisoner would not have any deterrent effct. They are so thoroughly accustomed to prison life that they take it as merely an unfortunate accident in their lives.

4160. Have you had many habitual criminals who so work their own business that they come in again and again under sentences of three months or six months?—Yes, we have a great many such, but I should have thought it would have been much better if they had had a more severe sentence I must confess. Sometimes I get prisoners committed for six or twelve months, who have had two or three periods of penal servitude, and it is not likely a six or twelve months' sentence would deter those men from crime.

4161. Would you agree that as an habitual prisoner gets older the prison has less deterrent effect on him in increasing proportion?—Undoubtedly, it becomes a sort of second home to him. He does not choose it, but he is quite reconciled to it when he falls as it were and gets caught and sentenced.

4162. And some sort of cumulative sentence, you think, is the only way of dealing with them?—Yes. I think it is most desirable that previous crime should have an effect in lengthening the sentence. I think it is the only deterrent in such cases.

4163. With regard to the unconvicted prisoners, do you think their position is satisfactory under the existing system?—I have had no experience of them during the last 16 years.

4164. How many debtors have you?—We have an average, I should think, of about 9 or 10 debtors so called. Half of them are probably prisoners committed under magistrates' orders in some civil matter. It is not a conviction and they are treated as debtors.

4165. Do you keep them apart?—Entirely apart from the other prisoners, certainly. They have their day rooms and they have their yard to themselves. They never come in contact with the convicted prisoners, and they have a separate part in chapel.

4166. Are they troublesome prisoners?—Not at all.

4167. Are they well behaved?—Yes.

4168. Do you find convicts are more difficult to deal with than the short sentence prisoners?—No, except now and then. When a man, for instance, cannot get out of his cell to work, and that sort of thing, he may be very troublesome, but as a rule they behave fairly well, quite as well as the average of other prisoners.

4169. Do you think there is any sufficient reason for sending convicts to local prisons during their first period of sentence?—I am really quite unable to give an opinion on that. We do not have them ourselves. We have not the convicts with us for nine months.

4170. I thought you said you had them for three or four months?—We used to have them for three or four months or so before we could get them removed, but we do not get them sent to us for nine months regularly.

4171. Still, how many convicts would you have?—I think not more than two or three at present, because we remove them much quicker than we used to. The forms are altered and we can remove them quicker.

4172. Have you got any opinion as to whether a Deputy-Governor should be given to the large prisons when the population reaches a certain figure?—I think you must have a Deputy Governor in large prisons. During the Governor's absence, for instance, on leave or sickness, I do not think it desirable to leave a large prison with 1,000 prisoners in the hands of a chief warder.

4173. But what would be your limit. In what cases would you appoint a deputy-governor?—Do you mean in point of numbers?

4174. I mean when do you think the appointment of a deputy governor is really necessitated?—Where there are females there is not the same necessity because the matron is, as it were, deputy-governor on her side; therefore it greatly reduces the governor's responsibility on that point.

4175. But still he is the head of the whole prison? Yes, but practically if the matron is a person suitable o her position in a large prison she would be able to uperintend on the female side, I think, without much interference from the governor. Of course, he has to impose the punishments and all that sort of thing.

4176. Then do you think the present system hits the mark?—Yes, I think it is only in large first class prisons that you require a deputy-governor.

4177. Let us take a prison, for instance, like that at Strangeways at Manchester?—I should fancy they have a deputy-governor there.

4178. No, they have no deputy-governor there?—They had. Probably there is a large number of female prisoners there.

4179. In 1893 and 1894 they had a population of 714 men and 316 women?—I should be glad myself if I were there to have a deputy-governor.

4180. In Liverpool there was a population of 686 men and 323 women, a total of 1,009?—Yes.

4181. And there was no deputy-governor there?—I think it is desirable in large prisons. There is a certain amount of mechanical duty which it relieves the Governor of, and it relieves the strain which he must be under. Besides which it is not desirable in a great institution that men of the class of chief warders should be left long in charge.

4182. Then coming down to the smaller prisons—say a prison of 500 or 600—does not the same difficulty present itself there?—It does in a degree, but it is reduced in degree as you come lower. I should not think a prison of 500 or 600 needed a deputy-governor.

4183. But do you think it is advisable, during his absence on sickness or leave, to leave the prison in charge of a chief warder?—Well in medium sized prisons I think it does not work badly.

4184. Do you approve of the system of appointing chief warders as warders-in-charge to prisons with less than 100 prisoners?—I am not too much in love with that, but I should be very sorry to say anything which would militate against the ultimate prospects of good officers having a charge of their own; but I think it should be well limited and not extended too far.

4185. (Sir J. E Dorington.) You said you thought the change from the Local Government to the Crown was beneficial?—Yes.

4186. Are there any particular points that strike you with regard to that. You have just said that the warders were equal to yours under the old system. You did not say they were better?—No, I do not think they are better. Perhaps I might just mention two or three heads as I thought I might be asked that question. I should like to preface what I say, by this, that my experience under the old system was a most satisfactory one. I have not a single word to say against the old system from my own personal experience of it. I had an excellent visiting committee who were most anxious to promote reforms and improvements and do everything that was suggested to help my endeavours in that respect in every possible way; so that I am not at all to be understood to animadvert upon my own experience.

4187. What size was Lewes. How many prisoners had you there?—We had between 300 and 400 cells, I think, but not so many prisoners. We had a large excess of accommodation beyond our requirements. They were built in excess anticipating what never happened; but under the counties each prison was isolated and had its own system; that is, within the statutory obligations of the Act of 1865. It had its own byelaws; its own discipline; its own dietary; and its own system of labour. Within the limits of the Act of 1865, there might be very great differences in prisons in adjoining counties. There was no common standard, no common dietary, no definite point to aim at. The structures varied materially, some being very much behind the time. Improvements were slow of growth, and sometimes there was a great deal of vis inertiæ to overcome, not perhaps with the visiting justices, but some other members of the Court of Session, who would perhaps not approve of improvements and reforms. One magistrate, when we introduced our industrial system at Lewes, came down expressly from London to oppose it, and called it "Captain Helby's Romance in Three Volumes." You were liable to that sort of thing. Then the industrial development was very small. There was very little done except in a few prisons beyond oakum picking and the tread-wheel or cranks with a little bit of mat making here and there. This represented the labour of most prisons, excepting a few that were in advance of others.

4188. So you think the old system was less progressive on the whole?—Yes; then the finance and keeping accounts and all that sort of thing was very elementary indeed. The hours of duty of officers were very much longer, and the promotion was uncertain and irregular. The powers of visiting justices to punish were very much in excess of what the visiting committees' powers are now, and the Act of 1865 I consider positively discouraged industrial labour. It imposed the necessity of penal labour for the first three months, and made it optional to the magistrates to continue it during the whole sentence if they pleased, and I have reason to think that that view was taken sometimes in some counties.

4189. So that the reduction of penal labour to one month is a distinct advantage?—Yes, it is a distinct advantage. Then the Government inspection under the old system was infrequent and indefinite. Once a year the inspector under the old system came round, and he was supposed to be the eyes and the ears of the Secretary of State; but I think that he knew little or nothing of what might be going on in the prisons. In fact the systems might vary immensely in adjoining counties according to the views that the separate visiting justices or Courts of Quarter Sessions took about prison discipline.

4190. We already heard here in evidence that the dietary in two prisons in one county under the same Quarter Sessions was absolutely distinct?—Yes. Very possibly they might be very different in character. The dietaries are greatly improved. We thought we had a good dietary at Lewes; but I should say comparing it with the present dietaries it is vastly improved. It was too monotonous. Now it is more varied and palatable, and more likely to be assimilated than a monotonous dietary day after day would be.

4191. Was your dietary a smaller one than the present one?—No, I think it was not less in quantity.

4192. It was more monotonous?—Yes, it was not so varied.

4193. There was a Government dietary recommended at that time?—Yes, there was, but I think very few prisons adopted it. I think they mostly framed their own dietaries. In point of fact, speaking as a Governor perhaps it is a curious thing to say, but under the old system the Governors had too free a hand. I think the system hung very much upon the Governor of each particular prison under the counties.

4194. You do not think now that you are under too strict regulations?—No.

4195. You do not think that you are too much of a machine?—No.

4196. You have got a sufficient amount of discretion to manage properly?—Yes. I think such a large organisation as the prison service is now is vastly better than a number of separate communities with no common bond and no common system.

4197. I understand you would not approve any considerable extension of associated labour?—No. I think with short sentences that separate confinement is better as a deterrent, undoubtedly.

4198. There was a period in English prison management when there was a good deal of associated labour, which I think was found unsatisfactory?—Yes.

4199. And led to moral deterioration of the prison? Yes; I think when it is not very carefully guarded (as it is with us in separating them off in stalls and great supervision) that it would lead to demoralisation very considerably.

4200. In the convict prisons they are much more associated?—Yes, they have longer sentence, and men cannot bear separate confinement beyond a certain period. At Pentonville I think they began to try it for 18 months, but it was found to be too severe.

4201. In the convict prisons, I suppose, they are practically always associated except at night?—I do not know.

4202. With regard to young persons, do you think that young persons over 16 are unsuitable subjects for reformatory treatment in proper reformatories, or do you only think they are not proper subjects for treatment in such reformatories as we have got now?—That is my meaning.

4203. If an institution was specially licensed for the reception of such prisoners do you think that some good might be done?—Very likely, but I do not think they can be treated as children any longer. At 16 the working-class boy is beyond the age at which he can be treated as a child or juvenile.

4204. Would you say it would be desirable to try an experiment of some kind of reformatory treatment for persons over 16?—Yes, I should see no objection to such an experiment. I suppose the meaning is that instead of sending a boy for three or four months to prison, you would send him for three or four years to a reformatory.

4205. Do you happen to know that before the Reformatory Acts were passed, under license of the Secretary of State, the reformatory managers did receive persons of much older age for reformatory treatment?—No, I do not know that.

4206. Reformatories began without any legal power, but prisoners were licensed to them by the Secretary of State?—Yes, but that was before my prison experience.

4207. (Chairman.) Do you happen to remember the Parkhurst Reformatory?—No, I only know it by hearsay. I know it was established, but I fancy it was a failure, though, from what cause I do not know.

4208. (Mr. O'Connor.) As I gather the effect of your evidence would be that the principal advantage which has accrued from the handing over of the prisons to the Government, is the adoption of a uniform system as regards a great many things, where before there was a great want of uniformity?—Yes, a wider range of vision I think altogether.

4209. But apart from that question of uniformity, and limiting your answer only to your own personal experience, would you say that there is any great advantage attaching to the central system as compared with the old?—Do you mean with regard to prisoners or officers or what?

Capt. Helby, R.N.

5 Nov. 1894.

4210. Both or either?—Well we will begin with officers. Certainly there is with officers. There is a much better field for promotion and advancement undoubtedly, both for superior officers and for subordinates. If a Governor was appointed to a small prison with a couple of hundred prisoners, he would probably stay there all his life under the county. Now there is a progressive advancement, and it is a certain stimulus to officers whether superior or subordinate.

4211. But with regard to prisoners?—With regard to prisoners, I think that they are more looked after and better protected. As a rule, they have more protection than they had under the county system. The visiting justices under the county were of course the governing body of the prison, and there was nothing besween them and the prisoners. Now, the Commissioners and the Home Office are the governing body, and the visiting committees stand between them and the prisoners. They come now, into the prisons, under a totally different aspect. They come to see wether the prisoners are well treated or not, whereas, formerly as visiting justices, they came to enforce the discipline.

4212. Do you think the head-quarters are sufficiently in touch with the different prisons?—Yes, through the inspectors.

4213. The inspectors are supposed to be the Secretary of State's officers?—I can hardly say that. They do not report direct to the Secretary of State, but they report to the Commissioners.

4214. And they bring round orders to the Commissioners?—Yes, they do from time to time.

4215. You do not think that there is in the Central Department sometimes so much vis inertiæ as there would be amongst local authorities in respect of reforms?—No, I do not think so. It strikes me that the central authority is very much on the look out for improvements.

4216. Now with regard to the question of accommodation. I quite follow all the figures, but I understand that in the years 1890 and 1892, there was no excess of prisoners. In the year 1891, again in 1893, and again in 1894, on several occasions you had not sufficient accommodation under the statute—is that so?—No, not quite so; I did not say on several occasions. On one occasion in 1893, and on one occasion in 1894.

4217. And on four occasions in 1891?—On three occasions in 1891.

4218. Do you have to make a return at all to the Home Office or to the Commissioners with regard to the state of the prison in point of population?—Yes, weekly.

4219. It is a weekly return, is it?—Yes.

4220. What does the return show?—It shows the population and the cell accommodation; and it shows the number of vacant cells.

4221. Does that include the debtors' cells?—Yes, they are all specified in the returns.

4222. But are you allowed to use debtors' cells for ordinary prisoners?—No objection could arise to that in any form that I know of. They are precisely the same cells. A certain portion is cut off from a wing with a canvas screen. A canvas screen screens off a portion of the wing presumably for debtors; and seeing we cannot fill it up with debtors as there are perhaps only 10 debtors and 32 cells appropriated to them, there is no reason in the world why those cells should not be used on a pressure. We should not use them in the ordinary way, but there is no reason why we should not use them in a case of pressure.

4223. I only want to get at the fact. The debtors' cells are used at any rate for the ordinary prisoners sometimes?—They may be used.

4224. They have been used?—Yes.

4225. What do you consider, having regard to your prison population, is a satisfactory working margain for reception cells?—Well, we occasionally get of course more than the whole of our reception cells will accommodate, but as a rule they are sufficient.

4226. What would you say was a reasonable and satisfactory working margin for your prison, having regard to population?—You mean the number of reception cells you should have?

4227. Yes?—We have 50, and I think that meets all our necessities in a general way.

4228. Do you besides having to use the debtors' cell also have to use the reception cells for your prison population?—In case of strain we may have to do so certainly; in case of any sudden influx.

4229. Then it has sometimes happened, if I understand you rightly, that not only have all your ordinary cells in ordinary use for your prisoners been occupied, but also all your receeption cells and all your debtors' cells?—No, I would not say that. I say we may do so, but I do not say we have done so. I think in all probability, if we had done so, we should not have had so much association as we had in 1891?

4230. What was the maximum in 1891?—The maximum that we had in association?

4231. Yes?—I think 22 was the highest we had altogether.

4232. Now; what was the maximum number of your prisoners in 1891?—1,165.

4233. And your total number of cells?—I am afraid I have made a little mistake in the figures I gave you just now.

4234*. Kindly give me the total number of cells?—That must be, 1,114 not 1,124.

4235. And that includes every single reception cell and every debtors' cell. Do you consider that you have sufficient accommodation according to the requirements of the statute under these circumstances?—We have the statutory provision, but of course it is a question of opinlon whether that is sufficient accommodation. At the present moment we have 20 cells in addition to the statutory provision.

4236. I am speaking of the number 1,165?—Yes.

4237. Coming now to the year 1893 for five days you had an excess. What was the maximum number?—We had 1,165.

4238. Even more than in 1891?—Yes.

4239. And then all the cells including debtors' and reception cells were occupied?—No, I do not think they were.

4240. Then how do you accommodate 1,175?—You must understand that there are prisoners in hospital, and in the associated room who would liberate a certain number of cells.

4241. You could utilise the hospital accommodation and also the association room?—You could utilise the cells and that would be liberated by these men being there; and those men not occupying cells the cell that they would be reckoned to occupy would be freed, and therefore have reduced that excess to that amount.

4242. To the amount of 51?—No, it would not reduce it entirely.

* Extract from a letter from Captain Helby.

Some confusion of figures has got into that portion of the evidence between questions 4234 and 4248, as to the amount of separate cell accommodation in this prison in relation to the statutory requirement in that particular. No doubt I must have given the figures to Mr. O'Connor (on which he based the questions I have quoted) from my notes—but in error—that is, taken from the wrong table, in the hurry of the moment. I do not quite see how I can correct the mistake by any alteration of the text. But the true figures are shown in detail in the following table; and if that could be inserted as a footnote to my evidence, it would clear the matter up. The effect will be to show that (counting cells of all kinds) we are actually at the present time in excess of the statutory requirement to the extent of 33 cells.

4243. That is the difference between 1,165 and 1,114?—That would not represent it entirely. The difference between 1,175 and our accommodation would be reduced by the prisoners who were in hospital, or in the associated ward.

4244. What was the highest number you had in this year?—I have not got it beyond March 1894.

4245. Only for one quarter?—No, for the year ending March 1894. That was 1,171, but we have now 23 more cells than the numbers I have given you. We have added 23 cells.

4246. To your 1,114?—Yes.

4247. That will make 1,137?—Yes.

4248. That would leave a deficiency of 34 as compared with 1,171?—Yes.

4249. That is after every available cell is occupied. You say you make a return of the cells and of the population each week?—Yes.

4250. Then the Home Office is cognisant of this state of things?—Yes, but it occurs suddenly, in a day probably; and of course I immediately make the Home Office cognisant by sending up a list for removal. It does not depend upon the weekly return at all.

4251. I thought you said that you made a return weekly?—We do make a return weekly, but I should not wait for a weekly return if we got an excess or even a threatened excess if I could foresee it.

4252. What becomes of the men when you make that return? Where do they go to when you make that return of overpressure?—They must be associated for a time.

4253. In the year 1894 you had six consecutive days when you had an overpressure?—Yes.

4254. Was any special arrangement made under the direction of the Home Office for that period?—Though I have not looked it up I have no doubt we removed the prisoners in consequence of that pressure.

4255. But can you say positively?—No, I cannot say positively; but I know that on two or three occasions we have removed prisoners to other prisons through excess above accommodation as soon as it was possible to get the papers through.

4256. I suppose that when you have a very large number of prisoners the strain upon yourself and your staff is much greater than when that is not the condition of the prison?—I do not think there is much appreciable difference in that way.

4257. Is your staff overworked?—No, I do not think it is.

4258. What would be the longest hours that any warder would be worked in Wandsworth?—The regular day hours are from 6 o'clock in the morning till 6 o'clock in the evening, with an interval for breakfast and dinner, which makes ten hours.

4259. What would you say would be the longest time worked by any of your warders or assistant warders counting from 6 o'clock in the morning?—Occasionally some of them would be on until 10. Some might remain for the night; but they would not be on duty during the night. They would be a reserve guard and would be in bed.

4260. Has it ever happened to your knowledge that a warder in your prison has been on duty from 6 in the morning and all through the night without going to bed?—Yes, the principal warders.

4261. I asked you just now what was the longest time any warder was worked, and you said until 10 o'clock?—Yes, the principal warders are sometimes in their turns on duty the whole night.

4262. From 6 o'clock in the morning?—Yes.

4263. All through the night?—Yes; not actually on their legs all night, but they have to go through the wards from time to time.

4264. The warder is on duty from 6 o'clock in the morning all through the night either sitting or standing?—Yes.

4265. Till when—8 o'clock?—Yes.

4266. When he goes to breakfast?—Yes, or rather half-past seven.

4267. Twenty-five and a half hours?—Yes; he gets the day off then.

4268. And then he was to go to bed, I suppose?—Yes, I suppose so; part of the time at all events.

4269. And stay in bed most of the day after that?—Yes.

4270. Then the case of a warder being worked from 6 o'clock one day until half past six the next morning—that is without a break for 25 hours—is not unknown?—That refers only to the principal warders, not to the warders or assistant warders at all.

4271. To officers?—Yes. I mean it does not go through the prison. It only affects a very small number; the principal warders.

4272. Do you know how many warders your prison is estimated for in the estimates?—No, I have not looked at the estimates.

4273. And pay taken for?—No, I have not looked at that.

4274. How many assistant warders have you?—46 altogether, including two who are for special duties.

4275. What is the service of these men? Are any of them at their maximum?—Do you mean at their maximum with regard to pay?

4276. Yes?—If they have been more than eight years there, they have got their maximum pay and will get no increase until they are promoted.

4277. Some of these men I understand are skilled men in different branches. I think you spoke of men who are employed in making pouches, did you not?—Yes, I said we had a man who was a shoemaker by trade superintending that.

4278. The pouch makers according to your return work up to the value of 2,700*l.* and they are under the direction of some skilled warder; I mean skilled in that particular line of industry?—Yes, he is a shoemaker; and, because there is a great deal of leather work in these pouches, he is appropriated to that duty. His only claim to skill is that he is a shoemaker by trade.

4279. At any rate he is a skilled workman?—To that extent, as a shoemaker.

4280. Not only is he a shoemaker but he can make pouches. Now does that man receive any more pay than the other warders?—No, he receives the ordinary warders' pay.

4281. Who is it superintends the prison industries. I mean under the Government?—Well the storekeeper, superintends the accounts and all that sort of thing. The prison officers superintend the actual work, and they keep rough books of the work but the storekeeper has all the accounts to keep.

4282. But who is there who is concerned with the industrial occupation of the prisoners as they are classified and who checks the work?—We have no labour master. The books check the work.

4283. I want to get from you what amount of administrative distribution, measurement, and direction is there, with regard to the industrial population of the prison at Wandsworth?—Well, I hardly know how to understand your question. They are divided off under certain officers and those officers superintend the details of their work.

4284. There are certain men employed, a good many at oakum picking; then there are pouch makers, mail bag makers, brush makers, some grinding wheat, and so on, and a variety of industries. I want to know what officer is there who is concerned with the classification under these particular heads and the direction of the industries. Is there any system?—There is no labour master or anything of that kind. They are not under any one special superintending control excepting my own.

4285. Do you select these men for the different branches of work or different kinds of industry according to their ascertained aptitudes?—No, it would be almost impossible to do that in a local prison; the sentences are too short to be able to deal with it in that minute way.

4287. You have some system of check as directed by head-quarters?—Yes, to a certain extent.

4288. Have you any system of check with regard to hammock making?—Not from head-quarters. That is a matter of experience from what it is found a man can fairly do in a day, and we take that as the average expectation; but, as I say, it is elastic with regard to industrial work because all prisoners cannot do exactly the same. Their intelligence, or even their manual skill, is not the same.

4289. So that with regard to quantity or the appropriate task to be done, very often you are entirely in the hands of a subordinate officer who is in superintendence?—Yes, very much. His observation enables him to say what a prisoner really wishing to work fairly and honestly can do and we take that as the standard.

4290. But there is no officially recorded standard?—Not in every case.

4291. Do you think that is a satisfactory system?—Well, it might de desirable perhaps to have a recorded standard for every branch of work.

4292. I should like to ask you with regard to the health of prisoners. Have you many cases of patients sent to lunatic asylums? You have had I suppose?—Yes; I find that during the last 12 months we had four cases sent to lunatic asylums, of which three were insane on admission.

4293. Had those three been in prison before?—I do not know without tracing their cases.

4294. You did not notice that?—No, I could not say now about that; I could not say at all without reference.

4295. And if a man is sent to a lunatic asylum, the cost of his keep at the lunatic asylum comes through the prison vote, does it not?—Yes, until his sentence expires.

4296. Do you know the charge for a prisoner in a lunatic asylum?—I do not know it.

4297. It is 36*l.*, a year, is it not?—I could not say.

4298. However it costs more to send him to a lunatic asylum than to keep him in prison?—Yes; I suppose so.

4299. So that to send away a man whose mind is affected involves an increased charge on the prison vote?—I dare say it does, but we are not conscious of anything of that sort. We know nothing about that.

4300. Have you seen the evidence given by any previous witnesses?—Yes.

4301. All of them?—No; I have seen a good many, but not all.

4302. Is there anything in any of the evidence which you wish to answer, or correct, or modify or qualify?—Well, I hope I have qualified the impression with regard to the association. I think I have endeavoured to reduce the seriousness of its first appearance, and I do not know that there is anything else.

4303. You have not communicated with the Commissioners with regard to your coming here?—No.

4304. You are a perfectly free agent?—Yes.

4305. (Sir Algernon West.) You have talked a good deal about the deterrent effect of certain punishments and certain discipline. Do you mean the deterrent effect provided against prisoners returning, or the deterrent effect to the outside people not to commit crime?—I mean both.

4306. Could you support by statistics in any way that that discipline has really any deterrent effect?—I cannot support it by statistics.

4307. But do you really think that the discipline has a deterrent effect?—I think a sharp and strict discipline must have a deterrent effect.

4308. It has been suggested to me once that it would be a very good thing if the severer punishment should come at the end of the prisoner's term rather than at the beginning. What do you say to that?—No, I should not say that. I think it would exasperate them.

4309. With regard to debtors, they are usually people who are sent to prison for refusing to pay money when they can pay?—There were really no debtors now in the strict acceptation of the term.

4310. These men are sent, I believe, in all cases when they can pay and will not pay, and they are put into the position of a first class misdemeanant?—They are.

4311. Have you ever known cases of people sent in for a trivial debt of 10*s.*, or something of that kind, who have had good dinners sent up?—There are cases where people get maintenance and could easily have paid.

4312. Do you see any reason for treating these people who are committed for contempt of court, in the same way as other prisoners are, with regard to diet and so on?—No.

4313. They are refractory prisoners?—The need for amelioration of the debtor prisoners' condition has gone by I think in consequence of the recent Bankruptcy Acts.

4314. Is the position of a chaplain in a goal this, that he is subordinate to a Governor?—Well, as far as the rules and routine duties of the prison are concerned he will be to a certain extent that is to say, he must abide by the rules and system and that kind of thing.

4315. And would he report through you, or direct to the Secretary of State?—All letters go through me as a matter of form, but he would write his letter independently of me, not to me, but to the Commissioners; but it would go through my hands, so that I should have knowledge of it.

4316. As a rule do you have extraneous preachers on a Sunday?—No.

4317. You have a prison chaplain?—Yes.

4318. Do you think it would be advisable to have a little new blood with the prison preachers?—Yes, with discretion, but I have seen unsuitable persons come and I have heard unsuitable addresses given.

4319. Do you mean they have been invited by the chaplain?—Yes, I am speaking of the old days under the counties.

4320. Do you think the present system of prison chaplains is a good one?—Yes. I should like to see it supplemented in the large prisons by a Scripture Reader; undoubtedly, I think, the cell visitation is the weak point. Capt. Helby, R.N. 5 Nov. 1894.

4321. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) It is inadequate?—Yes; it cannot be adequate. Besides I think a man of their own class of life would get at prisoners better, and it really would be more helpful to them in all probability. In many cases, I do not say in all cases, but with a certain class of prisoners, they would be helpful to them. I am speaking of large prisons not small prisons.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. James Duncan called and examined. Mr. J. Duncan.

4322. (Chairman.) You are Store Accountant in the Prison Department of the Home Office?—Yes.

4323. And you have been connected, I think, for a long time with the subject of prison industries?—For 39 years.

4324. Would you tell the Committee what posts you have occupied officially?—I filled the post of Store Accountant at the Prison Department since 1889, and in that capacity have charge under the direct control of the Commissioners of all the matters relating to the purchase and disposal of stores, the industrial employment of the prisoners, and the maintenance of an effective check on all accounts connected with stores and manufactures. From 1877 to 1889 I was employed in establishing a system of book-keeping for local prisons, and at the request of the Treasury I compiled a Manual of Instruction on Prison Accounts for the English prisons. I also prepared similar text-books for the use of the Scotch and Irish prisons. In the course of my experience I visited almost every prison in the three kingdoms, and furnished special reports to the Government respecting them as regards accounts, trade, &c. Prior to 1877 I occupied for a good many years the post of steward and manufacturer at Pentonville Convict Prison, where I had a varied experience on the subjects generally. I was for a time Accountant of H.M. Treasury. While Treasury auditor of the accounts of the Metropolitan Board of Works, just before that body ceased to exist, I suggested, and afterwards assisted to introduce, the system of store accounts now in use under the London County Council. I am at the present time Treasury Auditor of the accounts of the Official Trustees of Charitable Funds. I gave evidence before Lord Kimberley's Commission on Penal Servitude in 1877, and before the Irish Commission in 1884.

4325. What does "a manufacturer" mean?—Having charge of the industrial operations of the prison, and the accounts connected with them.

4326. You supervised the whole of the labour?—Yes. That is to say, I had instructors under me and kept the books. I was the accountant of the prison, but with a staff wherewith to enable me to direct the various industries that were carried on.

4327. Does the head instructor at the present day perform the same duty that you performed then?—No. My duties were somewhat similar to those now performed by the storekeeper.

4328. With as much authority as you had?—No. He would be a warder and would act under the storekeeper.

4329. With as much power to check the industries and accounts?—I exercised pretty nearly the same functions that the head of a manufacturing business firm would have done.

4330. And he would be the accounting officer of the prison?—Not of the prison; but he would have to keep accounts of the manufacturing materials issued to him and used by the prisoners under his charge.

4331. Will you give the Committee some information about the labour in the prisons under the old system of administration?—Under the counties and boroughs the chief factor in the difficult problem of prison administration was profitable industrial employment. Discipline of course had its place, but the main object was the maintenance of remunerative occupations.

4332. Does your experience lead you to think that the desire to make money interfered with the discipline of the prison?—No, I think not. Discipline had its place, and a very prominent place too; but the maintenance of what I call remunerative occupation was kept before the administration in a very prominent way indeed.

4333. Then in those days you had the unproductive labour, what now constitutes hard labour, namely, the crank, the treadmill, and so forth?—Oh, yes. In many prisons, indeed, they made a point of preferring the more penal classes of labour to industrial labour. For instance, in 1874–75 Winchester had 207 prisoners out of a total population of 262 employed in pumping, grinding, and oakum picking. Out of a total population of 48, Oxford had 35 on the treadmill, shot drill, the capstan, hard-labour machines, and oakum picking. At Devizes there were 62 out of its total of 78 prisoners engaged on the treadmill or on oakum picking; but in far the greater number of prisons the question of providing remunerative employment received the highest attention, and was always regarded as of the highest importance. One prison competed with another in finding a market for its produce, and in making a good show of profit in the annual returns printed in the reports of the inspectors. Governors and other officers were encouraged in many instances to take an active interest in trade by bonuses or other payments, and the amount of trade profit was taken largely into account by the visiting justices in dealing with applications for increase of pay.

4334. Did they employ any agents outside the prisons?—In some cases that was so. Wakefield carried on a very extensive mat trade, in which the sales averaged 40,000*l.* a year. Steam power was employed. A commercial traveller was appointed to sell the goods, and the whole of the industrial department of the prison was under the control of a trade manager, who was provided with a staff of clerks and trade instructors. The salaries of all those officers were paid out of the trade profits. The trade manager had authority to award a gratuity not exceeding half-a-crown to any prisoner on his discharge who had shown special assiduity in the performance of his work, and the Governor could supplement this to the extent of 17*s.* 6*d.*, making it 1*l.* in all. It was in the power of the trade manager also to recommend the grant of additional bread as a reward for marked industry. Diligent long-term prisoners on their discharge were frequently provided for in the way of clothes, and had their railway fares paid to their destination. Cases have even been known of mutton chops being allowed at Christmas time to exceptionally industrious men. Preston Prison was another busy prison. It carried on a large trade, employed a commercial traveller, and the Governor was allowed a trade agent at a salary of 60*l.* A taskmaster and assistant taskmaster also formed part of his staff. The regulations provided that "with a view to encourage habits of industry as "well as to reward the honest efforts of prisoners, and "to enable such as desired to reform to have the means "of living after discharge until they can procure em- "ployment,' the Governor should be empowered to grant a sum of 2*s.* to every prisoner who had performed his fixed task diligently and well during the whole period of his sentence (being not less than three months) and to a further sum not exceeding 2*l.* for all work done in addition to such fixed task. The allowances were:— for an extra square yard of matting, 1*d.*; for an extra ton of stone breaking, 2*d.*; for every extra coat made, 2*s.*; for every extra pair of boots, 9*d.*; and so on. The same system prevailed at Bodmin, Bedford, Chester, Mold, Preston, Chelmsford, Maidstone, Coldbath Fields, Holloway, Lewes, and Warwick. Manchester had an agent paid by commission for the purchase of stores, and the sale of manufactured articles. The Governor of Hereford received 10 per cent. on the net profits arising from the sale of the manufactured goods, and the assistant turnkey had an extra allowance of 3*s.* a week for acting as trade instructor. Then Kirkdale, Strangeways, Leeds, Lewes, and many other prisons were furnished in addition to the ordinary disciplinary staff with trade officers, whose duty it was to instruct the prisoners in the various industries carried on.

4335. Then the Governors seem to have been allowed to do pretty well what they liked with regard to developing these industries?—That is so. So far as I can learn gratuities to prisoners in any other form than that simply of trade rewards, were not in force throughout the service to any great extent. There are of course obvious objections to a system of extra payments to officers, but there can be no doubt that the stimulus to industry which they caused in the local prisons was very marked. The keenest interest of the Governors was secured, and they had practically a free hand. They could buy and sell pretty much as they liked, and they were not slow to learn that in the direction of the high profits the way to promotion lay; and it was the same with their instructors.

4336. With regard to the earnings, can you tell us what were the average earnings of those who were employed in those industries, and also what the average earnings per man were?—The total earnings in the local prisons for the year ending the 30th of September 1876, were returned at 111,710*l.* 12*s.* 0*d.*, giving an average of 5*l.* 18*s.* 0*d.* per prisoner in custody.

4337. What would the average of those engaged in trade industries be, for instance, mat-making?—At Preston the average earnings of the mat-makers was 18*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.* per man; and of the laundry women 22*l.* 5*s.*

4338. (Mr. O'Connor.) Was this under the system of extra allowances to the Governors and the teachers?—Yes. I have given you the general average per prisoner in custody as 5*l.* 18*s.*

4339. (Chairman.) Can you make any comparison between the figures of those days and the present labour statistics?—It would be impossible to institute any reliable comparison between past and present labour statistics, as the method of arriving at the figures then and now is totally different. Each county and borough acted independently and had its own views on the matter. It was not unusual to, for example, leave unvalued altogether the large army of bakers, cooks, cleaners, menders, and others performing the ordinary domestic services of the prisons.

4340. Were classes of prisoners employed in productive labour under the old system, who, under the present system, would not be so engaged?—That is so. It is worth noting that under the old authority prisoners not sentenced to hard labour, and those also who were excused hard labour by the medical officer, were in many prisons utilised for industrial employments from the beginning of their sentences instead of being strictly confined to their cells for the first month as now. Governors were enabled in this way largely to increase the number of efficient workmen avaliable for trades.

4341. Do you think it would be a good thing to go back to that system at all?—Yes, I think it would be worth considering, at all events, whether on the whole it would not be advisable to resume the practice in some modified shape. We lose a good deal of competent industrial hands in that way.

4342. Now before going further into the actual figures of prison labour in these days, I should like to come to 1878 when the prisons were transferred from the local authorities. Of course that transfer brought about a great difference in all branches of the prison service?—Yes.

4343. And produced a considerable alteration in the rules with regard to prison labour?—Yes.

4344. The whole system became uniform?—Yes.

4345. Were there any changes with regard to the checking of stores?—A revised system of accounts was introduced.

4346. Were you engaged in that?—I was engaged along with the Accounts Committee on that point, and produced the book which I handed you just now.

4347. The book is the standard book for the English prisons?—Yes.

4348. What were the chief changes that were made in the staff of the prisons at the time with regard to this question of labour?—A carefully considered and uniform system of discipline was introduced, and various reforms were carried out, among the rest being the establishment of a strict check on cash and stores. An important change was made in the staff of the prisons. The granting of extra trade allowances to officers was for the most part discontinued, and the payment of industrial rewards to prisoners was abolished. The scale of gratuity applicable to all convicted criminals was at the same time initiated in connexion with the system of progressive stages.

4349. Were the whole of the industries carried on much the same as before?—Yes, pretty much as they were before.

4350. Were they supplemented at all?—They were supplemented to an important extent by the introduction of the manufacture of articles for prison use. Blankets, clothing, calico, flannel shirting, sheeting, tin ware, brushes, and other goods were produced for these purposes in large quantities.

4351. Then mat-making was one of the most important items?—We carried on mat-making, but in course of time an agitation against prison mat-making on the part of the outside workmen which had commenced in 1872 was actively renewed, and strong pressure was brought to bear on the Government and the House of Commons, with the result that in the end mat-making had to be abandoned excepting in so far as manufacturing for the Government Departments was concerned. It probably was the most suitable, as well as the most flourishing of all the prison industries. It employed 2,800 workers at the time the prisons were taken over.

4352. Then considerable change took place in connexion with the oakum picking?—Yes; the oakum trade practically collapsed, and oakum was a trade on which the prisons of this country had been enabled to rely for employment for many generations. The collapse of the oakum trade was owing to the substitution of iron and steel for wood in the building of ships. It was owing partly also to the depressed condition of shipping. The industry gave occupation both under the late and present administration to over 3,500 prisoners, mostly under very short sentences.

4353. (Sir Algernon West.) Oakum alone?—Oakum alone.

4354. (Chairman.) What profits were made upon it?—Well, as much as 5*l.* or 6*l.* at one time could be made per ton in the shape of profit in picking oakum.

4355. Was that the price per ton?—No; that was the profit realised. A firm would send in a ton of oakum, and would pay from 4*l.* to 6*l.* for the picking of it. Now we can scarcely make both ends meet. I may say, however, that just at this particular moment there are signs of a turn in trade, curiously enough.

4356. Why is that?—I do not know, but we are beginning to sell a little at places here and there where for a long time we were unable to get a half-hundredweight disposed of.

4357. You do not know for what purpose?—For barges and things of that kind. There are still some wooden vessels.

4358. (Sir Algernon West.) Are not they using it for making new rope?—Something has been said in that way, and I believe something is done, but only to a small extent. I believe oakum is still used for river barges.

4359. (Chairman.) What has taken place in the oakum picking?—Well, we have exerted ourselves immensely to get substitutes for it, and we have extended wood chopping, stone breaking, the picking of wool, cotton, hair, and silk; but these things are only to be got in the manufacturing districts. Efforts have also been made to pick up minor local industries, such as sack making and mending, pea-sorting, box-making, glove-making, cart-cover-making, the unpicking of leather belting, &c. These little local industries are extremely difficult to procure, but they help us to tide over the present difficulty, and Governors are being constantly urged in the matter, while the Commissioners leave no stone unturned. Mosaic we used to make at Woking, but that has long been discontinued. I think they had some difficulty in getting rid of the produce.

4360. What is pea sorting?—Sorting peas; picking out the bad ones.

4361. I think you can give us some comparative figures with regard to the number of prisoners employed in most of the representative trades in 1876 and within the last year?—I have prepared some figures, and I would like to hand them in (the document was handed in, see Appendix IV.).

4362. I have got these figures before me and I should like to ask a few questions upon them. I see that in regard to basket, brush, and broom makers there is an increase of from 39 to 221?—Yes.

4363. Is that through Government orders?—That is largely Government orders.

4364. Entirely?—Yes. I include supplies to prisons.

4365. Why have bookbinders dropped from 22 to 1. Why has that industry practically gone out?—It has not gone out, although it is down in that year. This is 1892–3, and at the present moment we are carrying on bookbinding to a large extent all over the service. The drop is more apparent than real. It is merely a question of classification in the statistics of employment.

4366. Do you remember at what prisons bookbinding is done?—It is done at Wandsworth and Wakefield. We have four centres for bookbinding. We send the books to those prisons to bind.

4367. You bind your own books?—Yes.

4368. But not for other Government Departments?—No. We have thought of that, but it has never come to any practical conclusion. We have thought of bookbinding for the Stationery Department.

4369. Gardeners and labourers have dropped from 135 to 70. How is that?—Probably in 1876 the number of prisons was very much larger. There were probably 114 prisons then, and now it is only 56. Each prison would have its little garden, and the numbers would be larger on that account.

4370. I have been round several prisons, and only in one case was the ground inside the prison used for garden purposes. That is at Wandsworth. For instance, at Strangeways, Leeds, and Knutsford no attempt was made to cultivate the waste ground inside the walls?—In some of the larger towns, such as Leeds, for example, they say things will not grow well.

4371. They can make rhubarb grow with a very great profit?—We are looking up these gardening industries. I think I can give you the figures as to that. 38 out of 56 have garden ground which they cultivate. There are probably others where cultivation might be possible.

4372. I suppose you would say it is advisable where you can do it?—Certainly. I should advocate that class of employment very much for prisoners.

4373. I see mat and matting weavers have gone down from 2283 to 186?—Yes.

4374. Are you supplying all the mats used by the Government?—Yes, I believe so. I believe there are a few which are not supplied, to the Office of Works. We used to supply all the Office of Works wanted.

4375. Then shoemakers have dropped from 313 to 50?—Yes. Here again it is a question of classification. The 50 are only those at new work. The repairers are entered among those at domestic services.

4376. What shoes did they make before 1877?—They made for themselves, and in some cases for outside.

4377. For sale?—Yes, for sale.

4378. They make shoes now for convicts?—Yes.

4379. For any other class?—No; they only make for themselves.

4380. They do not supply the Army or the Navy?—No, not at present.

4381. Would it be possible, do you think, to get a degree of skill which would be sufficient?—Yes, I think it would. I can go back to the early days of Pentonville when the prison had but lately emerged from the control of the then Commissioners, and it had trade instructors and all that sort of thing. We used to make at that time postmen's shoes.

4382. Were they well made?—They were sufficiently well made to suit the Post Office.

4383. Could not something be done there to increase that branch of industry?—I think so.

4384. Stonebreakers have gone down from 404 to 49. What is the reason for that?—Well, I think the introduction of stone crushing by steam has had something to do with that. Then some prisons at which stone breaking used to be done have been abolished, and the trade has disappeared in that way.

4385. They have probably been the prisons in the neighbourhood of quarries?—Yes, in most cases.

4386. Tailors have declined from 289 to 213. Did the tailors do any work for sale?—In some cases that was so. Preston, I think, did it.

4387. What is the reason for the diminution?—Well, there is a fall in the number of prisoners, and the difference in classification comes in again, as in the case of shoemakers.

4388. That would account all through for the proportion?—Yes, and governors tell me constantly that there is a falling off also in the industrial qualities of the prisoners that are coming into the prisons now. I do not know whether that has been mentioned to the Committee before.

4389. (Sir Algernon West.) They are a lower class prisoner?—Yes. We do not get the workmen prisoners that we did in that time.

4390. (Chairman.) Then, non-effectives, sick, debtors, those awaiting trial and under punishment are put down at 2,107 in 1877 and 3,114 now?—These figures at the end in that group and some of the others must be taken in this way. The difference in those figures arises largely from the different way in which they were grouped by the old authorities as compared with the new. You will see that in order to get the total number in 1876 I had to add 540 who were entirely omitted by the local authorities in their returns, and possibly some of these may have been among the non-effectives. You see I had to make a bit of a shot at those numbers. The other numbers are all perfectly correct as taken from the returns, but there was a difference between the way in which the counties manipulated their numbers as compared with our method.

4391. The term non-effective means prisoners who did not do any productive work?—Who were not at work.

Mr. J. Duncan.

5 Nov, 1894.

4392. Then they seem to bear out what you said a short time ago, that a great many classes of prisoners who now would not work at all were brought in then?—Yes.

4393. Because then you had a larger number of prisoners than you have now, and you had a smaller number of non-effectives than now?—Yes.

4394. And you think some of those 3,114 could be brought into labour with profit?—I think so.

4395. Now coming to the Government Departments, have you found the large producing departments ready to meet the representations of the Prison Departments?—Well, of late we have been finding them far more accessible and far more ready to co-operate with us than formerly. Up to the last few years there was extreme difficulty in getting them to take us up at all. The Post Office from the beginning has been the Department that has been most ready to help us and to give us orders; but the War Department now, and the Admiralty also, are helping us in every way they possibly can.

4396. I suppose you go to see the officials personally?—Yes, either I myself or a member of my staff; I think that has been really the breaking down of the old system of the stilted official letter inviting a reply and leading to delay, and correspondence, and sometimes to controversy and friction. I think the doing away with that has put us in a better position in dealing with these people than we formerly were.

4397. Will you just tell the Committee the chief items of work that you get from those Departments?—The Postal Department gives us extensive orders for the mail bags, leggings, belts, pouches, stamping pads, tin saucers, notice boards, packing cases, twine, brushes, bag mending, &c. The Admiralty helps us with requisitions for hammocks, coal sacks, mats, mattings, hearth-rugs, sacks, mattress covers, slippers, and slip-fenders. The War Office deals with us for mats and bedding; and the Office of Works for mops, brushes, hearth-rugs, and rug-mats; and the Board of Trade for mats and rugs.

4398. I see that in some of the figures which I have got before me the number of prisoners employed in manufacturing for the War Office is 28, for the Admiralty, 289, for the Office of Works, 16, and for the Post Office, 624. Well, surely the War Office and the Office of Works ought to do rather more for you?—Yes, a great deal more. We are constantly appealing to them on the subject, and we are gradually getting our hand further in; but if skilled instruction were provided, I have no doubt there would be an immense opening for extension both in connexion with the Admiralty and the War Office.

4399. The Admiralty already give you a great deal, but the War Office hardly anything?—It is gradually increasing as I have said, and we are making our way into their custom which they are willing to increase.

4400. Can you suggest any particular work which the Office of Works could give you?—I think I might probably do that. Given increased skill and increased facilities, I think we could make house-maids' boxes, knife boards, knife boxes, clothes horses, hassocks, mops, kneeling mats, Dutch carpets, house flannel dusters, huckaback towels, door mats, hearth rugs, rolling-pins, paste boards, chopping boards, presses, and other similar furniture, and possibly blinds for the Office of Works.

4401. Could you manufacture chairs and forms and tables?—I see no reason why we should not.

4402. Why should not you have a furniture department?—Yes, certainly, it would be interesting work for the prisoners if they were properly instructed.

4403. Now, on the question of skill and manufacturing facilities, has there been a decline in skilled facilities since the transfer?—We have had few instructing officers.

4404. You have not had officers as highly qualified as those who were in the prisons before 1877?—That is so.

4405. The inducement having been taken away, there has not been the same incentive to make themselves skilful in the work?—Yes, that is so.

4406. Then the number of short sentence prisoners has largely increased?—Yes, the number of short-term prisoners necessarily hampers industrial progress here as in other countries. In 1893–4 the number of prisoners sentenced to three months and under, was over 48 per cent. Of those, nearly 22 per cent. of the prison strength were in custody for sentences of a month or under.

4407. You do not happen to remember the proportion before 1877?—No.

4408. It would not be nearly as high as 48 per cent.?—No, I should think not. It has always to be borne in mind that a large number of prisoners are of necessity unavailable for labour of any kind, such as those that are sick, and those that are excused labour by the medical officer, prisoners under punishment, untried prisoners, debtors, first class misdemeanants, and new arrivals not yet told off for labour. They come into these statistics and there is always a large proportion of them. They amounted in March last to 22 per cent. of the whole. It has also to be remembered that in addition large numbers have to be assigned to unproductive labour on the tread mill or crank, and to comparatively unremunerative work like wheat grinding, pumping, and oakum picking, because of the fact that first class hard labour must be provided for prisoners in the first stage sentenced to hard labour.

4409. Can you hand to the Committee the figures showing approximately how the prison population is now employed?—Yes (the document was handed in, see Appendix IV.).

4410. The Act gives a certain amount of discretion as to determining what is or is not hard labour?—Yes, a certain amount.

4411. It is: "hard bodily labour such as may be "appointed by the justices in sessions assembled, with "the approval of the Secretary of State"?—Yes, that is so. Under the old authority they used to adopt artificial means of converting mat making, into first class hard labour by increasing the weight of the beater.

4412. Oakum picking figures sometimes as first class hard labour?—Yes; it is not strictly hard labour as laid down by the Act.

4413. But it would be first class hard labour for women?—Yes. It might, perhaps, be so regarded; but the Act lays down that every female prisoner sentenced to hard labour shall be kept at hard labour of the second class.

4414. In the old days prison labour was let out to some extent to contract, was it not?—Yes, to some extent it was.

4415. But not now?—Well, the system of letting out the labour of prisons to contractors never existed to any great extent in this country. At present we have some contracts of this sort for making list slippers, list rugs, coir brushes, oakum picking, and so on; but in no case is the management of the work given over to the employées of contractors, as in other countries.

4416. How does that system work. How are these contracts carried out?—That matter is left to the prison administration.

4417. Each particular prison?—To each particular prison.

4418. But, of course, those are articles that are delivered to the contractor, and then he retails them?—Yes, that is so. As a rule he supplies the material and we make it up for him.

4419. Is not there any agitation on that?—Not as yet, but we never feel ourselves safe from an agitation in these matters. Oakum picking is the most important in the list that I have given you, and it is not likely there will be an agitation on that point. A man sends in what we call junk; that is to say old rope, and we pick it into oakum, and he pays us the cost of the picking. That is a simple arrangement, and others are much on the same footing.

4420. Do those contractors come into the prison to supervise the work?—No, they are not allowed in the prison for that purpose.

4421. They have the power of rejecting bad work, I suppose?—Yes, they have that power. At one time the foremen of contractors superintended mat making at Coldbath Fields, Holloway, Wandsworth, and Kirkdale, and rug making at Stafford; but this was the utmost to which it was permitted.

4422. Then recently you have had a long struggle?—Yes, to cope with the troubles we have met with it may be said to have been one long struggle in connexion with the crisis in regard to prison labour, which arose from causes over which the Prison Commissioners had no control; for instance, the stoppage of mat making, the breakdown of oakum picking, and the complaints of outside workmen.

4423. Although you have been in a special department of the prison service, yet from your long experience you probably have formed ideas on various prison questions. I should like to know what you think of this question of productive labour as bearing upon the prisoners themselves?—Well, for myself I have a great belief in the reformatory influence of productive labour. I hold with the late Frederick Hill that it is the very life of a good prison, and I would advocate its extension wherever possible.

4424. I do not want to press you on any of these points if you do not wish to answer them; but you do not make any exception in the case of associated labour. Would you think that the advantages of associated labour are so great that you would be ready to run some risk of freer communication taking place between prisoners?—Yes, I never attach very much importance to the strict preservation of isolation in regard to the work of prisons.

4425. Do you think it is of the utmost importance to extend industrial labour to all classes of prisoners subject to the necessary discipline of the prison being carried on?—Discipline first, trade immediately afterwards.

4426. Then do you approve of the present form which hard labour takes in the treadwheel, in the mill, the grinding of corn, and so forth?—Well, in the abstract, no; but I hardly see at present what substitute could be found for it.

4427. Of course some substitute would have to be found if they were abolished, but if some productive industry could be found you would not object to it?—I would be strongly in favour of it.

4428. Would you think that oakum picking is not a form of employment which is good for prisoners?—I think not. I think it should be strictly confined to penal purposes.

4429. For what reason?—Well, it is looked upon as a degrading kind of occupation by the prisoners, and as bearing the label of degradation. It is accepted in that light.

4430. When you were in the prisons officially connected with Pentonville was it your duty to supply the prisoners with the raw material?—Not my own personal duty.

4431. But it was in your department?—Yes.

4432. And so you had the opportunity of seeing which particular industry the prisoners would like?—Yes, I would hear of it more through the officer who was personally connected with them.

4433. (Mr. O'Connor.) Would it be the warder or the storekeeper?—That would be the warder.

4434. (Chairman.) But a substitute for oakum picking has not been discovered?—No. I know that at Wakefield Prison a reward was once offered for any suitable substitute for oakum picking, but without success. It is one of those things we are constantly looking out for.

4435. With regard to the establishment of workshops with the necessary instructing officers in them, that would mean considerable expense if you were to extend such as exist now?—Yes, you would have to make up your mind to that.

4436. You might save the Government a certain amount of money in making clothes and boots for the army and navy, but still it would not pay itself?—I am not sure of that. I think that the pace might be so increased that if it would not pay itself it would largely do so.

4437. I suppose a certain expense is saved by making use of prison labour for pumping and grinding corn?—Yes.

4438. But that labour might be more profitably employed?—Yes.

4439. Able-bodied men might be more profitably employed than by turning a crank?—Yes.

4440. With regard to the instructing officers, have you any suggestions to make with regard to making them more fully qualified or making them more anxious to qualify themselves?—Well, I think if an active industrial programme is to be entered upon (and that I believe to be the wish of the Committee), the prisoners should be as far as possible systematically trained in suitable handicrafts in the selection of which the experience of American and Continental prisons might afford some guidance. But of course in America and on the Continent the circumstances are somewhat different. It is impossible to do this at present with any approach to efficiency. There are hardly any instructors, and there is not a sufficiency of suitable workshops. The material increase of both these would be essentially necessary as a first step. As regards workshops, perhaps that at Wandsworth might be taken as a model. At Pentonville, Lewes, Maidstone, Chelmsford, and Wormwood Scrubs prisons they have also shops of some size, though some of them would need alterations. Liverpool has also a large shop occupied by twine spinners. Many other workshops of a similar sort are scattered over the service, but they likewise would require alteration in many instances.

4441. Then, with regard to the qualification necessary for Governors and instructing officers and warders?—That is a point perhaps that I am hardly capable of expressing an opinion upon that would be of much advantage to you.

4442. I suppose in general terms you would say the more a Governor knew about trade, and the more aptitude he had for informing himself about manufactures, probably the better it would be?—Yes.

4443. He would take a keener interest in supervising the prison industries?—Yes.

4444. Then, with regard to the officers who would act as industrial instructors, I understand that at present they are not paid more than ordinary warders?—That is so, with a few exceptions.

4445. And it is a matter of some luck whether or no you get hold of a properly qualified warder?—Yes, he is a great catch.

4446. Do you think there should be some addition to their salary in order to attract them?—Do you mean the ordinary staff or the instructing staff?

4447. I mean the instructing officer?—I would have the instructing officers well paid. I would have an officer of skill paid at a fairly remunerative rate. I would make his position one to be coveted by the ordinary rank and file of the prison, so that you might get the ordinary warder taking an interest in the trade with a view to rise into the superior position. When an instructing officer leaves the prison on a holiday or from ill-health, one of the rank and file ought to be ready and willing to jump into his place, with the view of showing that he could do the duties, and with an eye also to reaching that post himself afterwards.

4448. Then in order to get a higher degree of skill among the prisoners, and also to extend to them a greater number of skilled industries, it would be necessary or advisable at least to have a somewhat different classification of the prisoners?—Yes.

Mr. J Duncan

5 Nov. 1894.

4449. That is to say, the long-term prisoners would be the men who would be naturally trained the most readily for the more skilled industries?—Yes.

4450. And you would have to have them together?—Concentrated in convenient prisons.

4451. And the short-term prisoners you would have to give odds and ends, which they could readily do without much trouble?—Yes.

4452. And for them agriculture and gardening would be good?—Yes.

4453. Is mat making an industry which a man in for a month could pick up?—Yes, seven or eight days would be quite enough to make a man a mat maker. I refer to common door mats made in a frame, not to loom-made mats, which would require a longer apprenticeship.

4454. There is nothing to be done in the way of mat making I think you said for the Government?—I believe we are doing all the mat making that is required for the Government. It is not a very big thing.

4455. (Sir Algernon West.) I should have thought it was a big thing?—I do not think so.

4456. (Chairman.) We have mats used in the dockyards and on ships?—Yes, we supply them.

4457. You supply them all?—Yes, I believe we supply the whole of them. I do not speak positively, but I know we are constantly at the service of the Admiralty, and we make considerable quantities for them.

4458. (Sir Algernon West.) There are only 106 prisoners employed at it?—Yes.

4459. (Chairman.) Would you give your opinion to the Committee as to the giving of trade gratuities to prisoners?—Yes. In order to stimulate the prisoners to industry and to encourage them to take a healthy interest in their work it would be advisable, I think, to revive the old practice of awarding special gratuities on a carefully considered scale to prisoners who had performed a definite quantity of work in excess of the authorised tasks. The amount need not be large. It is not intended that the present system of paying gratuities should be disturbed. These latter are not sufficiently connected with industrial assiduity to subserve the object in view. They are attainable by any prisoner who conducts himself well, though he may in no way exceed the minimum task. Besides, a prisoner can earn his 10*s.* in the first seven months, and he has no special inducement to exertion after that.

4460. But just on that point, as was pointed out by a witness this afternoon, if you gave these gratuities, then in fairness to the prisoners they ought to be in the same position, and there are a certain number of prisoners who cannot be employed productively, and therefore who would have no opportunity of earning this gratuity, which would not be fair?—That is a fair enough remark to make from one point of view, but if you are to develop trade you must have an eye upon the prisoners who can do the work for you. It is solely a trade reward.

4461. I suppose the prisoners do not do more work than they can help?—No, I think not.

4462. Have you any statistics to lay before us with regard to prisoners who are suitable for trades?—Well, at present we are only able to undertake the simpler class of work for the Government departments. With a sufficient number of skilled prisoners who would be available under the circumstances, we could unquestionably extend our operations in this field. It must be distinctly remembered (to take the figures I have laid before you) that after deducting the large body of prisoners on first class hard labour (3,825), the non-effectives (3,261) and those engaged on domestic service (2,450) there would only remain about 35 per cent., or 5,077, of the total population to work upon; and of these a large number would be necessarily of sentences so short as to preclude the idea of their being taught any trade; while a further large number (3,004) it is already found possible to employ, although not to the full extent at more or less profitable work on manufactures or buildings. Even thus, however, the financial, not to speak of the moral possibilities are not insignificant. Every increase of 1*l.* per prisoner per annum in the average earnings would mean 3,000*l.* or 4,000*l.* a year saved to the Exchequer, excluding of course, the cost of instruction.

4463. I think you have told us in what direction you would extend work in government offices?—Yes, that is so.

4464. Do you think on the whole that really there is enough worth in government departments to occupy the whole strength of the prison labour?—I think it is extremely likely that it would be found that that is so if you would give the facilities for instructing prisoners in workshops in which they can produce the articles that are required.

4465. Have you got the acreage under cultivation connected with prisons?—Yes, I think so. You mean the gardens?

4466. Yes?—The total acreage in the local prisons is 43 acres 1 rood 35 poles.

4467. (Mr. O'Connor.) How much do you put down for Canterbury in that?—1 acre 2 roods.

4468. (Chairman.) Then there are a great many prisons with none at all?—Yes, 38 out of 56 I think have gardens: that leaves 18 that have none, that is, none under cultivation. I cannot tell you whether any of them might be cultivated, but it is possible it may be so.

4469. Have you had experience in convict prisons?—Yes.

4470. Have you any view to express with regard to them in particular?—Do you mean as regards their industries?

4471. Yes?—The work of a convict prison is mainly devoted to quarrying and the cultivation of land. It is to some extent however applied to industrial employments, such as shoe making, tailoring, sack making, and so on. There are about 700 convicts in convict prisons employed on work for the governments departments whose work might be found handy in the local prisons if work on the quarries, and so on, could be found for the convicts.

4472. What work are you alluding to?—The making of hammocks, coal sacks, and that class of thing for the Admiralty. There is a good deal of the Government departmental work done in the convict prisons as well as in the local prisons. That class of work could, with the improved facilities I have referred to, be done in the local prisons quite as easily if work could be found out of doors for the convicts.

4473. With regard to this question of mat making, do you imagine that the manufacture of mats in the prison had any harmful effect upon other manufacture outside in England?—I hardly think so.

4474. Is not it the fact that when the prisons first undertook the manufacture of mats there was no mat-making industry to speak of in England?—No it was practically a prison industry.

4475. So that the mat-making industry grew up alongside the prison industry?—That was so.

4476. And that in face of both the prison industry and the outside industry the importation of foreign-made mats has been increasing?—It has; so I have been told by manufacturers outside.

4477. (Sir Algernon West.) In the time of which you told us when Preston and Wakefield were the first employers of labour, was there an instance of any gaol actually being so supported?—I do not think so. I do not think there has ever been that in this country.

4478. What I want to arrive at is this: you said there was possibly some difficulty in finding employment in the Government department for all the prisoners that can be employed, supposing there were no other difficulty?—Yes.

4479. But it would be a very small addition, would not it, because you have got to take from the prisoners you could employ in remunerative labour those that are now so employed, and prisoners employed on domestic service, and the sick; and, therefore, it only comes to a few thousands?—That is so. I am glad you have noticed that point. I want you to realise the small margin there is to work upon. It means first of all that you will increase the pace of the present workers; that the 3,000 workers now working on trades will be instructed and will do a larger amount of work; and that of the 2073 oakum pickers who are first on my list under the second class hard labour a proportion will be taken to industrial employments, and that is the whole thing.

4480. And therefore you would be able to tell us probably almost the exact figures that could be employed in industrial labour?—Well, I have given it.

4481. It comes to something very small?—It is not very large.

4482. I ascertained from this valuable paper you have given us that there are 32 trades which are useful trades to be followed by prisoners?—Yes.

4483. If you divide the surplus prisoners into 32, you would give to each trade a very small addition?—Yes.

4484. Now I should very much like to have this, and I daresay you will do this for us; for instance, take the tailors and see how many would be available for tailoring; then divide all those trades as you have divided them, if you like, and then from the census returns show us how many people are employed in England upon those trades. I take it that you will find out that the competition would not amount to a half per cent. I am putting it roughly, but I expect it will be so small that any agitation against it would break down from the mere absurdity of it. Will you kindly give me that?—I find that if you were to employ on the productive work that we do have orders for the prisoners now engaged on unproductive labour, and treat each prisoner as equal to a free workman, you would only add to interference with outside labour in the proportion of 1 to 2,500.

4485. You have given us the history of why mat-making was abolished in prisons, and we are told it was abolished in consequence of the mat-making being given to one firm by Government?—That was not quite the case. The fact is there were 24 prisons at which mat-making was let out to contract, and there were 15 contractors.

4486. (Miss Orme.) You mentioned wood-chopping as an industry instead of oakum-picking?—Yes.

4487. Where wood-chopping is carried on how do you get rid of it—how do you sell it?—Formerly people used to come to the prison for it, or we had an arrangement to take it to their houses; but of late that has very much disappeared, and we now do it either by way of contract with a particular firm, or we supply some two or three leading merchants in the town. We do not care about doing a chandler's shop kind of business. People of all sorts might come into the prison, and it would be objectionable.

4488. In York, for instance, there is one agent who takes it?—Yes.

4489. He is an old pensioner?—Yes.

4490. He has not got rid of it, so that there is a lock. Is there any means of improving the market from the centre?—I was not aware there was any difficulty, or I daresay I should have taken it up.

4491. But in a case like that you could help them from the centre?—Yes.

4492. They are not left entirely to their own resources?—No.

4493. Was it not the case that before 1877 the warders could, if they chose, have their boots and sometimes their clothes made by prisoners?—That was so.

4494. Would not that account for the lower figures for tailoring and shoe-making?—To some extent.

4495. Should you see objections to that now?—The objections to that were rather disciplinary objections. It was thought it led in some instances to irregularities, and it was done away with.

4496. What do you think is the most profitable industry for women who are in for some time?—Laundry work.

4497. Is it more profitable for the prisons than tailoring?—It is the most profitable work that I know of. At Strangeways we made something like 20*l.* a head by it last year.

4498. What do you think they could make at tailoring if they were instructed as they were at Woking?—It is very difficult to say. I should regard 12*l.* a year as very good, but it is difficult to say.

4499. What is the cost, do you think, of each prisoner in an ordinary prison?—It is set down by the Commissioners in their last report at 23*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.*

4500. Is that for a woman?—No, that is for a prisoner, male or female.

4501. So that it would be lower probably for a woman where you have them congregated together?—Yes.

4502. Then if they could be employed on laundry works during sentences of two or three years they would be almost self-supporting?—Yes.

4503. For instance, these women who now receive very short sentences for drunkenness, if they were put into a special prison for two or three years, and could get a sufficient supply of laundry work, would make it almost self-supporting?—Yes, it would come nearer to it than anything I know of at present.

4504. With regard to the question of giving gratuities for good work, I suppose you could get over the difficulty of unfairness in the case of prisoners engaged in domestic service by giving some special re ard if it is well done?—Yes.

4505. That difficulty could be got over?—Yes.

4506. You said you objected to oakum picking because there is a certain disgrace attached to it?—Yes.

4507. Do not you think if any industry were used very largely in prisons that exactly the same feeling would come up about it?—Yes; probably that is why oakum picking has come to bear the character it has.

4508. So that any unskilled industry like that of wood-chopping would create just the same feeling after a time?—Yes.

4509. (Mr. O'Connor.) I have been looking at this book of yours, of which I have heard a great deal that is laudatory before. I should like to have one or two points cleared up in it. First of all, do you charge the same to the British Government as you do to a Colonial Government for articles sold in prisons?—Not quite.

4510. In the one case you include the value of the labour and in the other you do not?—Yes, that is so.

4511. Supposing you are selling any article to a Colonial Government, what proportion do you add to the price charged to the British Government as representing labour?—I think it is 17½ per cent., but I cannot tell the sum off-hand.

4512. It is an agreed per-centage?—Yes.

4513. Of 17½ per cent.?—Yes, I think that is the amount; at all events, we are able to respect the principle you are speaking of. I now remember the per-centage is 12½.

4514. I only want to get the proportion which, in your case, labour figured for, and that is about it?—Yes.

4515. I see in dealing with outside customers you give credit for a month to some people?—Yes.

4516. And in respect of certain articles?—Yes.

4517. But no credit is to be given on oakum transactions?—That seems a little hard, but we had our fingers burnt very smartly some years ago.

4518. It arises from a casual market?—Yes, and other things.

4519. I see in paragraph 800 of this book you say: "That a return of labour is to be furnished "annually and the daily number of prisoners, male "and female, employed during the year." You give the value of the labour of each industry?—Yes.

4520. And in the next paragraph, "The numbers "employed will be obtained from an employment

Mr. J. Duncan.

5 Nov. 1894.

"book, and the value of the labour will be arrived "at in strict accordance with the special regulations "on the subject issued by the Board." Can you give us the special regulations with regard to the value of labour?—I have not got them here.

4521. Perhaps you will put that in?—Yes.

4522. Are those special regulations of old standing or are they quite new?—I suppose they date back to 1879, probably just after the Commissioners took charge. Then there may be perhaps new industries, in regard to which special regulations of value have not yet been issued. That may be, but these regulations lay down a principle. I may mention that the question of valuation of labour has been for some time under consideration.

4523. We will have the regulations put in?—Yes (see Appendix IV.).

4524. Then you see under paragraphs 113 and 114 "the scale of tasks is to be duly enforced in "conformity with the special regulations on the "subject." Can you put in the special regulations with regard to task work?—Yes (see Appendix IV.).

4525. There, again, when was that scale of tasks devised?—It was probably 10 or 12 years ago.

4526. And there may possibly now be some fresh industries to which they do not apply?—Yes.

4527. In superintending the industry in a prison who is it that checks the tasks and sees what is done or is not done by each particular prisoner?—The officer of the wards.

4528. In these new industries to which the scale of tasks we have been talking about does not extend, how is he to know whether the standard has been reached?—In these cases we supply the task. When we start a new industry we supply the task.

4529. What is the scale in hammock making?—I cannot tell you off-hand. You will not find Admiralty hammock making in our task scale at all, because it is not done in local prisons.

4530. We have been told it is done at Wandsworth?—It is a convict prison industry.

4531. Yes, here it is at Wandsworth, "Hammock makers, 2,338*l.*"?—Yes, it is in the 1893–4 report. I had forgotten it was done at Wandsworth up to the end of 1893. It has been introduced into the local prisons within the last year or two, and I had forgotten it.

4532. I want to know this. If a man under whom prisoners are doing work in the matter of hammock making has no scale of task, (and I understand there is no scale yet settled with regard to this hammock making,) how are they to be able to report that the man has not done a fair amount of work. What protection is there for the prisoner against an unjust warder?—If there was no scale there would be no hardship on the prisoner. If the officer has no scale to go by he could not oppress a prisoner.

4533. But supposing he said the prisoner had not done a fair amount of work, the prisoner would have no standard to appeal to, and would have no protection?—I am not sure whether this hammock making is in the scale.

4534. I only take that as an illustration, but I understand there are several industries which have not come under the terms of these?—With regard to hammock making that used to be entirely done in the convict prisons like all the Admiralty industries.

4535. I am speaking according to the last report?—In the last year or two we have been gradually taking them from the convict prisons and giving them to the local prisons.

4536. Have you ever, as storekeeper, taken the trouble to add up the totals shown in respect of the several prisons and the value of the prisoners' labour?—Yes.

4537. Am I right in saying it comes to something like 117,000*l.*?—It is something like that.

4538. Can you explain shortly what is the system under which you value it?—You get it in the Special Regulations.

4539. It would be as well to wait for that?—Yes.

4540. The value of a cook for prisoners I see is put at 30*l.* a year?—Roughly I may say that the system in vogue in the valuation of labour of local prisons, is a system of per diem rates.

4541. In Derby there are two cooks for the prisoners, and they figure for 60*l.*?—Yes, a cook is valued at so much per day; it is a fixed rate; that is the principle of it.

4542. Do you prepare the estimate for the prisoners' food?—No. The financial estimates are prepared in the Accountant's Department, not in mine.

4543. Are you concerned with a portion of it?—Well, with the stores, I should be consulted.

4544. But do not the storekeepers pay the wages of the prison officials?—Yes.

4545. Can you tell me how many warders for whom pay is taken in the estimates do not exist?—That would not come under my cognizance.

4546. The number of prisons has been diminished?—Yes.

4547. With each diminution in the number of prisons you have upon your hands a certain clerical staff as well as warder staff?—Yes.

4548. They have certain claims in respect of pension and promotion?—Yes.

4549. With a continued diminution in the number of prisoners, and in the number of prisons, will not your establishment, disciplinary and clerical, get more adjusted?—Well, we absorb what are called the redundant officers of the abolished prisons.

4550. But the natural diminution of the civil staff would not be at anything like the same rate as that at which prisons have diminished. Since 1877 they have gone down, I think, from 114 to about 57, or 50 per cent.?—Yes.

4551. Now the annual depletion of the civil staff would not proceed at that rate?—Not quite.

4552. And therefore you must have a continual process of congestion going on blocking promotion?—Yes, I see the point.

4553. You have not considered that yet?—No, I did not quite follow the point of your question for the moment.

4554. But now you see it?—Yes.

4555. It is an inevitable consequence of the present state of things that you should have a staff whose prospects would be more and more interfered with, and an establishment getting more and more congested?—Yes, unfortunately that is so.

The proceedings were adjourned until Friday, November 9th, at 12 o'clock

TENTH DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Friday, 9th November 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN).

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.
Sir JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
Miss ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Mr. CHARLES HALL called and examined.

Mr. C. Hall.

9 Nov. 1894.

4556. (Chairman.) What is your office now in the prison service?—I rank as a first class clerk at Lewes, acting as storekeeper.

4557. How long have you been at Lewes?—Nearly 24 years.

4558. Is that a large prison?—No, it is a very moderate one. There is an average now of about 210 to 220 prisoners, but in the days of the county there were over 300.

4559. Then you have been at Lewes during what period?—From December 1870.

4560. When you first joined the service?—Yes.

4561. Will you give to the Committee a general statement of your duties?—Practically I have the control of the clerical and financial and industrial accounts, the preparation of all estimates, the checking of bills and accounts, the general superintendence of the whole of the criminal work, under the governor's direction, the supervision and examination of all materials connected with the building department, but I may say that that is perhaps more according to the letter of the law than the spirit. It is not exactly insisted upon although it is laid down in my instructions that I am to do so.

4562. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) I suppose you look after the clerk of the works?—Yes, a little bit.

4563. He does the checking, and you look after him?—That is it. I am responsible for the preparation of all the annual returns for the Home Office, the inventories, profit and loss accounts, abstracts of receipts and expenditure, and, I may say, statistics generally.

4564. (Chairman.) Then you have had a large experience, of course, in connexion with prison industry?—I have had it, I may say, entirely under my control, subject to the governor's direction, since the year 1873.

4565. Before the transfer Lewes did a very considerable amount of industrial work, I think?—Yes, we held a position of some importance in the industrial world in those days, so far as prisons were concerned.

4566. Perhaps you would tell us briefly the effect of the transfer, and also the recent events in connexion with prison industries, from your experience at Lewes?—There has been very little difference in the character of the work that we carry on, but it has been very considerably reduced; for instance, I may say that under the late authority we employed from 40 to 50 men at mat-making, and our average profits were something like 1,000*l.* a year.

4567. From that industry alone?—From that industry alone. Perhaps it would not be a bad plan for me to show you a profit and loss account and the balance sheet for the year 1878, which I have here. It is the final report of the late authorities in connexion with that question, and you will see the figures at the end. You will see by that that the profits averaged nearly 1,000*l.* a year, or something like 20*l.* per head. In the present day, of course, we are simply employing a few men at mat-making for Government departments. Probably not more than 10 or 12 are actually employed at mat-making, and perhaps another 8 or 10 in assisting them.

4568. Then the transfer itself did not have any special effect on the prison industry?—No; there has been a gradual reduction.

4569. From the agitation which arose against it?—That is so.

4570. Perhaps you could hand in to the Committee, and if you have not got it perhaps you could let us have it—a short statement showing the change as between, say, 1873 and 1896?—Yes, I could write that out for you better than I can describe it perhaps.

4571. You will let us have those figures?—Yes (see Appendix IV.).

4572. I gather that you still continue to deal with it on a modified scale?—Yes.

4573. There are, I see, 86 engaged as pickers of coil rope and wool?—We are exceptionally badly situated with regard to that. The cost of carriage is very heavy, and we have no labour at present that we can substitute for it, and being close to several very large sea-side towns, we get a considerable per-centage of very short sentence prisoners whom it is impossible to put to any other work.

4574. Who would naturally have been put to mat making in the old days, I suppose?—In the olden days, I am speaking of—before 1877, the number of short-sentence prisoners was nothing like so great as it is now. We were able to put many a man to a trade in those days whom we are obliged now either to put to oakum picking or some very trifling work. We have no opportunity of teaching them anything.

4575. I suppose a short sentence prisoner could be made use of in connexion with mat making. It is an industry which is very quickly learned?—From a practical experience I should not think of putting a man to mat making under a two or three months' sentence. That is a view which I know is not shared by everybody, but I have had a great deal of experience in that, and I know that great damage is caused by men who are put at it with such very short sentences.

4576. Have you any suggestions to make with regard to short sentence prisoners. What kind of work is really suited to them?—Some years ago we were employed by the Admiralty to make coal sacks. Why it was left off I am not able to say, but I think work of that character is far more suitable to short sentence prisoners than mat making. It is work which is very readily picked up, and it is very seldom that a man can do much injury unless he does it wilfully.

4577. Has that industry been taken away from the prisons altogether?—That has been taken away from us for some years. I do not know why.

4578. But has it been taken away from prisons generally?—I cannot say. I think sack making altogether is an industry that might be very largely extended, although it is not a particularly profitable one.

4579. Have you any other employment in your mind?—Firewood chopping is work which we have carried on I may say ever since I have been in the prison service, and we had a very considerable quantity of it. That is splitting the firewood up into small bundles and selling them to retailers in the neighbourhood.

4580. Has not there been some complaint about that?—No, we have had no complaint I think. It is a very minor industry, and is not likely to meet with any opposition. I think it would be often profitable, cleanly, and easily picked up, and work that could be done by anybody.

4581. Could Lewes be made a centre for that?—It could be largely increased at Lewes unquestionably. Of course if it were increased it may be said we should require increased facilities to carry it out. At present we do it by carts and waggons coming to the prison. It might be a question whether we should not dispose of it ourselves by sending out vehicles and men to get rid of it. At the present time everyone comes to the prison for what they want.

4582. Have you any workshops?—Not for firewood chopping. That is done in the cells, but we have a very large mat factory.

4583. Do you say wood chopping is done in the cells?—Yes.

4584. Where the prisoners sleep?—No; there are a few vacant cells allotted to this purpose. We have lately had a great many empty cells.

4585. Then you have a workshop?—Yes.

4586. What kind of workshop is this?—It is a workshop where we formerly employed about 50 mat makers. There is a gallery which runs through the centre, and on each side there are what we call boxes, very similar to cells, without a roof. Each of these boxes contain a loom or a frame, and the men work there under the superintendence of the instructor or warder in charge of the place, who walks along the centre gallery and sees every one underneath him on the right and left. It is an excellent arrangement, and one which was adopted, I may say practically made, under the instructions and direction of Captain Helby, the present Governor of Wandsworth.

4587. I suppose it was Captain Helby who introduced that?—That is so, and it is an excellent arrangement, because it enabled the man in charge to see everything that was going on, and it was a sort of half-way arrangement between cellular work and association.

4588. I see in this statement of account you have given me that the use of cells for industrial labour is condemned?—That was probably what gave rise to the building of this workshop.

4589. But if you wanted to develop this wood-splitting industry would you prefer to have a workshop?—Yes; at Lewes especially it could be made, because we have plenty of spare room.

4590. Have you had much opportunity of observing the prisoners at work?—Yes. They have been, to a certain extent, under my charge; not actually, but I have been amongst them, and I know what they are doing and how they are doing it; and I had control of the men who are really looking after them.

4591. Do you think association under proper supervision leads to any mischievous results?—Not under proper supervision. It depends a very great deal upon the officers in charge, but I see no reason why it should if it were properly carried out.

4592. From your experience do the prisoners prefer it to cellular labour?—Yes, I think I may say that very emphatically.

4593. Do you think it is good for them?—I think so. I do not like a man working in his cell from morning till night.

4594. Do they ever complain about solitary work?—Perhaps not so much in that way, but they complain of the dust and grit which accumulates from the work. I had many complaints years ago on that score.

4595. In the cells?—Yes, it is a very confined space for a man to be at work in all day, particularly with regard to the mat making. It would not be so with sack making, but in mat making and firewood chopping it is especially so.

4596. How many hours a day would they be at these industries in the cells—six hours?—In the cells you might go for over seven hours; in the workshops it would not be quite so much.

4597. Do you find difficulty in getting warders of sufficient technical experience to teach?—That is a very difficult matter altogether. At the present moment we are feeling it, especially as the only man we have who knows anything at all about the work is on sick leave and consequently we are practically standing still.

4598. What is he?—He is a man who has been taught by a professional instructor.

4599. What trade is he?—A mat maker.

4600. Then you have no skilled instructor at all?—No, this man has a general knowledge of it; he gets along very well, but he certainly is not competent to teach any one else to take his place or scarcely so.

4601. I suppose you have about 10 or 12 warders?—We have 19 uniformed officers all told. That would leave us about 14 or 15 warders altogether.

4602. Do warders seem to prefer to be associated with the industrial work of the prisons?—No.

4603. They look upon it as an extra duty?—It is an extra duty which under the county authorities they were paid for; that, of course, is abolished.

4604. Under the county they were paid by results, were not they?—Their salaries were raised on the distinct understanding that they were to give special attention to the industrial work. That was laid down at one of the Quarter Sessions. They were to receive an additional salary on the understanding that they did the best they could to improve the industrial labour in the prison.

4605. Were the salaries reduced?—No, the salaries were raised, but I do not think we have an officer in the prison at all now who has been on that scale.

4606. (Sir Algernon West.) But the extra payment for being able to instruct was taken away from the warders?—Nothing was taken away from them, but those on the new scale of course have not had that taken into consideration at all.

4607. (Chairman.) There was a special scale under the old principle?—Yes.

4608. And there is no qualification for that scale now?—Not at all. I believe 12*l.* a year is given for what is called an artisan warder, but that is only in special cases where a man has shown some marked skill—in building, for instance.

4609. Where a man has had some special training for it?—Yes; that is done in the case of the hospital warder also sometimes. There are other cases where that is done, but in our case it is not given to the mat maker.

4610. If there were sufficient inducement given, would it be possible to instruct the existing staff of warders sufficiently in different trades?—Not unless you had a special man from the outside, a skilled instructor. We had two men from Deeds, I think it was in Oxford Street, one of the large mat makers. We had two professional men, one who received 100*l.* a year and the other 80*l.* a year. Those men are both gone and we have no one to take their places. My opinion is that you will never teach mat making in a prison thoroughly, and never have the work properly done unless these men, or men like them, are re-introduced.

4611. That I take it is one of the main difficulties in developing prison industries?—I think so.

4612. Then perhaps a second, and almost a greater one, arises from the fact that you have so many short sentence men?—Yes. I have an average here which, perhaps, will give you some little idea of it. The average for the four months ending the 31st of October last was 33 per cent. of one month and under. There was one man out of every three who came into the prison who received a sentence of less than one month, and for three months' sentences the average was 50 per cent. for the four months ending on the 31st of October last.

4613. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Is that the present or the old average?—That is the average for the four months ending on the 31st of last month.

4614. (Chairman.) Have you thought out any plan by which this difficulty arising from the short sentences may be met?—Not as long as that continues, unless we can introduce some class of labour which requires very little skill, very little attention, and that is specially easily done, such as sack making and fire-wood chopping.

4615. I suppose you would say the more you could concentrate prisoners with long sentences on the one side, and short sentence prisoners on the other, the greater facilities you would have to arrange suitable work for them?—That would be very much better unquestionably, but that involves another question altogether which is a matter, I suppose, the Commissioners would deal with. You see, in Lewes, we are practically the only prison for the county, and we have to take them as they come. We have no means of sifting ours in any way.

4616. I understand that. Now, what do you find, as a general rule, as to the quality of the work? What sort of work does a prisoner turn out? Is it indifferent work?—No; my note is that, generally, in the trades with which I am most intimately acquainted, after a certain period of probation, the quality of the work (especially in mat making) is equal to, if not superior to, that of many professional mat makers, and I have had many opportunities of judging of that, and talking matters over with people who thoroughly understand it.

4617. Do you think that would be the opinion of the Government departments which are supplied with the mats?—I can hardly say that. That is rather a difficult question to answer. The principal defect in the prison work is its finish. The foundation of the work may be just as good, and the whole of the work in itself may be just as good, but it lacks a certain finish which a manufacturer is able to give to it, and I think that to a certain extent spoils the market. If we could have some little machinery at times to put the same polish and finish on the work that is done by the outside manufacturer, I think we could compete, in mat making at any rate, with anyone.

4618. At any rate, you can answer for the soundness of the material and the strength of the work?—That is so, and I have found, in every case in which I have been asked to give an opinion, that the work itself is quite as good as any you get from the large manufacturers.

4619. It has been represented to me that one difficulty in the way of giving orders to prisons is the irregularity of the supply?—That has been a sore point ever since I have known anything about it; not particularly in my case, because we were pretty well situated; but I know in some prisons where the numbers fluctuated frequently and largely, it was a great difficulty and one they could not get over. Now it is got over by the fact that if one prison cannot supply another can.

4620. But could not that be overcome by a system of storekeeping?—Yes, a system something after the clearing-house style of having a general depôt where those goods could be sent.

4621. There is nothing of the kind now?—There is nothing of the kind now; each prison has to stand by itself.

4622. But if you kept a sufficient supply of the material, likely to be ordered by the Government, in stock, that difficulty as to irregularity of supply could be altogether overcome?—I think so. Subject to that depôt being established, some arrangement of the sort might be carried out. Then you want a man who is thoroughly acquainted with this work if you are going to deal with private persons as well; and I suppose you do not confine your question entirely to Government departments.

4623. No?—I think if you are dealing with private people it wants someone to go to these different prisons at times and examine the work. It should not be left just to the clerical staff of the prison and one or two instructors. There should be an efficient and skilled man, who should go about and examine the work, and reject it if necessary, before it is sent out. The great difficulty is that many things are sent away to the dockyards and arsenals, and they come back simply because the people do not understand the quality that is required.

4624. That arises from the fact that your staff is not sufficiently skilled?—It is not sufficiently qualified for the work, but if there were some person appointed who could make it part of his duty to occasionally visit the prisons and look at the work, and give them some sound advice as to how it is carried on, I think this system of rejecting work would be avoided.

4625. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Is there a great quantity of work rejected?—I think there is a great deal too much. I do not think it amounts to much, but it amounts to more than it should do if it were looked after.

4626. (Mr. O'Connor.) Is not there a pattern article supplied?—Yes, a pattern is sent with all orders.

4627. (Chairman.) In all trades there is a liability to have articles rejected?—Yes, but my contention is that they should be rejected before all this cost of carriage is involved if it can be done.

4628. Still, of course, it is natural that there should be a certain small per-centage of rejections, because that is inevitable in the best managed concern?—Yes, you cannot help that of course.

4629. Do you find that prisoners who are skilled artisans, for whom no work such as they have been accustomed to can be supplied in the prison, are apt to forget their work?—You mean their own labour?

4630. Yes?—Well, I have hardly had any opportunity of judging of that, because when they go out I know very little about them.

4631. But supposing a skilled artisan—a man whose work made it necessary he should be in something like constant practice to secure proficiency—came under a sentence of a year or 18 months and there was no opportunity of giving him the work he was accustomed to, then at the end of 18 months I suppose that man would go out unfit for his work?—He must inevitably lose some of his skill for want of practice; for instance take a watch and clock maker, or any industry of that kind, he must necessarily lose some practice; but to what extent I do not know and whether he would be able to take it up again very readily I cannot say.

4632. You would agree as a general principle that it is desirable, wherever it is possible, to employ the prisoners on the trade to which they have been accustomed?—Certainly, I think so.

4633. Would you say that agriculture and gardening are good occupations for prisoners?—Yes, that is rather a strong point. We are in an agricultural district and we have a good many opportunities of seeing the class of work that would be suitable there.

4634. Have you land attached to your prison at Lewes?—Yes, we have about 4½ acres.

4635. How is that cultivated?—We supply the prison entirely with vegetables. It is quite an unusual thing for us to have to buy anything of that kind. Our vegetables are supplied entirely from the seed we purchase in the spring. We cultivate the ground and supply ourselves; and occasionally we are able to send small quantities to London.

Mr. C. Hall.

9 Nov. 1894.

4636. How many men does that occupy?—I have not the figures.

4637. Of gardeners I see you have got three and a fraction?—That would probably be about it—three or four, but I think it quite advisable that that should be largely increased, because there are many prisons, of course, with no ground at all, which could be supplied from Lewes very largely with vegetables that will not hurt in transit, and probably will keep very well when they get them.

4638. (Sir J. E. Dorington). Do you mean that your land is not fully cultivated at present?—No, but we might possibly increase the area of ground because there is a large quantity of ground round us, close to the Downs, if it could be purchased; in fact the four acres I am speaking of we purchased some four or five years ago for that very purpose.

4639. (Chairman. Have you anything in the nature of a garden? You only grow vegetables I understand?—Only vegetables.

4640. You do not grow flowers?—No, very little at any rate.

4641. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Who is the farmer, are you the farmer?—No, I think the governor takes that under his special care. Of course all the produce has to come through my hands in the way of book-keeping.

4642. But who directs what shall be grown?—The governor himself, but that is not a difficult matter, because our books shew exactly what we require in the way of potatoes, carrots, onions and that sort of thing, and we have simply to lay the ground out another year accordingly: but I more particularly allude to the fact that I think it might be increased by supplying London prisons instead of their being supplied by contractors, if the cost of carriage would not be too excessive.

4643. (Chairman.) At any rate you think that the kind of labour required is very good for the prisoners?—And particularly short sentence ones, especially if you do away with the necessity of shutting up these men for the first 28 days of their sentence. If they could be allowed out into the garden to work, there would be a very great deal more work done.

4644. Do you think that the class of warders that you get now is of sufficiently good status for the work, speaking generally?—Do you mean as compared with those we had under the old authority.

4645. Well, how do they stand as compared with them?—Well, I think that they hardly come up to the standard of the old warders, perhaps there is not a very great difference but I should say that the old standard was rather higher than the present one.

4646. I suppose you would say that it is important to have as high a class of men as warders as you could get?—I think so and especially men of good character. I think that is a very great point. Many men that we get, of course, come from the army with the kind of stereotyped character they get, and I think if that could be rather more closely looked into it would be better.

4647. I think you have had an opportunity of seeing the evidence that Mr. Duncan gave?—I have.

4648. Have you any remark to make?—No; I think, taking it on the whole, it expreses my opinion, with the exception that I think I noticed the remark that mat making could be taught in eight days, or something to that effect. I think it is either a mistake, or at any rate, I do not agree with it.

4649. (Chairman.) You say that it is an industry that a man should be not less than three months at?—Not less than three months. I should not think of putting it to him if he were sentenced to less than three months.

4650. With that exception you agree with Mr. Duncan?—Yes, as far as my experience at Lewes goes.

4651. (Sir Algernon West.) The only question I want to put to you is as to the gratuities that were given to warders under the counties management for technical knowledge and instruction. I think I understood you to say the salaries of the warders were raised in order that they should give instruction?—Yes.

4652. The other day I was told that a man was in this unfortunate position, that when he was under the county administration he received his salary, and in addition 10*l.* a year for teaching weaving; but since he came under the Government he lost it?—He would lose the 10*l.*, I suppose. I can quite understand that. It was not part of his salary, and he could hardly lay claim to it under the provisions of the Prisons Act, because I suppose they not only took the 10*l.* away but they took the work away as well, and I think I could see how he would lose that if he was not a very necessary individual at that time.

4653. I gather from your first evidence that they had an additional salary on condition that they would give their services to teaching?—Yes.

4654. And it was included in that, whereas in this case he had an additional 10*l.* a year because he was a very good weaver?—Yes, and if that had been added to his salary before the transfer he would probably have retained it, but as it remained outside his ordinary salary I can understand he would lose it.

4655. (Chairman.) Probably there are many other cases of the same kind?—There are probably many other cases. Then, sir, you were speaking of the marks system and the gratuities given. I think I ought to mention that I think if something could be done to encourage the prisoners somewhat more after they have completed seven months of their sentences it would be as well. At the present moment a man loses all interest in his work after he has earned his 10*s.* He gets no encouragement after that either in the way of library books, food, or privileges of any kind.

4656. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) When he gets into the fourth class there he stops?—Yes, whether he is in for 12 months, 18 months, or two years.

4657. (Chairman.) Would you give advantages to all prisoners alike, or would you give them in the shape of a premium on good work?—In the days of the county authorities we gave every man advantages on a certain fixed scale, the same as they have now, provided he was industrious and worked up to a certain standard, but beyond that he received just double; that is to say, he has received 1*d.* for eight marks, whereas under the ordinary scale he got 1*d.* for 16. The consequence is that many a man has come before me before he went out having from 2*l.* to 3*l.* to take, and that money was sent to his friends or to some agency or other for his benefit, whereas now the maximum is 10*s.* except under very special circumstances.

4658. Do you find a distinct difference between the work of the prisoners after they have earned the 10*s.*?—I find it does not get any better, whereas in the olden days after that part of the sentence a man practically became a first-class hand at his work.

4659. Do you find any wish amongst the prisoners to qualify themselves for a particular class of work when they go out of prison?—No.

4660. They never seem to desire to make provision for their own future?—No, I have never known a man attempt to earn his living after he got out by the trade he learnt in prison.

4661. Have you had plenty of opportunity of judging of that?—No, not plenty, but I have on several occasions offered to get a man work in a London firm, and I do not remember a case where he accepted the offer; he declined it on every occasion.

4662. But the work was open to him?—I do not know that. I would have tried to have got him work if he had shown any desire for it, by writing to firms in London and different places to take him on; but I never knew a man who accepted the offer.

4663. Then what is your explanation of it?—Well, I do not quite know how to answer that question. It opens a very broad question altogether. For instance, he might say as a man who had just come out of prison he would not like to work with his fellowmen at a trade where he knew he would be spotted at once. He could not go into a mat factory in London as a tradesman without its being shown at once he was taught in a prison, because there would be many professional details which he would know nothing at all about; and I think, perhaps, the fact that he had learnt his trade in prison would be a great factor in his dislike to go amongst his fellowmen in the same class of labour because he could not do it without disclosing where he had learnt his trade.

4664. (Mr. De Rutzen.) But could not that be wiped out by better instruction?—No, I do not think so. You see, a mat factory, or a factory of any kind, is very different to the present system of teaching a man in prison. There are many little machines in use in a factory which it is not desirable to introduce into a prison. They are not absolutely necessary, and I think when he got into a factory and had to use these machines that he would at once show his ignorance, and probably explain to everybody where he came from.

4665. (Chairman.) Then to some extent what you say, if it could be fully substantiated, is an argument against extending the mat-making industry in prison?—If you take it with regard to the advantages a man is to derive when he gets out. I do not think a man gets any advantage from it at all. I am speaking of it purely and simply as a prison industry.

4666. What you say with regard to mat-making would not apply so much to gardening or farming?—No, and there are several industries to which it would not apply at all.

4667 Tailoring or shoemaking?—No, but mat-making is carried on in all factories upon a very large scale, especially in and about London.

4668. For the same reason a man who learns weaving by the hand loom would not be able to qualify at all for the machine weaving?—I should take that as another case in point.

4669. (Mr. De Rutzen.) What reason would you have against introducing that little bit of machinery which would obliterate the difference between prison-made mats and ordinary manufacturers' mats?—Well, I do not know that there is any great objection to it except that it has always been customary to avoid that thing as much as possible.

4670. (Chairman.) Is not it rather that the mat making industry has to be carried on in the cells?—We never carried it on in cells under the county in later years. We carried it on in a large workshop.

4671. Had you any machinery there?—Only a machine for trimming the mats and putting a face on them.

4672. Why could not you carry it on under the same conditions as it is carried on in the workshops?—There is always an objection to introducing these little things into a prison. I do not know why, but it has been the case, I know. There are many little pieces of machinery for finishing the mats and putting them ready for market, and so on, but it has always been done by hand in the prisons. I do not know what the particular objection to the machinery is.

4673. I think it has been given before us in evidence that the mat making industry is a specially desirable one in prisons because it is so useful for prisoners when they first come in, and those who are in solitary confinement; and that a certain kind of mat at any rate, can be made in the cells?—Yes, there is a kind of mat certainly that can be made in the cells, but I do not uphold it at all. I think it is much more desirable that they should work in the workshops, not in the cells.

4674. But assuming that for reasons given it was found necessary to have this solitary confinement for the first month, or whatever the time should be, do you agree that it would be desirable that they should be given work suitable to the solitary confinement?—Yes, but in that case a man can only carry out a part of his work. He never can become an efficient mat maker. He only does one part of the work and it is sent in to the other to be finished. That is where he would display his ignorance. He would get this mat made up to a certain point, and he would know nothing about the remaining part of the work. He might pick that up in a workshop, but in his cell he could not possibly do so.

4675. (Mr. De Rutzen.) You said just now, I thought, that such work as mat making and wood chopping were unfitted for cellular work on account of the dust and so forth?—Yes.

4676. And you are able to carry it out in the cells simply because you have some vacant cells in which you can put them to work?—That is it.

4677. Then assuming that there was a prison in which they were so full that they had really no vacant cells, in your opinion it would be impossible to carry that sort of work out?—Properly, I think.

4678. Just to return one moment to the mat-making, according to your view there would be an opportunity of turning hundreds of people out of prisons qualified as mat makers, but you do not think they could continue their work on account of their fear of being, what I may call, "spotted"?—That is it.

4679. But would not it be very good economy to introduce the little machinery which would be necessary so as to blot out and obliterate that altogether, so that a man could not be detected when he went out?—There are so many other questions involved in that. You would have to have this associated labour, so that each man was able to carry out the whole process from beginning to end. I do not know whether I make myself quite clear about that; but it is no use a man simply being able to begin a mat and not able to put a face upon it. He must understand the binding of the mat, and the sewing of the mat, and the dressing of the mat, and that could only be done in association.

4680. Do you ever have two men at the same moment at work on a mat?—No.

4681. So that it would go through different hands?—Yes.

4682. But it would not be necessarily like two men at smiths' work?—No.

4683. The mat would never be under the hands of two men at the same time?—Certainly not, but it is quite possible the man who finished it would know nothing about the foundation of the work, and the man who laid the foundation would know nothing about the finishing. Unless he was taught the whole process from beginning to end I say he would not be quite competent when he came out of prison to go to a factory.

4684. Would that be got over by allowing him to take each particular portion of the mat?—Certainly, but then you must come to association at once.

4685. But why, if two people are never employed on it at the same time?—Are we talking of cellular work just at the present moment, sir?

4686. Of cellular work or work in association?—Well, we will take the cellular work. In that case the man would have to be drafted from his cell and put into the workshop and another man put back to take his place at mat-making. That would be simply a question of transferring a man from one part of the industry to another and it might be carried out if there were proper facilities for it. In our case it could be carried out because we have both the workshop and the cells; but whether it could be done in ordinary prisons I cannot say.

4687. You were asked a question just now about skilled artizans. Do you find many tradesmen, carpenters and men of that class, in prison at all?—Very few.

4688. It is quite an exception?—Yes, it is quite an exception.

Mr. C. Hall.

9 Nov. 1894.

4689. Or a skilled artizan of any sort?—There would be a difference I suppose between the prisons round here and in the agricultural districts; but in our prison it is quite the exception. We find more among the transfers. We get a great many transferred from London and we find more amongst them than we do amongst our own men.

4690. You said just now in connexion with agricultural work that by extending the amount of ground which you have at present you might employ people who were sentenced, we will say, up to 28 days and under?—Provided we were allowed to do so.

4691. Yes, provided you were allowed to do so, but do you think there would be anything at all deterrent in allowing a person who was in for, say, eight days to be immediately transferred to the open air and put to digging. Do you think there would be anything deterrent in that?—No, but in the case of first convictions I think it might be tried. I may say that question brings up something to my mind, that in the days before the present authorities we made exceptions in those cases. A man on first conviction was allowed to do labour of a kind which as a man of second conviction he was not allowed to do; because on second conviction he was put on the crank or treadwheel at once; whilst the other was allowed to work in the garden and do work of that kind.

4692. But did you mean that as a general remark, that the person who was in for 28 days, whether he was there for the first time or not, might be allowed to do?—No, I think an exception should be allowed in that case.

4693. But I thought it was rather general?—I think an exception should be made in the case of first convictions.

4694. And I suppose at your prison, as at most others, the same people come time after time?—Yes, we have many re-convictions.

4695. And all under a month?—Many of them; I can hardly say all.

4696. (Dr. Bridges.) I have only one or two questions to ask with reference to the agricultural labour. At present I suppose the three or four men who are employed on the garden are looked upon rather as privileged prisoners?—No, I think not. It depends upon their abilities. If they said when they came in that they had a knowledge of gardening they would be put to that particular work.

4697. Is not gardening as at present carried on looked upon as rather a light form of labour?—No, I think not; I could not say that.

4698. Supposing you were to have your ground increased largely and to have treble the amount of ground that you have, I suppose you would employ a good number of men in hard digging would you not?—Yes, it would be all hand work. I do not propose to introduce any machinery.

4699. What would be your opinion in that case if you had a larger amount of ground and more actual hard plain digging work, would that work, in your opinion be of a sufficiently deterrent character to employ men on during their first month of imprisonment?—Yes, I think so certainly. I think it is quite as hard as anything you could give them.

4700. (Mr. O'Connor.) You do not think that a proposal to utilize the first 28 days at work outside the cells would have any disadvantageous effect in respect of discipline?—No, I think not.

4701. You told us that you have had the superintendence of the labour of prisoners for a long time under the governor's superintendence?—Yes.

4702. Have you any disciplinary authority?—No, none at all.

4703. And with regard to the connexion of the warders with the prison industries am I right in supposing that any duty of that kind is rather distasteful to them?—Yes, I think it is probably on account of their having no encouragement.

4704. In the old days there was a certain pecuniary advantage attaching to the work by the warders?—Yes.

4705. And that does not exist now?—No.

4706. There is no inducement to them to take an interest in it?—No.

4707. Then there is no disciplinary officer who is concerned with the industries or with the industrial work of the prison?—Yes, the man who now superintends the work is a disciplinary officer, and he simply does that because he is the only man in the prison who understands anything about it. But as a matter of fact he is a disciplinary officer, and always has been. He picked up his knowledge of the work from our professional mat makers.

4708. But he is away sick?—That is only a temporary matter.

4709. I thought you had the superintendence of it?—I am speaking of the teaching and so on.

4710. Have you read Mr. Duncan's evidence?—Yes, I had an opportunity of looking at it this morning.

4711. He told us that there are certain industries in respect of which there are allotted tasks, a task scale, but there are also other industries more recently introduced in respect of which no task has been prescribed. From a disciplinary point of view, can you tell us how work of that description is dealt with?—You mean the untasked work.

4712. Yes?—No, I do not quite understand what Mr. Duncan alludes to there, because so far as it is possible we task all kinds of work.

4713. I instanced to him hammock making, and he said you will not find hammock making in our task scale at all?—But the practice with us would be that as soon as we get a new industry we should task it as fairly as we could.

4714. But there is no scale of task for new industries prescribed from head-quarters?—No.

4715. If then it is said of a man that he has not done a fair amount of work, he being employed upon one of these new industries, how are you to settle the question whether he has or has not?—The Governor would settle the question if it arose, but I can hardly understand its arising, because we should certainly settle that before we attempted to deal with the man. The official would be asked if he thought he had performed a fair day's work, and if he said "no" the Governor would exercise his judgment on the matter.

4716. Then it would not depend on the power of the man, but on the opinion of the disciplinary officer who was in connexion with him?—Yes, but I must say I do not quite understand its arising. Those cases are very seldom; they are very few and far between.

4717. You have not hammock making?—No.

4718. You told us that with 30 or 40 prisoners under the old system you made a profit of 1,000*l.* a year in mat making?—I think 50 was my number. It is mere recollection, but I think it was about 50.

(Sir Algernon West.) How do you calculate that?

(Chairman.) That is about 20*l.* a man.

4719. (Mr. O'Connor.) Do you deduct the expense of maintaining a man?—No.

4720. Then what was the expense of maintaining him, do you think, under the old system?—It is a long time ago, but I shall not be far out if I say from 20*l.* to 23*l.* a year.

4721. In reality your profit did not clear the maintenance of the prisoner?—No; that includes salaries and everything; that is the actual cost of the man and his share of the expenses.

4722. Of the men employed in mat making, where you have 10 or 12 mat makers you have 10 or 12 to assist them?—It generally runs about two-thirds.

4723. What do you mean by "assisting them"?—Men who are preparing the yarn for the purpose of mat making; men who are finishing the mats when they come from the loom, and generally all those men who have anything at all to do with it, but who are not actually employed in the manufacture of the mat.

4724. In the 50 men that you speak of as earning the 1,000*l.* a year, do you include those who are assisting the actual mat-makers?—No.

4725. Then the 1,000*l.* would have to be spread not only over the 50 who are producing the mat, but over an equal number who are assisting them?—An addition of two-thirds of very short sentenced men, men who were unfit to be employed at anything in the way of manufacturing, but who were just able to assist by preparing the materials.

4726. Then your estimate of 1,000*l.* is subject to these qualifications: first, that you do not include the maintenance of the prisoners?—Yes.

4727. Secondly, that you do not include the assistants?—The assistants were probably included in the 1,000*l.* a year, but not included in the average.

4728. They are not included in the 50 men?—No.

4729. How many warders do you say that you have as disciplinary officers?—We have a chief warder, six warders, and 12 others.

4730. That is 18. Did you prepare the estimate for your prison?—Yes.

4731. Did not you put down nine warders and nine assistants?—Are you speaking of the estimate of accounts?

4732. The estimate for the votes in Parliament?—No, we have nothing to do with that.

4733. I see your staff is estimated at nine men on warders' pay, and nine assistant warders. Did you say you have only six warders and 12 assistants?—Is not that a prospective estimate?

4734. It is for the year ending the 31st of March 1895, the year in which we now are?—I do not know what alterations they may intend, but the present staff is what I have given you.

4735. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Will you just repeat your figures please?—There are one chief warder, six warders, and 12 others, including a schoolmaster and engineer.

4736. (Mr. O'Connor.) You told us that you would consider that the average warder now was not quite up to the standard of the average warder in times past?—That is my opinion.

4737. Is he paid as well?—A little better.

4738. How do you account for the deterioration, if I may use the term?—In the days when the magistrates had control of this matter it was customary to advertise in the local paper. The men who replied to the advertisement were all interviewed by the magistrates and their credentials and testimonials were very carefully gone into, and, if necessary, inquiries were made in the parishes and districts where they lived for their character as to honesty and sobriety, and that sort of thing, and I think the men were better sifted than they are now.

4739. There was more discrimination exercised in the selection of them?—I must not perhaps say that, but still I simply state it as a fact. I can tell you why I think the magistrates were the best judges of that.

4740. They had better means of judging it perhaps?—Yes, but I should not go further than that.

4741. You told us that after the prisoners had earned 10*s.* they could earn no more?—That is so.

4742. But in the old times they could get many 10*s.*?—They could get up to as much as 2*l.*

4743. Would you say it was sometimes of importance to a prisoner what amount of money he takes with him to face the world again?—I think it is of very great importance provided it is judiciously used.

4744. With regard to the prospect of his return or non-return to prison?—Certainly.

4745. But do you think from the public point of view it is important that the man should have sufficient means to keep him for some little time after he went out of prison?—Yes, and I think it would be good economy in the end, and I think that he should be allowed to earn it.

4746. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You spoke in your evidence of a profit of 1,000*l.* on mat making?—About 1,000*l.* I had not the paper before me at that time.

4747. It appears that the profit was 317*l.* in the last year?—May I point out to you just one or two little matters there. I think I can clear that up. The profit for 1873 and 1874 when we only worked about half the year was 500*l.*; for 1874 and 1875 the profit was 957*l.*; for 1875 and 1876 the profit was 1,001*l.*; for 1876 and 1877 the profit was 801*l.* Then you see we were handed over to the Government authorities and things were sold for what they would fetch. We were clearing out, and of course only worked a very few months in the year. That does not represent a whole year's work or anything like it.

4748. Last year's was not a fair test?—No.

4749. I suppose the reason why you say that a mat maker in prison could not go and pursue his trade of mat making in a factory is that a factory is conducted in such a totally different way to what cellular employment would be?—That is so.

4750. I suppose mat making is conducted with steam machinery?—A great deal of it is; not necessarily, but it is in many of the factories.

4751. The factories you would go into would be steam factories?—Yes.

4752. And therefore he would not be fitted to hand that sort of machinery which would be driven by steam?—No.

4753. And the little machines you talk of are adjuncts to the looms I suppose?—Yes; combing and that sort of thing.

4754. Which could be done by hand in prison?—Yes.

4755. I believe in the clothmaking trade it is known that a piece of cloth woven on a handle is a better article than one woven on a machine?—Yes.

4756. But hardly anybody understands the handle now?—No.

4757. With regard to your prisoners you say they would not continue to follow the same trades as they had learnt in prison. I suppose they would go back to the trade they had learnt previously to their imprisonment?—Certainly they would, if they had a trade.

4758. But a large number of your prisoners, I have no doubt, had no trade at all?—Many of them. Most of them are agricultural labourers.

4759. With regard to employment on land if you took town prisoners and tried to put them on the land it would be extremely penal, would it not?—Yes, I could not justify that unless they had been used to it for some time.

4760. But to an agricultural labourer it would be his daily occupation?—Yes.

4761. And it would hardly be penal?—Not unless you imposed a very severe task.

4762. So that to the two descriptions of prisoners you would be administering totally different degrees of punishment?—Yes.

4763. What was severe in the one case would not be in the other?—You might carry that to an unlimited extent.

4764. That is necessarily a difficulty in prison employment?—There has been no means of separating it, that I know of.

4765. You have suggested it might be desirable to shift the prisoners with long sentences and short sentenced prisoners into different places so that you could pursue your trades rather better?—I think it would be better if it were carried out.

4766. You have had a good deal of experience. Do you think a prisoner would regard it as a hardship to be removed from Lewes, say, to Winchester?—They are liable to that now.

4767. But it is not much done?—It varies according to the population. There is no hardship in it for short sentence prisoners. There might be a little hardship where they are entitled to a visit from their friends.

4768. To remove them from that opportunity?—Yes, or it would put the friends to a good deal of expense.

Mr. C. Hall.
9 Nov. 1894.

4769. I may ask you as a man who has had experience of prisoners whether you think the prisoners would have good grounds for a grumble at being removed from the prison of the district in which they were first lodged to a different prison?—No, I think not. The only hardship that I can suggest is the want of opportunities of being visited by their friends.

4770. Are the opportunities of visiting largely taken advantage of?—Yes, fairly so.

4771. Do you think four-fifths of your prisoners get a visit?—No, two-thirds I should think, but that is mere guess work of course. I have not any figures before me. That would only, of course, be in the case of transfers of long sentence men. It would not affect short sentence men at all.

4772. You could not transfer them?—If we did it would not affect them in the way I have spoken of.

4773. No, because they are not entitled to a visit?—Because they are not entitled to a visit.

4774. How do you get your materials for the workshop. Do you contract for it at the prison?—No, they are all supplied through the Home Office—through the Prison Commissioners.

4775. But is that supplied satisfactorily?—Yes, I think so.

4776. You get what you want easily?—Yes.

4777. If you want a new loom do you get it?—Yes.

4778. Without much trouble?—Yes, there is nothing troublesome about that.

4779. If you had a skilled inspector going round the prisons, not to inspect them as prisons, but to inspect them as workshops, do you think there would be any risk of the prison being judged rather as a workshop then as a prison?—I should not think so.

4780. There would be no collision between the two views?—Nothing that could not be reconciled with a very little management.

4781. Do you think the two classes of inspectors would not fall out?—No; they would be so totally different. There would be nothing in common. I do not think they could clash.

4782. One man might find fault with the officers—because they were not good artisans, and the other because they were not good disciplinary officers?—The inspector would have nothing to do with the disciplinary officers. It would come more within the business of a professional man connected with the industries than of anyone connected with the discipline of the prison.

4783. They are necessarily worse, are they not?—That is a very moot point. That is a point we have been discussing some little time. It is so at the present time, but I hope it will not continue.

4784. Would you like to see skilled instructors apart from the warders?—Yes, I should like to see a man who understands the work, and who is devoid of duties connected with discipline. I want him to have more sympathy with the men and to be able to walk into the cells and show them how to do the work, and help them along with their work.

4785. Would you like him to be a kind of schoolmaster?—Yes.

4786. And not a warder?—It causes nine-tenths of the friction that frequently takes place, because the disciplinary work and the industrial work constantly clash. The one man has to perform the two kinds of duty at different times of the day, and he is never able to concentrate his attention on either one or the other.

4787. And having considered the matter you think that the industrial trainer who is also bound to look after his prisoner, I suppose, when handed over to him?—Yes, certainly.

4788. Would not clash with the warder who is more strictly connected with the discipline?—I do not say so; I think it can be avoided.

4789. (Chairman.) You said you used to make coal sacks at Lewes?—That is so.

4790. I see that Mr. Duncan mentions that industry as having been taken on in the convict prisons?—I did not notice that.

4791. When was that item of industry taken away from Lewes?—I think about four years ago.

4792. Then were you asked to make a report about it?—No.

4793. It was simply taken away?—It was simply taken away and transferred to some other prison. Possibly we were doing more in the industrial way then and some other prison was doing very little, and they wanted to equalize matters.

4794. What officer is responsible for the work of he industrial system in the prisons? Who arranges what work shall be done?—Well, it is all done under the instructions of the Governor. The Governor gives his instructions.

4795. But I mean taking the whole prisons of the country generally, do the Prison Commissioners determine what labour shall be done?—Certainly.

4796. Then who would advise them of it?—Their own officers. We have nothing to do with it.

4797. But is there an official who is cognizant with the particular circumstances relating to the industries of different districts throughout the country?—I cannot answer that question. There are several people I believe who advise upon this point.

4798. (Miss Orme.) Have you any other occupations in your mind that would be suitable for long sentence prisoners besides those you have already mentioned to us?—I want to increase the laundry work very much if I can. It is work which appears to me to be not only profitable, but work which is very easily carried out.

4799. And amongst men too, are there any other occupations than those you have spoken of?—Yes; basket making is one which I have down specially, particularly fancy work which can be sold very readily in such towns as Brighton, Hastings, and Eastbourne, and those towns where these little things are often purchased. Then again comes the question of a skilled instructor, and we have no one who understands it.

4800. Are there any others?—Knitting might be developed to a great extent amongst women.

4801. At Lewes do you use your crank for sawing wood?—No, it is not used for anything at all; it simply revolves with so much opposition, but it does nothing.

4802. Could it be used for sawing wood in the same way they use the tread wheels?—The combined crank would I think do it. I do not see why it should not be so in the same way as I think at Wandsworth it is used for grinding corn.

4803. That would assist you in the wood-chopping industry, because then you could buy the wood in large pieces?—Yes, but that is not exactly my view of the question. I think we have ample prisoners to do the work, and if we introduced that kind of machinery, we should be then, as it were, reducing the labour. I do not think, in our particular case, we want to do that.

4804. You do not think it important to make that first penal labour productive in order that the men should know they were doing something?—Well, it has been considered by most people that it is very necessary it should be made unproductive, but I do not know that it is a very great point. It could be made productive unquestionably with very little outlay.

The witness withdrew.

Dr. BRAYN called and examined.

Dr. Brayn.

4805. (Dr. Bridges.) I believe you are the Governor of Woking?—Yes, I am Governor and Medical Officer at Woking Female Convict Prison.

4806. Will you tell the Committee what your previous appointments have been?—I joined the convict service at Portsmouth in 1875 as Assistant Medical Officer; then I was moved to Millbank about September or October 1876; I remained at Millbank until January 1879. Previously to being removed from Millbank I had done duty temporarily at Wormwood Scrubs, but I was not officially appointed there. Then I was promoted to the post of Medical Officer at Pentonville, when Pentonville was a convict prison, and I remained at Pentonville until August 1882, which was about three-and-a-half years. From there I was appointed Medical Officer to Woking Invalid Convict Prison, the male prison. It was then partially a convict prison and lunatic asylum. The lunatic convicts were at Woking then. I remained there until the the convicts and lunatics were removed, about August or September 1888; that would be six years I was there. Then I was temporarily employed doing the medical work, only in the female prison for a year. That would be until 1889. I was then appointed Medical Officer at Parkhurst, but never did any duty there, as in the meantime the Governor died at Woking, and I was appointed as Governor there.

4807. Your experience has been entirely in convict prisons?—Yes; I do not know anything about local prisons.

4808. Coming to the question of the accommodation at Woking Prison, I understand the prison is to a large extent empty at present?—Yes, one wing is entirely empty.

4809. You have now only women there?—Yes; the male prison has been handed over to the War Department, and half the female prison is not occupied.

4810. You have between 200 and 300 prisoners, I think?—207 is the number this morning. It has been gradually going down.

4811. And the number of women whom the prison could accommodate is about double that number?—Yes, more than that. I think the prison accommodation altogether is for nearly 800.

4812. Therefore you have, at the present time, abundant facilities for any amount of classification that you might desire to introduce so far as accommodation is concerned?—Yes; I suppose you know we are not likely to be at Woking very long; it is a question of probably a few months now.

4813. Have you found great advantage arise, from having a great deal of room at your disposal, in the way of classifying your prisoners?—In some ways we have, and in some we have not. Now we have all the women on one side of the prison, we are not able to separate individual prisoners so much as we used to do. For instance, the great cause of prison offences, we find, is these women getting jealous of each other and quarrelling. Formerly when two women fought we were able to put one on one side of the prison, and one on the other, and we could keep them further apart; but now we have to keep them on the same side of the prison, so that they see each other more than they otherwise would; but I do not think it gives rise to anything serious.

4814. I believe you are much in favour of separating first offenders from habitual offenders?—Yes, we do that in the convict prisons.

4815. And that you are able to do?—Yes, we have what is called the Star class, and they are kept quite separate.

4816. Are you satisfied that first offenders are distinguished from the others adequately?—Yes, I think so. We never receive the ordinary criminal who has not, probably, served dozens of convictions in the local prisons before coming to us.

4817. By first offenders you mean those who have never committed any offence at all, and who have never been convicted previously?—Although it is their first conviction we make inquiries into their antecedents. Sometimes this is done at the local prisons before they come to us, and we make further inquiry ourselves, if we do not think it is exhaustive. Then we send the result up to the director, and he decides whether the convict is to be put in the Star class or not.

4818. That is settled by the director?—Yes. Sometimes we write to the police in the first instance, and ask if they can tell us the woman's character and her habits of life, whether she is sober or not. Sometimes in abortion cases the woman has been practising criminal offences for years, and although it may be her first conviction she may not be the sort of woman to put with young women in the first class.

4819. In fixing those who are to be admitted to the Star class, you take into consideration not only the mere fact of their having had one conviction, but the general character of the prisoner?—Yes.

4820. As ascertained by all the means at your disposal?—Yes, we have a form which we send out; in the first instance, usually to the police; and we ask them if they can give us the name of any other trustworthy persons who can give us reliable information, and we often get names to whom we make further application.

4821. On the first admission of a prisoner to a convict prison, as to a local prison, a careful examination is made of the physical condition of the prisoner?—Yes. We have what we call a medical history that we fill up for every prisoner who comes in. I have brought one if you wish to see it.

4822. That applies to all convict prisoners?—Yes, male and female.

4823. In your double capacity of Governor and Medical Officer, is that examination made by yourself or by your assistant?—Usually by myself, but I may say that the medical history is filled up at the local prison before the woman comes, and it comes with her. Then we go over the woman physically and and examine her heart and lungs, and principal organs, and talk to her and see what condition her mind is in, and if it agrees we simply put down "ditto," but, if not, we put down what we find.

4824. You are not quite satisfied with recording the result of the local prison's certificate, but you make one yourself?—Yes.

4825. You have an assistant?—Yes; as a matter of fact I do not do any clinical work; I supervise it and visit the hospital every day; but he takes the hospital work and calls my attention to any prisoner who is seriously ill; and, if any prisoner is dissatisfied with her treatment, she can apply to me about it.

4826. You have been in a great many prisons, and some of them have much larger numbers than Woking now has?—Yes.

4827. What has been the largest number of prisoners you have had under your care at any time?—I expect Portsmouth would be. I think there were about 1,400 prisoners there when I was there.

4828. What was the medical staff there?—Myself and a medical officer. That would be two, a medical officer and an assistant surgeon.

4829. In your opinion, would that be a sufficient staff to adequately examine the number of prisoners?—Well, I think it would in a prison like that. We were pretty hard worked, but still we used to be able to do it. The only time I really found the work very hard at Portsmouth was when we had a very large number there, and an epidemic of scarlet fever in the quarters. I was at work then from morning till night.

4830. That was an accidental circumstance?—Yes, but otherwise it would be sufficient. There were not so many receptions, and the sentences were much longer than they are now. The shorter the sentences the more rapid the flow through the prison.

4831. With 500 prisoners you might have a larger amount of medical work to do than if you had 1,500 prisoners on very much longer sentences?—Yes.

4832. With regard to the sanitary arrangements of Woking Prison I understand you are quite satisfied?—Well, nothing has ever arisen. They are not the newest pattern of sanitary arrangements, but I do not think anything goes wrong.

4833. Is the system of ventilation used there the same as that is common to other prisons?—Not in the new prisons, I think. We take the fresh air in from the corridors, which I do not like. I think it ought to come from the outside. We have no hot-air chambers, but the corridors are warmed by stoves, and the hot air is drawn from them into the cells by the ventilating shaft, so that you get products of combustion of gas, and the prisoners inhale the air from the corridors; I do not like the system.

Dr. Brayn.

9 Nov. 1894.

4834. That is the old system?—Yes.

4835. But in the newer prisons?—Yes, like Pentonville, for instance. That has hot-water coils, and the air is drawn over the hot-water coils, and comes in pure from the outside.

4836. That, of course, you greatly prefer?—Yes, much.

4838. Is there a communication between the chaplain and the medical staff with regard to each prisoner?—With the medical staff there would not be. When a prisoner comes in she is entered in the Governor's order book and it is noted what religion she is. That is sent to the chaplain and priest, and they initial it, so that the book is seen every day.

4839. You, as governor, see every report of the chaplain?—I do not see the chaplain's annual report. That goes direct to the Directors. The chaplain makes no report to me unless he thinks any prisoner is affected in his or her mind, when he would always come and tell me of it.

4840. There is nothing in the nature of a consultation between the medical staff of the prison and the chaplain of the prison so as to form what I call a complete diagnosis of the whole physical and moral character of each prisoner?—Not necessarily, but if any question arises as to the condition of the prisoner's mind, as a matter of fact I always ask the chaplain what he has noticed, and get his opinion; but there is nothing officially done. There is no official report which passes between us. If a prisoner attempts suicide the chaplain's opinion is taken. That is the only case I remember now. In case of attempted suicide we have to report to the Home Office whether we consider it a feigned or a genuine attempt.

4841. A large number of your prisoners are occupied in what I see is called the manufactory?—Yes.

4842. You have a daily average of 134 persons employed according to the last report?—I am not quite certain about that.

4843. It is at page 56?—Yes, that would include prisoners working in their cells part of the day as well. We have two kinds of association at Woking.

4844. That 134 includes those who work in their cells and those who work in association?—Yes. We have no unproductive labour at Woking.

4845. Your work appears to be knitting, needlework, tailoring work, and twine spinning?—Yes.

4846. And general work?—Yes, washing in the laundry.

4847. Are the workshops in which they work, taking your associated rooms, sufficiently large for the purpose?—Yes, they are too large for the numbers we have now.

4848. They have always been?—Yes, since I have been at Woking.

4849. The work you consider is well conducted for the class of women you have. As far as the physical conditions of the work are concerned they are satisfactory?—Yes, a prisoner generally improves in health. It is very seldom a woman goes out having lost weight. They almost always gain weight. I think they all improve in health.

4850. It is all sitting work, is it not?—No, the twine spinning is not nor the laundry.

4851. But knitting, needlework, and tailoring would be sedentary work?—Yes.

4852. Do those women get exercise?—Yes.

4853. Every day?—No woman gets less than an hour's exercise daily.

4854. Do they get their exercise on Sundays?—Yes, they get more exercise on Sundays because we keep them out as long as we can.

4855. Your mortality last year was not, I think, a very high one?—Yes, it was a very high one last year. It was the highest I have ever had. We had two women who died suddenly of heart disease.

4856. Then I will just take you to those cases. You had, I think, five deaths?—Yes.

4857. Two from heart disease, one from peritonitis, one of phthisis, and another of cancer?—Yes.

4858. Taking that case of phthisis, it was a woman of 42 years of age who had been in the prison for three years I think?—Yes.

4859. Do you see any reason to attribute her illness to the prison life?—No, that woman was never in very good health.

4860. What would she be employed at?—I think she was employed in the tailor's shop as a machinist. We have 16 sewing machines that they used to work at. I have made out an average of the deaths for the last five years, and you will see we never had such a large per-centage before. It is the highest per-centage we ever had, and I think it is quite exceptional.

4861. With small numbers you may have great fluctuations in the death rate, obviously?—Yes.

4862. Were the two cases of heart disease employed at active work?—No. One was in hospital from the time of admission, she never did anything at all; and I think the other was in the hospital for the greater part of her time.

4863. You have on the average, I observe, about 16 women in hospital. At least you have had for the last year?—It is somewhere about that. Our daily average number in hospital now is about 14 or 15.

4864. What system of nursing have you there?—We have two female officers, and they are assisted by prisoners; but a prisoner is not allowed to do anything without an officer being there.

4865. Are the officers trained nurses?—Yes, one is a very experienced woman indeed. She has had a long experience. She can dispense, and do anything that is wanted.

4866. Had she an hospital training?—No, not until she came to Woking, where she has been 20 years; and we have now a younger one who is being trained to take her place when she goes.

4867. Do they actually do the nursing, or is the actual nursing done by the prisoners?—They do part of it themselves, but such things as changing sheets and that sort of thing is done by the prisoners, though the prisoners are not allowed to do anything without the officers being there to superintend it. All medicine is administered by the officer; that would never be trusted to a prisoner.

4868. In a hospital such a thing as changing the sheets would be done as we know by the nurses themselves?—Yes, but that kind of thing would be done by the prisoners.

4869. The dressing of a bedsore, for instance?—That would be done by the infirmary matron as we call her. Everything of that kind is done by the infirmary matron.

4870. In the summary of your report it is observed that you have 87 infirmary cases out of 212 prisoners I do not know exactly what you mean by the infirmary cases?—It is cases which have been admitted into the infirmary.

4871. If for ever so short a time?—Yes, if only for two days. If it is only a boil it will be called an infirmary case.

4872. Then you do not think 87 is a large number?—No, it is not 87 out of 212; 87 is the number we have had in the infirmary during the year, but the women are more than 212. I think it is 311. The daily average of hospital cases calculated on the daily average of prisoners is, I think, about 7 per cent.

4873. Has your attention been called to the fact that the mortality during the year 1893–94 has been somewhat higher in prisons—that the death-rate has?—I do not mean in your prison particularly, but generally?—No.

4874. I do not know whether you happen to have seen a paper that was read by Dr. Walker, of Holloway?—No, I have not seen the paper, but I have heard of it. It is about the "vital statistics of convict prisons."

4875. You have not expressed any opinion on that?—No; I know he made the death rate in prisons about the same as the death rate outside.

4876. That would be the result of your experience speaking without book?—Yes, I think so.

4877. With regard to the discipline of prisons as to punishment, what kind of punishments are principally inflicted at Woking?—It depends on the nature of the offence. The first time a woman is reported she is usually cautioned, and if she is reported again she would probably have separate confinement awarded, and then she might be awarded loss of marks or loss of privileges for a time. She would be degraded in class and put from second class to third or from third class to probation. With regard to separate confinement we have what is called a penal ward for misconducted women, and if it is not a very serious offence I practically give them no dietary punishment at all, but sentence them to No. 4 local prison diet. That is a little worse than ours, but very little.

4878. Is that the stir-about?—No, that is the best diet in the local prisons. If that is not sufficient I would give her probably No. 2 punishment diet. That is the stir-about diet. And of course in extreme cases one can give bread and water. I have the power of giving bread and water for three days only. Anything further has to be referred to the Directors.

4879. The No. 1 local prison diet you do not give?—No, we have a convict prison diet.

4880. What is your lowest dietary. What does that include?—I may say for prisoners undergoing separate confinement we have the No. 4 local prison diet. That is really the lowest diet we have.

4881. You do not use what they call stirabout?—Only as a punishment diet—only for misconducted prisoners.

4882. But that is made in the same way that it is in the local prisons I presume?—It is two ounces of Indian meal and two ounces of oatmeal made into a little over a pint of stirabout.

4883. That is only given for two days?—No; the Directors can give it for 42 days; but that is very seldom given.

4884. With regard to the rule of silence, is that very rigidly enforced with you. It is not enforced at all. All the prisoners are allowed to talk at least an hour a day except those who are undergoing separate confinement; they are prevented from talking; other prisoners have an hour's talking every day.

4885. Is that when they are at work?—Yes.

4886. Talking is simply kept in control?—We group them in threes. They come outside their cells and sit in groups of three, and they are allowed to talk for an hour.

4887. During the rest of the day they are kept in silence?—Yes, except the women in the laundry and the twine room. You cannot help that. They do not hold continued conversations, but they talk. They have to speak to one another about their work, and so on.

4888. Do you consider that the prison discipline, as far as you have observed, has much reformatory effect upon prisoners?—Upon some of them it has; but our class of prisoners are, I think, the majority of them incorrigible before they come to us, excepting those in the Star class. Except for serious offences a woman is never sentenced to penal servitude now unless she has been convicted several times before. I think I have a woman who was imprisoned 130 times before she came to us, and in many instances they have been convicted 40 or 50 times before they come to us.

4889. Are many of those for drunkenness?—Perhaps some of them are, but many are for theft and larceny. I do not think a woman is ever sent to penal servitude for a first offence unless it is for murder, infanticide, and perhaps Post Office offences. We have a case now and again of arson, but for petty offences they are never sent to penal servitude until they have had a great many convictions.

4890. (Miss Orme.) You find it a great advantage do you not in combining the offices of Governor and Medical Officer in the treatment of these prisoners?—I think so.

4891. Do you think it is a good system?—I think so.

4892. For instance, in awarding punishments to the women, is not it an advantage that you are able to decide at once without referring to another authority?—Well in that particular instance, the governor would never punish a prisoner in an ordinary case unless the prisoner was certified by the doctor as fit for the punishment.

4893. Is not it a great advantage for discipline that you are able to decide the punishment at once?—The system is this: the reports are heard at a certain time, and the medical officer sees the prisoner previously. That used to be the system. He sees the prisoners and certifies whether they are fit, and that book is laid before the governor when he sees them.

4894. You have in Woking occasionally outbreaks of disorder?—Yes; nothing serious, but we have had one or two fights.

4895. If there is a fuss with one, I suppose the others are apt to get out of order?—Yes, they are apt to get out of temper sometimes.

4896. What sort of punishment do you award?—That would depend on the woman's previous character. If it were a first offence we do not sometimes punish her at all; or if we think she has been assaulted by the other woman.

4897. Do you find it necesary to use handcuffs?—I have never used a handcuff.

4898. Do you use any physical restraint?—I have always restrained them, not as a punishment, but as a matter of protection—in the loose canvas restraint jacket. If they are inclined to hurt themselves or the officers, I put them in that until they promise to be quiet.

4899. For how long would you use a punishment of that sort?—Very rarely more than 24 hours, sometimes only for an hour. If the paroxysm has passed away and they promise to be perfectly quiet they might come out in an hour.

4900. You have found that to have a good effect?—Yes.

4901. You have lately had a lady appointed as visitor, have you not?—No, we have no regularly appointed lady visitor. Mrs. Stidson comes up occasionally.

4902. I thought there was a lady appointed officially in your prison?—She was a Scripture reader, but now she is assistant superintendent, so that practically she is my deputy governor

4903. When she was Scripture reader she visited the prisoners much as a chaplain would?—Yes.

4904. The chaplain would never see the prisoners alone?—We have an arrangement of a room which has a glass door so that the chaplain can be alone with the women. He is out of hearing but within sight of the officer.

4905. Then this lady used to act as Scripture reader in addition to him?—Yes.

4906. Does she now have any duties of that sort?—No, but a lady who was the schoolmistress has been appointed as Scripture reader.

4907. Then you think it a good arrangement to have a Scripture reader besides the chaplain?—I think so.

4908. Why is it necessary to have a Scripture reader besides the chaplain?—Well, a chaplain can hardly go into the women's cells alone. It is not considered advisable he should, whereas a lady can go in and sit down and talk to them, and get on very much more familiar terms with them than the chaplain can.

Dr. Brayn.
9 Nov. 1894.

4909. You think that really is a great advantage?—I think so.

4910. Do you think it a good plan for a woman to go for nine months to a local prison before coming to your prison?—Well, I should prefer to have them for the first nine months, because I think you get them into the ways and routine and discipline and so on. No two local prisons are quite the same, and women come with different ideas of discipline.

4911. Do you know why convicts should be sent for nine months to a local prison first?—I do not.

4912. You would prefer them coming straight to you?—Yes, the longer we have them the better chance we have of teaching them needlework and different industries.

4913. Your mark system is different also. Do not you find some difficulty when they come to you first?—That is rectified in the Home Office before they come. The local prison governors send up to the Home Office an abstract register which is corrected before it is sent to us.

4914. Do not you find some confusion arises in the prisoner's mind from the different system of marks?—Yes, sometimes they are under the impression they have been deprived of marks. They have been earning eight marks a day in the local prisons, and can only earn six in the convict prisons.

4915. All that causes friction?—They think the marks are taken away from them.

4916. In addition to the Star class, have not you practically a class of old prisoners whom you consider too old to do any work?—They are not too old to do work, but we have what is called an invalid ward where we put the old women. Of course they are not tasked.

4917. And practically in fine weather they have as much air as they want?—They are out in the afternoon for 2½ hours a day, and we allow them to take out stools; and they take out work with them.

4918. During all that time you do not interfere if they talk to each other?—No, not if they talk quietly.

4919. With regard to the work that the prisoners do with you, do you think that twine-making is of any use to them after they leave you. Is there any such industry do you think?—I do not know about that, I do not know what their means of finding employment at it would be.

4920. Which of your prisoners do you actually put to the twine-making?—Usually the most ignorant women, the lowest class; those who cannot sew or knit, and are not good washerwomen.

4921. So that you only put into the twine-room those who cannot do anything else?—We put the roughest there.

4922. Which industry do you think is most useful for the purpose of getting them a good living after they leave you?—The laundry work.

4923. Have you any means of knowing whether they get occupation when they leave?—Some do. Some go to the aid societies and the refuges, and some go to Mrs. Meredith, and I believe washing is done at all these places. That is their usual employment.

4924. Who arranges about their employment afterwards? Do you have anything to do with it?—When they leave the prison?

4925. Yes?—No. Those women who go to aid societies we send a form with, and we state on that form the kind of employment they wish for. We have a form which we send to aid societies. About a month before discharge every prisoner is sent for and seen by the clerk, who takes down the destination where she wishes to go, and who tells her of the aid societies in the neighbourhood, and if she will go to them we send to the society and tell them the sort of employment she wishes for, and her capability for work.

4926. Do you mean in the neighbourhood of Woking, or where she is discharged to?—Where she comes from. We send convicts to the place of conviction. We do not discharge them at the prison gate.

4927. Then all that is arranged before she leaves Woking, not during the week she is at the local prison finally?—She is not in all cases at the local prison the last week. We discharge to Holloway only prisoners liberated in London. The rest we send to their places of conviction.

4928. Then all that is done with the Aid Society is done while she is at Woking?—Yes.

4929. Not during the final week?—It is only the women who are convicted at the Central Criminal Court, or discharged in London, who go to Holloway. As to all prisoners from other parts, we pay their railway fare to their destination, and they simply go to the town where they wish to reside, and report themselves to the police.

4930. Do you think it a great advantage to them to go to licensed homes after they leave you?—Well, some, I think, get an advantage from it, but I do not think they keep them long enough to teach them very much.

4931. Do you think it a matter of great importance that the women who have only a three years' sentence are not sent to these homes? Have you ever heard any complaints about that?—No.

4932. You are not prepared to recommend that those with three years' sentences should have that privilege?—No, not the three years' women. They would not be eligible for a refuge, because if they are well-conducted, they only stay for two years in prison, so that we should have to send them to the refuges before we knew very much about them.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time.

4933. (Mr. De Rutzen.) What effect do you find it has upon the prisoners if you give them certain privileges like a remission of a certain part of their sentence. I think it has a very good effect upon them. I think it is better to lead than to drive them if you can.

4934. And are you of opinion that a remission of a certain portion of the sentence has a good effect upon all prisoners?—I think so. It certainly has a very marked effect upon their prison conduct, because they are all very anxious about their remission and very jealous of losing any of it if they can possibly help it. They frequently come to me and complain there is some mistake in the calculation of their marks or gratuities.

4935. And however small it may be they would look upon it as a very distinct advantage if they could earn it?—I think they would make an effort to gain it. Most of them would.

4936. Do you see any reason why in the same way a person sentenced to two years' imprisonment should not be able to earn some remission of a portion of his sentence in the same way that the convicts do?—No. I do not know of any reason why they should not. I think the system might be adapted to two years as well as to three.

4937. Does the facility for meeting for conversational purposes, which you speak of at Woking, apply to all convict prisons?—Not to the male convict prisons, I think.

4938. It does not?—I think not.

4939. Then this is confined entirely to the women?—I think so. In the male convict prisons they work outside the prison a great part of the day. They do not work inside like the female prisoners do. Men go out on the public works at Portland and so on.

4940. But in the long summer days they are not employed more than a certain number of hours in that way?—The others hours are spent in the prison cells

That was the practice when I was in the male prisons, but I have not been in the male prisons for some time.

4941. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) That was at Portsmouth?—Yes, but I have been at Millbank since then, and also Pentonville.

4942. (Mr. De Rutzen.) What reason do you assign for such a wide difference between the treatment of women and men?—I am sure I do not know. Of course women are not usually treated as severely as men, and have never been so. The discipline for women has always been much more lenient than it has been for men. The female prisoners only talk for this hour in the afternoon.

4943. They talk for one hour?—Yes, they talk for an hour, but not those who are in separate confinement. It is only the first, second, and third classes.

4944. Is that done on any system, or is it any three of them that happen to be together?—We usually put the women in the adjoining cells together to sit together.

4945. Whatever their offences may be?—Yes. The Star class of prisoners, of course, are kept separate from the old offenders. We have those in a separate ward. The first offenders do not mix with the others.

4946. Of course there is a difficulty in knowing what a first offender means in a convict prison, because, as a matter of fact, there never is a first offender there, is there?—Yes, we have infanticides, and commuted capital cases.

4947. But there are no cases of thefts?—No, we never have a case of ordinary theft of a first offender.

4948. And it is only a certain class of prisoner who ever can be a first offender in a convict prison; that is those who have been sent for murder, or something of that?—Yes, the commuted cases.

4949. (Sir Algernon West.) Just to continue for a minute this question of conversation in this convict establishment. One witness talked of "the cruelty of a lifelong silence." As far as regards the females at any rate that is not so?—No.

4950. Dr. Bridges was talking about the deaths in prison. You always avoid a death in prison if you can; that is to say, if a woman is dying, and has friends who will take her, you will let her go, will not you?—Yes, if she is fit to be removed. Of course you cannot do that in acute cases.

4951. But supposing a woman is dying from old age, would you let her go?—Yes, in chronic diseases we should.

4952. If she had friends who would receive her you would be willing to get rid of her?—Well, we should make inquiries whether the friends were able, as well as willing, to take them. We have a case now of a woman, a phthisis case, who has been in the hospital the whole time she has been in prison, but her friends are too poor to take charge of her.

4953. Last year there was a woman dying in prison, and she told us she would sooner stop there. She was in the infirmary?—She is there still; she is not dead yet.

4954. Mrs. Winsor died, did not she?—Yes.

4955. She was a great baby farmer?—Yes.

4956. With regard to the Star prisoners, you try to keep them apart as much as you can?—Absolutely.

4957. Do not they see each other?—They see each other in chapel, but they cannot communicate with each other, unless by the connivance of an officer.

4958. You employ them in preparing food for the officers sometimes?—Yes.

4959. Therefore they are cooking food of a superior kind to what they have themselves?—Yes, and they are also employed in the prison kitchen.

4960. That I do not mind; but do you think doing cooking in the warders' kitchen leads to theft of the food in any way?—No. Originally when the ordinary prisoners were employed we used constantly to find things about; but since the first-class Star prisoners have been there it has been different.

4961. Do not you think a better system might be devised than that of the visitors? Do you think they do any good?—I think so.

4962. Do you think the prisoners appreciate that?—Yes, I think so.

4963. You know they generally talk about subjects the visitor cannot interfere with, such as their sentences and so on. You think they would complain to the visitors?—They all know that they may, I think.

4964. You think there is some good in it?—Yes, decidedly.

4965. I know you have devoted a great deal of attention to the question of insanity among prisoners. You have visited Broadmoor, and gone into it closely?—Yes.

4966. I think, when there was that controversy about insanity, you went closely into it?—I read the account of it.

4967. Would you give the Committee your views on that?—I think the figures as given were quite misleading. I think it is a very unfair comparison to take the daily average number of a shifting population like the prison population and compare it with a stationary population like the outside population.

4968. I think you made some comparison also between the insane prisoner and the insane paupers?—Yes, I think that the pauper classes can be shown to produce a great deal more insanity than the others. I am speaking now roughly from memory, but I believe the ratio of insanity in the general population is about 30 per 10,000, and the ratio of pauper insane and idiots to paupers of all classes is about 10 per cent.

4969. (Mr. O'Connor.) Have you checked that from the Registrar-General's return?—No, that is from the Commissioners in Lunacy's report, but I have not been able to get hold of one within the last few days, and I am quoting these figures from memory, but I know there is an enormous difference.

4970. (Dr. Bridges.) In speaking of the pauper class you are speaking of the population of the county lunatic asylums, are you not?—Yes, and the Commissioners of Lunacy, as far as I recollect, give the per-centage of pauper insane and idiots in ratio to the pauper classes.

4971. Is not it the case that the population of what are called the pauper county lunatic asylums is not really paupers—most of them?—No.

4972. A very large number of them—I should say at least half of them—are of the non-pauper class?—Yes, but they are of the labouring class largely. That depends on where the lunatic asylum is.

4973. I mean statistics based on the ordinary current roll of pauperism would be greatly misleading, would not it?—It might be, but the criminal classes are largely recruited from the lower orders.

4974. (Sir Algernon West.) Could you undertake more labour?—No, I think with our small number we have as much as we can do.

4975. That is with your stockings, your tailoring, and your washing?—Yes.

4976. And I may take it from your evidence that in approving the system of Star prisoners you really approve of classification?—Yes, certainly.

4977. (Mr. O'Connor.) How many convicts have you now at Woking?—I think it is 207 this morning.

4978. Do you know the total number in the country?—No, but roughly speaking, I think there are about 40 or 50 more in the local prisons, but I do not know what the number is now.

4979. You would have abundance of room for them at Woking?—Yes.

4980. And when the prison is removed to Aylesbury there will be abundance of room for them also?—I cannot say what the accommodation at Aylesbury is. I believe it is somewhere about 300, and if so, there probably will be.

4981. As I understand it now, women who are sentenced to two years are sent to local prisons?—Yes.

Dr. Brayn.

9 Nov. 1894.

4982. And those sentenced to three years are sent to convict prisons? — Yes, they would come to Woking.

4983. But the first nine months of a convict sentence is served in the local prison. Is not that so?—Well, it has been modified somewhat recently. Within the last few months we have been receiving all the London women almost immediately after conviction, but in some of the country prisons they still continue to do the nine months: for instance, at Knutsford, at Leeds, and one or two other places.

4984. Generally throughout the country that is the system, is it not?—Yes.

4985. And for solitary confinement?—There is no such thing as solitary confinement now. There is separate confinement.

4986. I mean in the local prisons?—I do not know the system of the local prisons.

4987. Was not there once a prison set apart as a reception prison, namely, Millbank?—Yes; I have been at Millbank and also at Pentonville. That was a reception prison. It was a general, receiving, and distributing prison.

4988. And there the first part of the sentence was performed?—Yes; there were only males at Pentonville.

4989. For some reason or other certain local prisons have now been selected for the first nine months of the service such as Leeds and Knutsford and some others which have been mentioned, Durham, I think, being among them?—Well, we get very few female prisoners from Durham.

4990. Wormwood Scrubs was one?—These London women did do the first nine months at Wormwood Scrubs, but now they are coming on to us.

4991. Did not some convicts do their first nine months at Aylesbury?—I do not know. They would be male convicts; not any female convicts.

4992. All the London women now do their first nine months at Woking?—Well, I do not know whether that is a settled rule, but we have been receiving them lately, and some I have received from Holloway without going to Wormwood Scrubs at all.

4993. Would not it be attended with economy if the first nine months of service was performed in the convict prison rather than in the local prison?—I do not quite see where it would make a difference.

4994. It would not cost any more money?—No. It would be only the expense of removal, and that would be just the same at the beginning of the nine months as it would be at the end.

4995. The system which is now in vogue of sending convicts to local prisons for the first nine months is limited to certain particular prisons?—I am not quite certain about that, but I think they had what they called district prisons. They took prisoners from a certain distance round, I think. I do not know about that for certain.

4996. At any rate with regard to some of the existing prisons the system would not suit. They could not apply the system to all prisons?—No, I think not. Not to very small ones, I think.

4997. Was not Stafford once a receiving prison?—Yes, Stafford was a receiving prison before Knutsford.

4998. Did not they spend a lot of money in getting it ready?—I do not know.

4999. Did not the governor of Stafford object to receiving them for nine months?—I have never been in the local prison service and I do not know.

5000. He got rid of them. They were sent to Knutsford?—Yes, they were sent to Knutsford. That I believe is quite correct.

5001. The women who are at Woking earn remission of their sentence?—Yes, one third.

5002. And some of them are sent, or used to be sent, to homes for the last portion of their service?—Yes, to refuges.

5003. From your experience would you say that was a good system?—Yes, I think so. We select the women for it. Only suitable women are sent to refuges, and a woman who has once been to a refuge is not allowed to go again if it is found the refuge treatment has no effect upon her, or she has returned again to prison from a refuge.

5004. Do you see any reason why a regulation for women sentenced for three years should not answer for women sentenced to two years?—I do not know anything about two years' sentences as I have never been in a prison where a two years' sentence has been carried out.

5005. You say as far as you have been able to observe the system of removing women for the last portion of their term to homes or refuges is attended with good results?—Yes, I think so. It is not quite the last portion of their sentence. It is the last portion of their minimum time.

5006. After that they are free?—No, they are on licence.

5007. But they are outside?—Yes, but they have not completed their sentence.

5008. But that is the last portion they serve in a state of detention?—Yes, they serve it in the refuge instead of serving it in the prison.

5009. What I want to know is this: As far as you can say, or as far as you have been able to judge, is there any reason why that system which answers for long sentences should not also answer for shorter sentences, like two years?—Three years' women do not go to refuges. The shortest sentence women that go to refuges are the five years' sentences.

5010. Why should not the system be extended to women who are sentenced not only for three years or four years, but to two years?—It would leave hardly any imprisonment. You see a three years' woman is licensed at two years. If she were to spend the nine months before that in the refuge she would only have a little over a year in prison.

5011. Wherein consists the advantage, then, of the system as applied to women of longer sentences?—Well, we get to know more about them.

5012. But the feature which you said was advantageous was their presence in a home or a refuge instead of a prison?—Yes, and we consider we ought to keep them long enough to earn, as we call it, the privilege of going to a refuge. If they do not go through their classes, and conduct themselves properly and earn their marks, and so on, we should not have them long enough to know much about them, I think.

5013. How long does it take you to learn sufficient about a prisoner to know whether she ought to go to a refuge?—A woman very often will go through her separate confinement very well, but in association we find she is quite different.

5014. Does the advantage, then, attach to a long sentence of five years or to the transfer from the prison to the home, where the sentence is a five years' sentence?—I have really hardly thought that matter out so as to be able to give an opinion straight off.

5015. But if the advantage attaches to the transfer to a home why should it be apparent only in long sentences?—Well, the incidence would not be equal, because supposing they went for the same time you would be giving the short sentence women a great deal larger proportion off their time than you would be the longer sentence prisoners.

5016. You think imprisonment is a good thing?—I think it teaches them habits of order, and it weans them from drink—a large proportion of female convicts are drunkards.

5017. Is there a strict discipline in the refuges?—I do not think it is so strict as ours, and there is more unrestricted association.

5018. Do not you think it would have a better educational effect than the present system?—I do not think they have any education at all in the refuges.

5019. Do not you think the discipline of a home or a refuge, such as it is, would have an equally good educational effect with the prison discipline?—No, I do not know that it would.

5020. Would not the governors of most local prisons be rather glad to be relieved of the convicts?—That I do not know. I have not spoken to any of them about it.

5021. At any rate you would prefer to have them from the beginning?—Yes.

5022. Another thing I want to ask is as to this hour of conversation which is allowed to women. Do you think that does any harm?—No, I do not think so. I think it would if you mixed up old offenders with young ones.

5023. But I mean managed in the discreet way in which it is now?—No, I do not think so.

5024. It would be a great infliction on the women to deprive them of it?—I think they would be very much disappointed if it were taken away.

5025. It would be cruel?—I do not know about cruel, but it would be thought a hardship.

5026. It would be an infliction?—Yes.

5027. You yourself would think so?—Yes, I think it would be so thought by the prisoners.

5028. And the longer their detention——?—The greater they would feel it.

5029. (Chairman.) Are you of opinion that continuous sedentary work for women is a good thing?—I have never found any ill effects from it. Ours is not continuous sedentary work. When a prisoner gets up in the morning she has to put her cell in order; after that they go to chapel; then they sit down for an hour or two; and then they have their exercise. Then again, so many are taken out every day for cleaning the wards, and that sort of thing, for part of the day. And there are various other interruptions, so that they are not sitting down the whole day long.

5030. I gather that laundry work is the best work which is suitable for women?—Yes, I think so.

5031. Have you any lady visitors?—No, there are none appointed.

5032. Do you think it would be desirable to have them?—Well, I doubt it very much. It is so difficult to get people of the right sort.

5033. If you could find them of the right sort, do you think it would be desirable?—I think if you could keep out the sentimentalist and faddist it would act very well.

5034 You do not find the sentimentalist and faddist existing among the present visitors?—No, I do not think so.

5035. With regard to the hours of talking, there is no supervision of groups is there?—Yes, there is an officer with them all the time.

5036. With each group?—No, within the ward.

5037. They cannot hear what the different groups are saying?—Of course, if they were talking about something they did not want the warder to hear they might prevent it.

5038. In fact they might talk about anything they liked as long as the warder was not within earshot?—Yes.

5039. Do you think it does any harm?—No.

5040. Should you allow any three women to associate?—Well, occasionally we find it is advisable to separate one woman from another, but only very occasionally.

5041. But you think the system works quite well?—Yes, I think so, as a rule.

5042. With regard to insanity, have you paid any attention to the general statistics of insanity in local prisons?—No, I have not, except those I saw in the paper that Mr. Morrison has given.

5043. But still, from your experience of convict prisons, you would be able to check these figures to some extent, in your mind?—Yes.

5044. Could you tell the Committee your general impression?—No, except that I think it is not fair to take the daily average number as the basis for calculation, because it varies so much according to the length of sentences. One man with a year's sentence gives the same daily average as 12 men with a month; each gives a daily average of one. If the one man became insane, or only one of the 12, the per-centage would be just the same.

5045. Have you ever in your experience known insanity to be produced by prison life?—No.

5046. Have you ever known a case?—No, I cannot recollect one. I have never known a case. I have known cases occur in prison which had something probably to do with the prisoner's own vicious habits in prison, but it had nothing to do with the imprisonment.

5047. (Mr. O'Connor.) You have a number of Catholic prisoners at Woking?—Yes, about 70.

5048. There is a chaplain?—There is a Catholic priest.

5049. He is chaplain to the place?—Yes, he is on the staff.

5050. Do you have Catholic prisoners, or prisoners coming from other prisons, who, after they reach Woking, ask to have their religious register altered? Yes.

5051. Do you find among those cases, cases of people who have been registered as Protestants in local prisons, and who want to be registered as Catholics at Woking?—Yes, we have found it to be so.

5052. Have you any reason to believe that that is due to the fact that in local prisons there are Protestant chaplains where there are no Catholic chaplains, and that the Protestant prisoners go to prayers in chapel every day while the Catholic prisoners are in their cells, and the prisoners register themselves as Protestant in order to get the change of going to chapel rather than remain in their cells?—I have heard that the prisoners have said so.

5053. The prisoners in Woking?—Yes, but I have only their word for it. I do not know whether it is true or not.

5054. But they would be the best authorities on that, would they not?—They may be, but prisoners do not always tell the truth.

5055. (Sir Algernon West.) Women on being released from prison might go into some institution between a prison and perfect freedom to test them for a year if such a thing as a laundry could be found for them. I think you have had some ideas about that?—I think we ought to have State assistance for prisoners on discharge.

5056. And if they work satisfactorily after being subjected to the temptations of out-door life for a year, that on a certificate to that effect they would get places easier than they do on coming direct from prison?—I believe the Catholic Refuge at Finchley does that now. When a woman goes to the refuge at Finchley she goes for nine months, and then if they will not stay any longer than they are compelled the nuns will not give them a reference, but if they will stay there for two years and show they intend to lead a better life the nuns will assist them.

5057. But during those two years they have comparative freedom?—I would like to see workshops provided for them, where they could redeem their character and earn a living.

5058. And at the end of that time a certificate from that workshop would probably get them employment?—Yes.

5059. (Mr. O'Connor.) Have you seen the Finchley Institution?—No, I have never been there, but I have talked it over with the priest.

5060. It was at Finchley that I learned from prisoners the fact about the change of religion for the purpose of getting out of the cells?—Yes.

The witness withdrew.

At this stage of the proceedings the Chair was taken by Sir J. E. Dorington.

Miss E. Little.

9 Nov. 1894.

Miss ELIZABETH LITTLE called and examined.

5061. (Miss Orme.) You are the matron at Strangeways?—Yes.

5062. How long have you been there?—36 years in October.

5063. And always as matron?—No, I was 10 years as warder, six years as deputy matron, and 20 years as matron.

5064. Then you have knowledge both of the system before 1877 and now?—Yes.

5065. Have you any opinion as to the system you worked best under?—I think I have worked pretty well under both.

5066. Do you think the general arrangements now under the present system are as good for women prisoners as they were under the old system?—Yes, I think so.

5067. Do you have large receptions at Strangeways?—Yes.

5068. About how large?—I have had as large as 64, but that, of course, is a large reception.

5069. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) On one day?—Yes, that is the largest I have had this year.

5070. (Miss Orme.) What is about the average?—About 20 I should think, or over 20.

5071. How many reception cells have you?—Six. There are five and one, which is rather dark. There are six boxes.

5072. Can you describe to us what is your system when the prisoners come in first. Do you put them into one room altogether or do you put them into separate boxes?—Into separate boxes as far as we can.

5073. Supposing 64 come in together?—Then we should have to double them and that kind of thing.

5074. Then do they wait in the room together?—In cells. They have to be put in the different cells and one in each box.

5075. But when you have a large reception like that, I should think you have to have some of them actually waiting together?—There are not cells enough. It is really too small.

5076. Are they in separate cells or together?—Together. We cannot avoid it.

5077. Do you find it possible to keep anything like order when a number of them are together?—Well, it would be better if it were larger; that is certain. Certainly, I think the reception cells are too small in number.

5078. You would like to have more reception cells so that you could have each one in a separate cell?—Yes, I would.

5079. Have you any system, such as they have in Glasgow, for putting them into one set of cells before they have the bath, and another set of cells after they come out of the bath?—I have not.

5080. Then you would like a number of boxes for them first, and a number of cells for them after they have had a bath?—Yes, I should.

5081. But how many should you say would really be advisable?—I should think quite 20.

5082. With regard to the visits of the doctor, he of course, during a heavy reception like that, sees them the next morning?—Always the day they come in.

5083. Even when they come in late?—Even when they come in late. He has to be sent for if he happens to have gone away and he has to return and see them.

5084. Does not that make it a very hurried affair. The doctor cannot give very long to each one?—I think he has ample time to examine them.

5085. You do not think that is too much hurried?—I think not.

5086. Then with regard to the punishments for prison offences, what punishment do you generally use?—The governor who punishes usually gives bread and water, and very, very seldom the handcuffs.

5087. Do you find the handcuffs are bad in their influence?—I do not care a lot about handcuffs, but sometimes if they will tear up things and repeat that kind of thing you are obliged to have some restraint.

5088. Do you find dietary punishments at all good for them? Do you approve of them?—I am not very fond of dietary punishments.

5089. But you are obliged to use them?—We are obliged to use them a little; that is certain; but we do not use them a great deal.

5090. What is the best form of punishment you have? What do you most approve of?—I wish we could have something not to take away the diet so much. I am rather against that.

5091. For instance, do you find that withdrawing them from associated work is a good punishment?—Yes.

5092. That has a good effect on them?—Yes, because they like to get back to the laundry and washhouse. They are brought out if they misbehave themselves in any way, but I have very little trouble in the laundry or washhouse.

5093. Do you have much trouble with women generally as to breaking the prison rules?—Very little indeed considering the number I have.

5094. And you have had some very difficult cases, have not you?—Yes, some very difficult cases indeed.

5095. What do you attribute your success to?—I think they like me. I think I have got at their hearts somehow or other, and I think they would be sorry to offend me. I ought not to say it, but I feel they like me; they trust me, and would be sorry to offend me.

5096. Should you say the prisoners who break the prison rules are just a small number of those you have, or are they pretty well spread over the prison?—It is just a small number of them.

5097. Who break the rules over and over again?—Yes.

5098. I suppose you very often find there are those who come back to you a good many times?—Yes, but I have very few of them.

5099. How large a number of the female prisoners do you think a good active matron can really look after?—Well, I think she ought not to have more than 200.

5100. Then what should you recommend in the case of a very much larger number in one prison? Should you say there should be a deputy matron?—I think so.

5101. Above the position of a warder?—Yes; may I say that before I was appointed matron I was deputy matron. In the magistrates' days there was a deputy matron, but after that there was a chief warder.

5102. And you think in a large prison a deputy matron is the best plan?—I do. I think it is quite essential.

5103. How long do you generally go away for, for your autumn vacation?—I am allowed six weeks, but I have seldom or never taken it. This year I went away for a month. Perhaps I go away for three weeks as a general rule.

5104. What is the reason for your only going away for such a short time?—Well, I think really we have not a large staff.

5105. And you do not care to be away?—I do not care to be away so long, because I am rather short-handed.

5106. You do not feel quite at ease as to whether things are well conducted while you are away?—I feel there is a lot of responsibility on my chief warder.

5107. So that while you are away you do not get the full benefit of your rest, because you are still anxious about your work?—Yes.

5108. But if you had a deputy matron you think that would not occur?—I think it would be all right.

5109. You do not think there can be any help by having someone specially to take the duty for the period while the matron is away?—I scarcely think it would answer so well to take someone from another place as to have a person on the spot who was accustomed to the place.

5110. Then with regard, not to the matron herself, but to the other warders, do you think it is a good system to introduce temporary warders if there is over work?—I do not.

5111. You do not get much help from them?—I would rather have one well-trained warder that four or five temporaries; simply because the prisoners do not heed them or respect them the same as they would a well-tried officer.

5112. And I suppose it rather upsets your discipline if people of that kind are introduced?—Yes.

5113. Then do you think in the case of a prison like this, where you have the large number of receptions you have and the rapid change, that the staff is sufficient?—No, I do not think it is sufficient for a large local prison.

5114. Are your warders ever kept working over the hours they expect to work? Are they sometimes kept later than usual?—Not much later; I try to avoid that as much as I can. Of course those that are on duty have to work very hard.

5115. Have you a good Protestant chapel at Strangeways?—Not very large.

5116. Have the prisoners to sit quite close to each other?—Very close.

5117. Then I suppose they exchange some little talk?—Yes, I am afraid they do do some little talking in chapel.

5118. Do you think it is a matter of great importance to discipline, to have the chapel large enough to have the prisoners separated?—I do.

5119. Could that be met by having a service twice a day, and half of them attending each time?—Yes, it could be done by having a service twice a day.

5120. Would you approve of it?—Yes, I should not mind that myself.

5121. You would rather have that than have the prisoners sitting quite close to each other?—I would. I think it would be much better.

5122. What exercise do your prisoners get? Do they go out every day?—Every day when it is fine, except on Sundays.

5123. Not on Sundays?—Not on Sundays.

5124. Is that because part of the staff is away on Sundays?—Yes, it is. One half as nearly as possible is away, but of course if they do not go on Sunday they go on week-days.

5125. What sort of exercise do the prisoners have?—They walk round rings, round circles.

5126. That is all?—That is all.

5127. Should you approve of their having simple form of arm exercise, extension exercises as they are called, for the younger ones so as to give them some different exercise from walking?—I have not thought about that.

5128. Have you any opinion as to the effect the food has on their health; for instance, the first-class diet?—I think the first-class diet is too little.

5129. And do you find them refuse it?—Occasionally they do, when they have been having drink; and I have so many come in for drink. They generally leave it the first day or the second.

5130. What modification should you suggest, just in a general way, for that?—I should give them gruel instead of giving them the stirabout for dinner, and instead of giving them bread and water morning and night I should give them gruel for morning and night. I should divide the bread into three parts, and let them have a warm meal morning and night.

5131. I think you have no suggestions to make as to the treatment of infants in prisons. You think the present system as good as can be?—Yes, I think it is rather nice. They have their little cradles and they seem very happy there.

5132. In your prison the mother who has the charge of an infant does work besides?—Yes, she does work, but we do not task them; some of them that have a baby will do ever so much work. They like it when the baby is quiet and the little thing will sit in its cradle.

5133. Then they do not work in association?—Oh, dear no.

5134. With regard to the work that you have in your prison, which is the best?—The laundry work I like the best.

5135. How many have you now employed in it?—About 46, as near as I can tell you.

5136. Will you tell the Committee the sort of laundry work you do?—Yes.

5137. It is not merely rough laundry work, is it?—No. Private families, magistrates, judges, members of Parliament. I am doing at present for Mr. Justice Wills. He brought his work to me when he came on circuit, and I have sent it to London to him. I have done it also for Mr. Justice Day. They take a very great interest in this work, which earns over 1,000*l.* a year at it. Besides teaching the prisoner something, they like it. It is teaching them something; they think it is nice work, and I believe it raises the standard of life altogether. It is something interesting, to give them other but prison work to look at, and they take an interest in doing it prettily.

5138. How long does it take you to teach them to do that good work, for instance, ironing?—Well, for shirts, I dare say they take a couple of days.

5139. Do you mean if a rough woman, a vagrant, comes in, you could teach her in two days?—I would not put her direct on to shirts.

5140. How long has she been in the prison before she becomes a skilled workwoman?—Not very long.

5141. About how long?—We give her some plainer work to commence with, and then better work; we give them better work as they go along.

5142. And how long does the training take?—Well, I think I should give her a week.

5143. Really?—Yes, and then I think she would do it.

5144. Then even your short sentences are able to do this work?—I have some short sentences there now. I cannot help myself.

5145. And they are doing this laundry work?—Yes.

5146. And you find it really very good for the discipline of the prison that they should have that to do?—I do, indeed, because they like it, and they think it a privilege, and it makes them behave themselves.

5147. Do you say you could really train them to do the ironing in a week?—Yes.

5148. Then you have a very good laundry have not you?—Yes, very good indeed, it is very nice; the Commissioners had a new laundry made for me.

5149. When was that?—Some years ago, and then our late inspector got the men to do the washing in order that I might undertake more profitable washing, and both he and Admiral Hornby gave me great assistance.

5150. Have you any other industries?—Yes, we have mail bag making, sewing, knitting, and making surplices for the English prisons.

5151. (Chairman.) For the chaplains?—Yes, they are sent to London and to every part of England, but my hands have to be taught. They are just my own women.

5152. (Miss Orme.) Not by sewing machine work?—No, it is all beautiful hand work; and lovely they are.

5153. What warders do you put in charge for these industries over the different branches of needlework, laundrywork, and so on?—Just the warders whom I select for the purpose.

5154. Do you find that you can get warders that are suitable for the work, or do some of them have to be trained?—Some of them do not know it, some of my warders have not known how to knit when I wanted my prisoners taught knitting.

5155. Have you any suggestions to make as to that? Do you think there is any system by which any persons instructed in a particular industry you want taught could be sent to you?—I think it is a great thing for them to be asked whether they could knit or make shirts or do that sort of thing; but I think that is not asked in the regulations.

5156. They send you a very good warder as regards character and all that, but she has not got the particular training you want?—Not always.

5157. And then you have to do it yourself?—Yes.

5158. What is your opinion of the effect of very short sentences on female prisoners, do you think it has a deterrent effect?—I scarcely think so.

5159. Do you think they get at all improved?—No.

5160. Do you think there is any advantage in sending a woman to prison, say, for a week, and then letting her out again?—I do not think so.

5161. I suppose you get them back again over and over again?—Yes.

5162. Would you describe the way in which they come back again and feel that the prison is their old home?—They really do. Some of them do not like to leave it. They have expressed to me that they would rather remain there than go out. Several of them have done so. They get perfectly comfortable inside and it is not so bad as they thought even as first offenders.

5163. And when they come in they seem to know pretty well their way about, do not they?—They do.

5164. Do you find they always state that they belong to the same religion?—No, they do not, they change; sometimes they say they are Protestants and sometimes Roman Catholics; they change their religion very frequently.

5165. Do you know any reason for that?—I do not know because the Protestant and the Catholic priest have their alternate days. We had some question as to their religion; and there is now a Catholic service on alternate days.

5166. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You have a Catholic priest?—Yes, and they have their services on alternate days.

5167. Alternate days with the Protestant service?—Yes.

5168. So that it is exactly the same whether they are Protestants or Catholics so far as attending services is concerned?—Yes, it is now.

5169. (Miss Orme.) You have no idea why they change about?—They do not change so much as they did, but I think it was really to keep in the chapel when we had the Roman Catholic service less.

5170. They professed to believe in that which had the service more frequently?—Yes.

5171. Do you find that they receive many visits from their friends?—Yes, they do when they are due. Untried prisoners, of course, can have their visits daily.

5172. But as to the prisoners under sentence, do their friends come and see them as often as they might?—I do not think so.

5173. Then you do not think there is any necessity to increase that privilege and have the visits more frequently?—I do not know about that.

5174. Do they take the opportunities they have of writing letters?—Yes, they like to write the letters. That is a great deal to look forward to; that is where the marks come in, they do not like losing their marks and it helps them to get their marks to get the letters and so on.

5175. Would you be glad to extend the privilege of writing letters? Would you like them to write more than they do at present?—I should be glad if they could be more helped in that way.

5176. Have you ever had any lady visitor in your prison?—Never.

5177. Have you felt a wish for that?—Well, I heard from the governor I was with so many years, Major Preston, who had them to deal with, that he did not get on at all well with them. He said there was a kind of bad feeling between them, the prisoners, and the officers. I do not know whether I should do right to repeat his words, "I have not had the experience, "but I think we should want ladies that thoroughly "understood it."

5178. Then you have Prisoners' Aid Societies in Manchester?—Yes.

5179. Do you think they are of great use?—Yes, lately there has been more done for the prisoners, but I do not think they have done so much for them.

5180. What is the practice?—The governor sees them and hears what the prisoner has to say. He hears their requests whatever they may be. He enters them upon some kind of form and sends them to the "Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society" and he gives the prisoner a letter to go there and see what they want, for instance a dress, a bonnet, a pair of boots, or whatever it may be. He gives them a note to whatever effect he can.

5181. But they do not see a member of the Society before they leave the prison?—No, it is the governor that does this.

5182. Would they be permitted to be in communication with any of the Aid Societies they liked? Do they know about the existence of more than one Society?—They know they can be helped. I have various applications every day for help and lately it has been more so.

5183. Applications from the prisoners?—Yes, for help. They have been recommended to the Society and helped.

5184. From your long experience do you think that the effect of industrial schools or reformatories on girls is generally good?—Well, I have had these girls come back again, and sometimes I have thought a few of them were rather more naughty.

5185. You speak of reformatories; but I suppose you have often had prisoners who have also been in industrial schools?—Yes, occasionally.

5186. Have you formed any opinion as to the effect upon them of training in an industrial school?—No, I have not in industrial schools, I was really speaking of reformatory girls.

5187. Do you find that many of your untried prisoners ask you to give them some occupation in their cells?—Yes, they do, to pass the time away, they say; they volunteer it; they would rather have it.

5188. Should you approve of their having regular occupation? Do you think it is a mistake to let them remain in idleness if they can work?—I think occupation does a great deal of good for everyone. I think it takes them off themselves. I am glad when they ask for work. It takes them off thinking about other things, and, perhaps, things that are not beneficial at all.

5189. We should be glad to hear from you any suggestions you wish to make as to any point that has struck you in the treatment of prisoners; for instance, I should like to ask you about this: The matron of a large prison, a first-class prison, does not wear uniform, does she?—I wear uniform.

5190. Do you?—Yes, I do. I was ordered some little time ago to wear it according to a uniform pattern, but it would have been degrading to me to have worn it, though I believe I should have had to have done so, only for Sir John Hibbert.

5191. As a general rule should you say that the position of a matron and her influence over the warders and prisoners would be superior if she were not what is called a uniform officer?—Yes.

5192. You are strongly of that opinion?—Yes.

5193. When you say you wear "uniform" you mean uniform of your own choosing?—Yes, they give me the material and I have it made up in my own way as I had always had it done, only I was found fault with a little time ago.

5194. You think it would have a weakening effect over your prisoners if you were dressed exactly the same as your chief warder?—Yes, I do not think it is right because I would not have the same influence over them.

5195. (Mr. De Rutzen.) May I assume that your idea would be that it would be necessary, so far as you can, to so far impress people who have been once in prison that they should not come again?—I do not quite follow you, sir.

5196. One of the great things, I suppose, is to deter prisoners who have gone through the degradation of being sent to jail from coming there again?—Yes, certainly.

5197. Now a great many of your prisoners come very often?—Yes, they come very often, indeed.

5198. And express rather a pleasure at returning?—A few of them do, and they have said so; but really they seem to have no home at all.

5199. They have no home outside?—Yes, that is so.

5200. And they think a prison is better than no home at all?—They say it is better than the workhouse, they say so frequently.

5201. And when they have to choose between two evils, the workhouse and the prison they have told you they come to the prison for choice?—I do not think they have told me that.

5202. Well in effect they have?—Yes, they seem to say it is better than the workhouse, several of them have said it is very much better than the workhouse.

5203. You have, I hear, a great many people come in every day?—Yes.

5204. And amongst them women on remand?—Yes.

5205. Now sometimes some of them are put in cells if you have got room, and some are waiting in the room if you have not got room in the cells?—Yes.

5206. Is there any difference made between those who come on remand and the others?—Yes.

5207. Do you know at that moment which they are?—Yes, we know what we are receiving.

5208. And are you careful about putting those who come in on remand separately from the others at once?—Yes, I think we are pretty careful about that: we are pretty careful about the remanded and untried prisoners.

5209. (Sir Algernon West.) I am afraid from what you have said that you have not much belief in the reformatory effect of a prison?—Well, they come back again sometimes, I have thought, rather naughty girls, after they have been in a reformatory.

5210. I do not mean the reformatory school, but that there is no effect really from the prison discipline. Are you a believer in the reform which is worked on prisoners by being in prison?—Well, I think as regards the laundry work, it does good.

5211. You are very much in favour of laundry work, but, I think, this is the first time we have heard of any fine laundry work being done in prison. Do you employ skilled instructors at your laundry work?—No, they are just my regular officers.

5212. They teach the fine work; you have given us instances of several judges and others they have worked for, but would the way the washing is done satisfy ladies?—Yes, we do washing for ladies and beautiful, lovely washing it is.

5213. And only taught by the warders?—Yes.

5214. And warders who had no previous knowledge as you say?—Some of them may not have had, but they get some knowledge of it when they come there.

5215. Seeing the good effect of this finer washing would you be in favour of prisoners earning some wages on their own account?—I think it would be a great encouragement to them.

5216. You know they do so both in Belgium and Holland?—No.

5217. They earn slight wages, half of which goes to the prisoner?—I think it would be a great encouragement to them.

5218. And with that they are entitled to purchase luxuries for themselves in prison or to send it to their friends. Would you be in favour of that?—No, not to send luxuries to them.

5219. No, they may either send what they earn at the end of the week to their friends, perhaps their wives—well it would be the other way with you—or they may spend this small sum in purchasing white bread or little luxuries of that kind; and, in the case of male prisoners, tobacco, and so on. Do you think that would do?—I do not think that would do in prison, but I may be mistaken.

5220. Would you be in favour as an encouragement of enabling the female prisoners to ornament their cells and have a looking-glass or something of that kind?—I believe some prisons they have looking-glasses.

5221. Do you make any distinction between married and unmarried women, women who have to go back to their homes and those who have to earn their livelihood?—Yes, with those that have to earn their livelihood.

5222. You do make a distinction?—Yes.

5223. You really do make a classification in your prison and judge from your intelligence that one sort of work is better for one woman than it is for another?—Yes, you can tell.

5224. Would you be in favour of a much more extended classification of prisoners according to whether they are first convictions or people who have come back three or four times?—I really think that first convictions should be kept as much as possible to themselves. I think first offenders should.

5225. And I am afraid you would come to the conclusion that people who have been there three or four times are really hopeless?—Well, I should think they would come again; and they do, I am sorry to say.

5226. You have a governor and deputy-governor at Strangeways, have not you?—No, a chief warder.

5227. Will you kindly explain to me what is your position when the governor is away?—I have to look after the prison; only the chief warder comes to deal with the reports if there are any.

5228. The chief warder takes the position of the governor?—Yes.

5229. And you are in the same position to the chief warder as you are to the governor?—Yes.

5230. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) When the governor is away are not you the head of the prison?—I think almost the only thing he does is that he takes the reports of prisoners, or of officers, if there are any to be heard.

5231. You are not responsible for the prison, as a whole, if the governor is away?—No.

5232. You think the chief warder is?—The male chief warder, he deals with any report by prisoner or officer.

5233. (Sir Algernon West.) And, therefore, really your position to the chief warder is the same as it is to the governor. Do you think that a proper arrangement?—No, I do not think it is quite the thing. It would be different if there were a deputy-governor.

5234. How many prisoners are there altogether in Strangeways?—There are 800 odd men, and I have had 400 women several times lately; but I think it was 361 when I came away. I have had pretty well up to 400. It is a very large prison to manage.

5235. (Miss Orme.) It is 1,115?—I have 362 certified cells.

5236. (Mr O'Connor.) What have you to say about young girls who are sentenced for the first time?—Do you mean juveniles?

5237. Yes?—You mean that would afterwards be sent to a reformatory school.

5238. Whatever might happen in that way, but speaking of girls, say, under 17 years of age?—Juveniles ought not to come to prison at all. If they are going to a reformatory, there ought to be some way of sending them direct without coming to prison at all. I have a feeling that any young girls of 13, 14, or 15, that have to go to reformatory schools, should go direct, and not as they do now, come into prison for three weeks or a month, and then go to a reformatory school, perhaps, for five years afterwards.

5239. What is the age of the youngest prisoner you have?—Do you mean that I have had?

5240. That you have now?—No, I have not any juveniles at all now. I have them at 17 and 18, but not what I call young children.

5241. You have some of 17 now?—Yes, and 18.

Miss E. Little.
9 Nov. 1894.

5242. You have one of 17 now?—Yes, I think I have.

5243. Do you think that is an age at which girls ought to be sent to prison?—Well, I think 16 is a fair age.

5244. But you have not anybody at 16?—No, I have not. Well, I do think 17 is rather young.

5245. Have you any girls waiting to go to reformatories?—I have not any at present, but there are some who have to undergo say a fortnight or three weeks' imprisonment and then go for five years to a reformatory.

5246. Have you had any during the last month?—Yes. If it can be arranged to send them direct from the Court in any way I think it would be better. I wonder whether anything could be arranged in Court so as to remand the girl in any way so as to let her go direct to the reformatory.

5247. At any rate you think it is a bad thing to send girls to prison?—Yes. I have always thought it better to send them direct to a reformatory if it could be done. If there was any middle sort of place it would do. I was wondering whether it could possibly be arranged at the Courts where they are tried.

5248. Do you know whether any considerable proportion of the girls who come to you as prisoners have been laundry girls?—No, I do not know.

5249. You do not know that laundry girls furnish you with an undue proportion of prisoners?—No.

5250. Do I understand that in your opinion it distinctly raises the tone and improves the character or helps to improve the character of prisoners to give them work of an increasingly good kind as they behave better?—Yes, I do think it raises the standard of them altogether.

5251. The utter want of occupation is bad?—I do think so.

5252. You think the prisoners ought always to have some occupation?—I do.

5253. And that occupation should be as advanced and as cheerful as possible?—Yes, I think that.

5254. And in the discretion of the governor or matron to put a prisoner back in the scale in case it was necessary as a punishment?—Yes.

5255. (Dr. Bridges.) You have, I think, about 400 prisoners, or something of that kind, under your care?—Yes.

5256. You said, I think, that you would, if you could, separate first offenders from the others?—Yes, I should like very much to do so.

5257. How many first offenders have you now in your prison and under your care as matron?—Not very many that have not been in prison before.

5258. Have you 30 or 40?—I might have 30, but scarcely that many.

5259. It would not be much more?—I was calculating on the number of receptions this year, which is over 6,000 women; and out of that number there were very few that had not been convicted before, perhaps there were 1,000 or so that had not been convicted before; that is to say, that 6,000 odd passed through my prison in the year, about 1,000 of whom had not been convicted before.*

5260. So that when you speak of separating, if possible, those first offenders, it would be a very small class indeed that would be so separated?—Yes.

5261. Quite a small class?—Yes.

5262. Are your cells for women all filled now?—Yes, and I have been more than filled. I have had to double some.

5263. During the present year?—Yes, during this present year. I have 362 certified cells, and I have had 400 prisoners. Of course I have 21 in hospital, and then I have room for the association of eight in an associated room.

5264. Do the 362 certified cells include the hospital cells?—No.

5265. Then you have 21 hospital cells?—Yes.

5266. You were speaking about associated cells?—Yes, I have a room which will associate eight, which is sometimes used by the doctor for mental cases that we have to have officers sit up with.

5267. Have you any in your cells in addition to that associated room. Have you in some of your cells had more than one prisoner?—Yes.

5268. Has that happened frequently this year?—Yes, several times this year.

5269. Then in every sense of the word the place has been overcrowded?—Yes, I have had too many prisoners. I think, really, the day Mr. Gladstone came I was obliged to double some; 6,883 passed through the prison this year, and I could not help it.

5270. So that in such a condition as that, anything like setting apart a special ward or a special department of the prison for first offences, becomes a difficulty?—Yes, I am too crowded to do it.

5271. I suppose in reference to any classifications in prison, you must have a certain number of empty cells?—Yes. Might I make a suggestion that has just come into my head?

5272. Yes?—I have thought, sometimes, when the prison was quite full, whether they could not be sent from the courts to other prisons, quite as near to Manchester as the courts from whence they are committed. I wonder if that could be done, and then it would not keep us so crowded.

5273. Of the women who come under your care, you have told us that a great number have come to you very often indeed?—Yes.

5274. Are those generally cases of drunkenness?—Many of them. They generally tell me it is drink that has been the cause of their coming.

5275. Have you also cases of systematic thieves who come over and over again?—Yes.

5276. Those are not necessarily drunkards?—Well, they say it was drink that first caused them to steal; they fall back on drink as the first cause, and when they do steal, they say they would not have done it unless they had been tipsy.

5277. You do not know whether that is quite a true statement?—No.

5278. I suppose you have some of those whom I may call habitual drunkards?—Yes.

5279. Do some of them strike you as not having all their wits about them. I am not talking of the time when they are drunk, but after they become sober, have you any that seem half-witted?—I have not so many of that class. I think they get right in a day or two, but some are not as bright as others, especially if they have drunk a lot.

5280. You have not many of the class that you would call feeble-minded?—No, not many.

5281. With regard to the question of washing on which you have given us such interesting information, can you say whether many of the women who have learned this skilled laundry work, earn a living by laundry work after they leave the prison?—Yes, I have heard so. I have been told by one or two that come back again that they met with some friends and got some drink, and that they have earned as much as 1*l.* and 30*s.* per week; and they told me that they had not the slightest difficulty in getting the work, but that they would take them into the laundries, without character, if they could do the work.

5282. And they had learned that in prison?—Yes, they had.

5283. Have you ever heard any complaints made that the skilled laundry work you do in prison takes the bread out of the mouths of the hard-working people outside?—I have never heard it so said myself.

5284. That complaint has not come before you at all?—No, it has not.

5285. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Have you ever represented to any of the inspectors that your prison is overcrowded?—I think the inspector must have known it. He knows the number of cells I have.

5286. You have not made any complaint about it yourself?—No, I did not, because that of course would be left to the governor.

* See Col. Garsia's evidence, 11,702. Females received 6,515, of which number 1,043 had not been previously convicted.

5287. It has been the practice occasionally to remove prisoners from one prison to another?—Yes, a transfer.

5288. Has that been the case with your women?—Yes, I have had transfers.

5289. You have had 50 or 60 taken away from your prison?—Yes, and transferred to Knutsford, Liverpool, and Preston.

5290. I suppose you object to having your prisoners in association?—They get on very nicely in the laundry.

5291. I mean in the sleeping rooms and dormitories?—Yes, I would rather have them in one cell if it could be done. At present I happen to be a little lower in numbers.

5292. To-day, at present you have got one cell vacant?—Yes, but I do not suppose I have more.

5293. You said you objected to dietary punishments very much, why do you do that, is it too lowering for them?—I do not like to see the prisoners lowered too much.

5294. It is too punishing?—Yes. I am happy to say we have very little of that where I am.

5295. But you have punishments occasionally?—Yes, we have occasionally, but very little.

5296. I want to get your exact reason why you object to this?—I think it lowers the constitution. I think considering the way they live outside it weakens the constitution.

5297. They are not fit to have a lower diet?—No, I think they are not.

5298. And the governor comes to you every day?—Yes.

5299. Are your warders resident in the prison?—Yes, all of them.

5300. So that you have got them all under your own hand?—Yes.

5301. You say you would get over the difficulty as to the chapel by having two services, but would that interfere with the order of your prison?—Yes, it would with the labour.

5302. A certain quantity of your warders would be on duty in the chapel when you wanted them elsewhere?—Yes.

5303. So that that would hardly work very well would it?—I was thinking it would not, because if we had two chapels a day it would take up so much time.

5304. It would get over the difficulty of the overcrowding, but it would make difficulties in the prison and you would want more warders?—Yes.

5305. Supposing your prisoners were habitually transferred to another prison and sent 50 miles away, would there be any grievance to the prisoners in it?—Some of the prisoners like to stay; they do not like to go. It is really rather amusing but they say "do not "send me from my own prison, matron," when they are going away.

5306. Does that apply to you or to their own locality?—I do not know, but they pretend it is me, though it may be their own locality.

5307. A prisoner in my county jail was most unmanageable and we tried to find out what was the matter. Apparently it was that she was out of her own district and when we satisfied her about that, she became quite manageable. I ask you if that is a common case, and whether it would be establishing a grievance among prisoners if they were sent to a distance?—It might, I think.

5308. In that case it would not be possible to carry out the transfers on a large scale?—No.

5309. But you have transferred?—Yes, we have been obliged to.

5310. Where do you transfer to?—To Knutsford, Preston, and Liverpool.

5311. They say that they prefer the prison to the workhouse. Is it that your diet is better?—Well, they seem to like the diet, but I think sometimes they have more chance of quarrelling with others in the workhouse. They are kept in more order in the prisons and they disagree sometimes in the workhouse. They have told me so. They have better chances of quarrelling.

5312. The prison is more orderly?—Yes.

5313. And therefore they like it better?—Yes.

5314. I suppose the bedding would be about the same in both?—Yes.

5315. And the diet not much different?—Not much different, I think. I think the diet is pretty good except the first class diet.

5316. You get about 1,000 first convictions every year. Do you think a large number of those return to you?—Yes, I am afraid so. I think they do.

5317. You think the number of prisoners who come on a second conviction is a very considerable proportion?—Yes, I think it is really.

5318. You have got about 5,000 a year who are old offenders apparently?—Yes.

5319. But they may have been eight or ten times, and that multiplies their number very much?—Yes, besides they may have been in another prison, so that one cannot get at what is really a first offender.

5320. (Sir Algernon West.) Cannot you tell from your great experience a person who has been in prison before by the way she falls into the ways of the prison?—One could have a little idea of it.

5321. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Do not you find a woman who says she has never been in prison before sometimes knows all about the prison, and therefore you can judge by that?—Yes, I can find it out that way.

5322. I should have thought you would have been tolerably correct in your judgment whether a person was a first offender?—Yes.

5323. In that respect your statement is probably nearly correct, that you have about 1,000 first offenders and about 6,000 that have been in prison before?—Yes, I think that is about it. I think that is what the governor said to me.

5324. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Will you just tell me this, how many days in succession have you ever had your cells overcrowded?—I could not exactly say that.

5325. Have you ever had it for more than a day or two?—Yes.

5326. For how long?—I should think I have sometimes had them doubled for three or four days.

5327. But every time you had your cells overcrowded, I suppose you would report it to the governor?—Yes, the governor knew it.

5328. Have you found that they have been detained for any length of time after you have reported the fact that your cells were overcrowded, or has it been immediately rectified by sending away a certain number of the prisoners?—Well, I do not think so, not quite. I do not think they have been sent away exactly at once.

5329. Then, perhaps, you could tell me for how long a time together you have known the cells to have been systematically overcrowded?—Well, it has occurred several times.

5330. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Has it gone on for a week?—Not for a week in succession.

5331. (Mr. De Rutzen.) For two or three days?—Yes, I should think so. We have had a few doubled for two or three days.

5332. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Then have you been relieved by transfer or discharge?—By discharge.

5333. (Mr. De Rutzen.) And a transfer from time to time as the numbers increased?—Yes.

5334. Do you find that on certain occasions. You have a great influx of prisoners into the prison?—Well, if there is anything particular going on in Manchester it might be so sometimes.

5335. You get a great influx sometimes?—Yes, we have done sometimes.

5336. And a sudden influx?—Yes, I think we have sometimes.

5337. And then, I suppose, upon that being reported to the governor with reference to the state of the cells, some orders are given to transfer?—Yes, certainly.

Miss E. Little.

9 Nov. 1894.

5338. (Miss Orme.) I have just one question to ask you. Your warders have one mess all to themselves, have not they?—Yes.

5339. They all mess together?—Yes.

5340. Who cooks the food?—A prisoner.

5341. Do you approve of prisoners who are on prison diet cooking ordinary food?—No, I think it would be much better to have a person told off for that, other than a prisoner.

5342. An officer to do the cooking?—Yes, I do.

5343. Do you think it rather an aggravation to the prisoners?—I do, although there is an officer about there generally; still I think perhaps it is a little temptation to them.

5344. Do you think it is a matter of sufficient importance to recommend the appointment of an officer specially to do the cooking?—I do. I think it would be really a good thing.

5345. (Mr. O'Connor.) I see by the last report that the reception ward on the male side is actually now in course of enlargement?—Yes, it is.

5346. How is it they do not enlarge the reception cells on the female side?—I do not know I am sure.

5347. Did you make any application or did you have any opportunity of doing it?—I think it is quite well known that it is too small for the receptions.

5348. How often does the inspector go to Strangeways?—Once a month.

5349. Has he ever been there when there has been doubling going on?—I am not quite sure about that. I could not be positive about that.

5350. I see from this report that you had 26 women under the age of 21—would the observation that you made about the young girls extend up to girls up to 21?—No, I think not up to the age of 21.

The witness withdrew.

At this stage of the proceedings the chair was taken by Sir Algernon West.

Miss M. J. Bell.

Mrs. Mary Jane Bell called and examined.

5351. (Miss Orme.) You are matron at Holloway, are you not?—Yes.

5352. How long have you been there?—For three years on the 1st of July.

5353. As matron?—Yes, as matron.

5354. Will you tell the Committee where you were before in the prison service?—I was at Walton Prison near Liverpool.

5355. In what capacity?—For five years as chief warder, and before that as warder.

5356. You have never acted as deputy matron anywhere?—No, I have not. The chief warder is next to the matron at Walton.

5357. In Holloway you have not very much opportunity of teaching women any work, have you?—No, because their sentences are so short that we have not got them with us very long.

5358. Can you just tell us roughly what proportion of very short sentences are in as compared with the whole number of your prisoners?—At this time we have not any prisoners whose sentence exceeds three months, but previously to the last month we had some long sentence prisoners.

5359. About how many have you for seven days, generally speaking. Just give me a rough idea of it?—For about a month and under, I should think I have 150.

5360. With the class of prisoners you get—these London prisoners—do you find that you can teach them any work during that period?—No; I do not find that they are very anxious to receive instruction, because they do not take an interest in it when the sentence is so short.

5361. What do you generally employ them on?—There are those that pick oakum, that is, those who cannot do anything else, those who cannot do needlework. Then we have some who make mail bags, mend bags, and make mattresses for the War Department.

5362. Which do you think most suitable for your prisoners?—The mail bag making is easier.

5363. They take a very short time to learn that, do not they?—Only a few days; that is if they are at all expert.

5364. They cannot spoil it much?—Yes. It wastes a great deal of time if they have to undo their work. It is very difficult to undo.

5365. Do they spoil their material?—No.

5366. That is much more popular, is it not than oakum picking?—Yes, those who can use the needle like it very much.

5367. Do you find there is a very great dislike to the oakum picking amongst prisoners?—Undoubtedly there is; but I think it is a dislike to work in any form, more than in particular a dislike for the oakum picking. I think it is really that they are inclined to be idle. I think those that are idle at oakum picking would be idle at needlework.

5368. But I thought that at Holloway the dislike to oakum picking was really a cause of want of discipline and of prison offences?—Not in that sense. Not many attempt to choose their work, but many fail to complete their task of oakum, and get reported.

5369. Do not they stuff it down their ventilators?—They do.

5370. What punishments do you generally employ?—For light offences a day's close confinement. They have neither exercise nor chapel then. Sometimes we give them two days No. 2 punishment diet. When the punishment is dietary, it is generally No. 2 punishment diet, but that is not very often.

5371. And which of these punishments do you think on the whole the best, the dietary punishment or the confinement in the cell. I mean which is best for their character?—Where a prisoner is receiving a fairly good diet I think dietary punishment is the best, but where a prisoner's diet is lower, I do not recommend the loss of diet at all.

5372. Do you find locking them up in that way and not allowing them to go to chapel, or take exercise has an effect on their mind?—I think they consider it a great privilege to go out of their cells, and therefore it is to some extent a punishment. More than that, when they are deprived of exercise, or chapel, because of misconduct, I think it makes them careful as to their behaviour in future.

5373. You have very little opportunity of punishing them by withdrawing them from associated work?—Scarcely any, because as a rule the prisoners employed in association, that is, in the kitchens or the laundry, very seldom commit themselves.

5374. They are the well-behaved ones?—Yes. Of course they are selected from the best-behaved.

5375. But if they did break the prison rules it would be a very salutary form of punishment to take the privilege away?—Yes.

5376. Then I suppose you find the associated work very popular with them?—Yes, to give them work out of their cells.

5377. Do you give them work to do in the way of cleaning and that sort of thing about the prison?—Yes. They like that very much.

5378. They come to you in a very wretched state of health, do they not?—A very large proportion of them are in bad health.

5379. From drinking chiefly?—I should say it is from drinking and from their mode of living.

5380. And when they first come to you they do not take much food?—Well, I do not think except the low No. 1 diet, that they refuse very much.

5381. But as to that first diet?—The No. 1 diet is very much disliked.

5382. The stirabout?—Yes; a great deal is refused.

5383. And they not only refuse it, but it makes them insubordinate, does it not?—They have troubled the doctor a great deal for a change of diet. That has been a cause of a considerable portion of the insubordination.

5384. And then if the doctor refuses have not they sometimes been violent?—Yes. In fact at one time it was quite the custom if the doctor did not increase the diet at dinner, to knock their window glass out.

5385. Do you think that was the sole reason for it?—I thought that was the sole reason for some of it, not for all, perhaps not more than half of it, but it was a reason for some of it.

5386. What is the general number that you receive in a day from the police courts. What is your average?—Our average is about 50 or 60.

5387. And what is about the highest number that you had last year should you say?—I had 78.

5388. Do they come to you late in the day?—Yes, they do. Usually they begin coming in about half-past three, and sometimes they come as late as half-past eight or even later than that sometimes. We receive up to ten o'clock.

5389. What time would you really feel the work is over if they come in as late as that?—The reception work is, as a rule, not over very much before 10.

5390. And sometimes later than that?—Yes, sometimes it is later than that.

5391. What is about the latest you have ever had it on hand?—It has been as late as half-past 11; I think once it was a few minutes before 12 o'clock.

5392. You begin work at six in the morning?—Yes.

5393. Would you explain to the Committee the arrangement of the hours that your warders have as to a long day and a short day and the break in the afternoon?—The officers take turns in doing long days' duty, the evening duty. Those officers who are for duty in the evening come in at six in the morning and they go off at four o'clock and come on again at a quarter before six.

5394. That is one-and-three-quarters hours' rest?—Yes, and they may be on duty until 10 o'clock if it is a busy night, and then they may be able to have a little rest and get a little supper. But if the duty requires it of course they have to do it. It is their turn to do that every fortnight; the other days they go off at 6; three days out of every four the officers are on duty till 6 p.m.; the fourth day till 10 o'clock, or later if required.

5395. Then those that go off at 6 do not have that one-and-three quarters hours in the afternoon?—No.

5396. It occasionally happens, does it not, that a warder who is on duty until 10 sleeps in the prison and is liable to be called up by prisoners ringing the bell through the night?—Yes; the officer who has gone off duty and come on again at 6 would do this. They take it in turns. That is the object of sleeping in, and if there is any occasion to get up they get up.

5397. And answer the bell that rings from the cell?—Yes.

5398. Your warders all sleep out as a general rule, do not they. You have none in the prison?—We have one in each wing; the others sleep in their quarters.

5399. Then that warder who has the night duty comes on at 6 one morning and she is on duty with those periods of rest all through the day, and she then stays in the prison through the night instead of going home?—Yes.

5400. And the next day she comes on at 6 in the morning?—Yes.

5401. And stops until 6 in the evening?—Yes.

5402. Do you consider those hours too long for warders who have to exercise moral suasion over disorderly prisoners?—I do. I think if an officer conscientiously does her duty it is a strain upon her mind perhaps more than upon her body.

5403. Have you noticed that it has had any effect upon the health of the women who have been working under you. Have they shown any bad effects of overwork?—No, officers have been off duty sick, but it has not been attributed to that in every case. It is chiefly colds.

5404. Do you feel the strain yourself to be very great in managing a prison of this sort?—I certainly do. I at times feel very anxious; and at all times when on duty there is a great deal of responsibility, and one cannot help being anxious.

5405. Should you say from what you know generally of prisons that it would be a wise plan to make special arrangements in prisons of difficulty like Holloway where you have a varying class to deal with?—I think the hours of duty are the best to go upon.

5406. Do you think the duty should be rather shorter in prisons of special difficulty like Holloway and Liverpool than in prisons where there are small receptions and more regular work?—Yes. I think it is very trying on the officers where they have short sentence prisoners, they are very much more difficult to deal with. I would like to say at the same time that it is not very often officers have had duty after 10 o'clock, but it has occurred. Just shortly after my coming I think (I do not know what took place before) it was occasionally so; but perhaps for two years now there has been scarcely a time when it has; but just lately there were four occasions when the officers were on duty later, and we have given them an equivalent for it afterwards.

5407. Yes, but you do not give them any equivalent for that night duty when they stay in the prison all through the night. That is in the regular course?—Yes.

5408. (Dr. Bridges.) I think you told us that you received sometimes 50 cases daily?—Yes, I think it averages about that.

5409. And your extreme number is how much?—We have received as many as 78. I recollect that number.

5410. You have a certain number of mental cases, cases of insanity, that have been removed?—Yes.

5411. I see according to the report that there are 29 such cases that have been removed from the female side of Holloway?—But they are chiefly remand cases. They are remanded to inquire into the state of their mind, and we have them a week while they are under observation. We have had convict prisoners who have been sent to asylums.

5412. But the number of convict prisoners who have been sent to asylums is comparatively small?—Yes.

5413. They are mostly remand cases?—Yes.

5414. And cases that remained under observation for a few days?—Yes.

5415. The number of convict prisoners amongst whom insanity has shown itself has been very small?—Very small. There have been only a few cases to my knowledge.

5416. With regard to diet, you have a considerable number of cases of women who have been in repeatedly with short sentences?—Yes, we have.

5417. You mean people going out on a Saturday and coming in again on a Monday, and so on?—Yes.

5418. In those cases if they were put on No. 1 diet that No. 1 diet would be practically continuous during a long period of time?—It would; but the doctor's attention is called to such cases so that he may, if he thinks it necessary, in his opinion, give them a higher class diet; that is if they come in within seven days after having gone out on No. 1 diet. If they come in within seven days the doctor's attention is called to it so that he may, if necessary, give them a higher diet so that it would not be continuous.

5419. As a matter of fact then, by the intervention of the doctor the diet is generally altered?—Yes, it is altered when the doctor thinks it necessary.

5420. Does that alteration as far as you know take place frequently; are there many cases in which the doctor has thought it necessary?—Yes, there are a fair number of cases.

Miss M. J. Bell.

5421. What is it, about half?—Yes, I should say so.

5422. You mean in about half these continuous cases the diet is altered, and in the other half the doctor thinks it necessary to leave it as it is?—Well, I think not half. There are not very many who are put on extra diet for that reason.

5423. If you were asked to make suggestions about improvement would you be in favour of altering No. 1 diet?—Yes. I was anxious to see an alteration in No. 1 diet and very gladly welcomed an alternative diet recently introduced.

5424. Will you tell me what the alteration should be in your opinion?—A pint of gruel for breakfast with six ozs. of bread; a pint of gruel for dinner with five ozs. of bread; and the same for supper; that is three pints of gruel in the day and one pound bread.

5425. Gruel made with two ozs. of meal?—Yes, two ozs. of meal.

5426. You think that is better for their health?—No, because they will not eat it if they do not want it.

5427. You think perhaps it is rather calculated to encourage them to come to prison?—They do not eat all the bread.

5428. I suppose a great many of these cases come in with a very bad condition of stomach from having been drinking too much?—Yes, there are a great many cases of that sort, and I think that kind of food is not palatable to them.

5429. (Sir Algernon West.) Your experience is of a considerable number of short terms?—Yes. They are shorter than at Liverpool.

5430. But on the general question of discipline you would not be able to give evidence so much as on this particular prison?—I was thinking of Holloway specially.

5431. We have been told at Holloway there have been times when that has been very much overcrowded. Has that been so during the time you have been matron there?—On one or two occasions since I have been there there were some prisoners in a room; eight, I think it was.

5432. You mean in an association room?—Yes.

5433. Because there was not room in the cells?—Yes; it was just after I went there.

5434. How long ago would that be?—It would be quite three years ago.

5435. Your prisoners, during the sessions at London, go to Newgate?—No, they go down to the court daily and return.

5436. There are no female prisoners kept at Newgate?—No.

5437. You have had a good deal of experience of oakum-picking?—Yes.

5439. I should like to ask you if you have any general suggestions to make?—As regards the treatment of prisoners?

5440. Yes; generally whether your experience has led you to think that anything can be improved on the present system?—As regards the treatment in prison I do not think there is any improvement needed. They seem to have everything that is in reason.

5441. But what we are considering is whether there should be a greater classification of prisoners. Have you any views about that?—Yes, I have. In fact I feel very sorry that first offenders have to see the other portion of the prison at all. I think if it is possible there should be a separate prison for them.

5442. Would you give us your opinion as to what age you think a girl should cease to be considered as a girl?—I think from 16.

5443. Do not you think that 16 is very young?—It is young, but I think they have all womanly instincts at that time.

5444. And you would like to see first offenders and people who have been there two or three times entirely separated?—I think after a prisoner has been a second time it is not much use doing anything for her in the way of classification in prison, I mean not otherwise.

5445. When they have been there two or three times, you think it is practically a hopeless case?—Yes, I think it is equal to 10 times as regards classification.

5446. And you think you would have great hope of first offenders, and that hope would be increased if, in Holloway, they could be put in a separate part of the prison?—A separate prison entirely, if possible.

5447. Would you be in favour of the abolition of prison altogether for young girls?—I would, very much. I think, in fact, I feel sure, that young people have, in many instances, the fear of prison taken away when they come out.

5448. I suppose your experience is that the first turn of the key in the prison is the most terrible part to everyone; they get accustomed to it afterwards?—Yes, after the first day.

5449. Then you would be opposed to imprisonment for juveniles at all, but you would put your age not higher than 16?—I am afraid I do not quite follow you.

5450. You are opposed to girls being put into prison at all?—Yes, I am.

5451. I want to ask you whether you think that should not be extended to rather more than 16 years?—Yes; I think, perhaps, at 16 they are practically children. I think, perhaps, 18 or 19 would be better.

5452. We have just had some very interesting evidence from the matron at Strangeways, who says she thinks the prisoners benefit very much by having a better class of work to do, such as fine washing. She thinks it is an improvement and a reward to do fine washing?—Yes, I think it would be an improvement where they can do it.

5453. But you would like to see a separation in the work between young women who are likely to have work when they go out, and married women who are likely to go back to their homes. Would you like to see a distinction between the work given to those classes of women?—I do not know. I have not thought about it.

The witness withdrew.

The proceedings were adjourned until Thursday, the 15th of November 1894, at 12.

ELEVENTH DAY

Home Office, Whitehall.

Thursday, 15th November 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B. (CHAIRMAN).

JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
Miss ELIZA ORME.
JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Miss FRY called and examined.

Miss Fry.

15 Nov. 1894.

5454. (Sir Algernon West.) I think you occupy the position of honorary secretary to what is called the "Elizabeth Fry Refuge"?—Yes.

5455. How long have you held that honorary secretaryship?—I have been there about 10 years.

5456. Would you kindly tell us what were the objects of that refuge when it was first started, and whether those objects are still carried out?—Its object was to receive female prisoners, not of the lowest stamp, but those who had been servants, who had committed thefts and so forth. It was started after the death of Mrs. Elizabeth Fry, in memory of her, to carry on her works so far as possible, and it has been working ever since that time, which is now nearly 50 years ago.

5457. When you say it is "to take in women who are not great criminals," how do you distinguish them?—Well, we received them chiefly from the London prisons when there used to be more prisons than there are now. They chiefly come from Holloway. I myself visit Holloway Prison and see cases which I think will be suitable, and Mr. Merrick, the chaplain there, who knows well the work of our institution, selects those he thinks suitable, and they are sent to the "Elizabeth Fry" Refuge.

5458. Do you receive any gratuities from the State for keeping these women?—Yes, we receive l. with each woman.

5459. And that is all?—That is all, which does not, I need not say, pay their expenses, and we keep them about six months.

5460. Will you tell me how many prisoners you have at the present time?—We can take 32 women, and, as a rule, we are full, but sometimes we have, of course, a vacancy.

5461. Those women have all been convicted of crime and sentenced to imprisonment?—Now comes the subject. Of late years they have brought us remand cases from the police courts, which have been brought by the missionaries, or sometimes sent upon the recommendation of Mr. Merrick from the remand side of Holloway. During the past year, 1893, we received 91 women altogether into our home, of whom 28 were remand cases, and the bulk of the remand cases do not do well. They are very troublesome in the home, and when they go out to service, which is the means we have of helping them, they do not do well, as a rule. Of course there are exceptions. I think out of that number, 28, as far as we know (and we do know pretty well, because Miss Reynolds follows them afterwards) four only have done well, and we feel often that they would have been much better for having a month or two months in prison.

5462. Do those who have had a term of imprisonment, as a rule, do better?—They do far better.

5463. Could you tell the Committee at all, the proportion of women that you think are really living honest lives after leaving your refuge?—Do you mean in a year, or do you mean altogether?

5464. Well, will you tell us first in a year?—I have got our report of last year. According to present knowledge 56 are hopeful, 27 doubtful; as to eight we cannot say. That is out of 91 who were received.

5465. In fact that gives a much larger proportion of well-doers than the remand cases do?—Yes.

5466. As to the remand cases how do they get off their term of imprisonment?—In the present day they are very anxious to avoid giving sentences to what they call first offenders.

5467. (Mr. De Rutzen.) May I ask Miss Fry if she can form any opinion as to what the charge originally was, or whether the women were principally drunken or disorderly people?—No, by no means—small thefts.

5468. (Sir Algernon West.) And the magistrate has taken advantage of the First Offenders' Act to send them to you?—Yes, and very often we feel (without much disrespect to the magistrates) without much judgment, that those women who have been troublesome, though they may not have been actually taken up, are sent to the home when really they want punishment; and after punishment our experience is that many of them are very anxious to turn over a new leaf. Another thing, I think, is that in the present day at the police courts, there are such a number of people who are after the women, so to speak. There are the missionaries, and various ladies who come to them, and so forth, so that they think they are worth anything to them, and that everybody wants to get them; so that when they get to the homes they are saucy, and unwilling to submit to the rules, and they give our matrons far more trouble than those who had had a sentence.

5469. Mr. Trevarthen told us that he was extremely anxious that every boy who went to Redhill Reformatory should have purged himself by imprisonment before he went there. What do you say about that?—I am not sure he is not right. If they are really put to the disgrace of the prison (speaking of those that I see in Holloway myself,) and the sentence, they desire never to come again. I mean to say if they really wish to do better it makes them feel the necessity of behaving themselves, and when they go out to service of behaving themselves also. But, of course, many of these cases really come from drink. There is no doubt about that; and I am sorry to say that those are the cases of which I may say not one out of 20 certainly reforms. They will go on very well for three or four weeks, and then they always invariably go back to drink, and sometimes in our home they will ask to be kept longer because they feel themselves they cannot keep from the drink, and we have kept them sometimes for a year, or two years. Of course, while they are there, they are all right; but at the end of that time, or soon after they get released, I am sorry to say they almost invariably go back to the drink.

Miss Fry.

15 Nov. 1894.

5470. These women are all voluntary inmates of your refuge?—Yes.

5471. Even the remand cases?—Yes, they are practically voluntary, but I feel that they ought to be sentenced to a certain length of time. You see they come to us for six months. I do not say they ought to be sentenced to our home, but they ought to be sentenced to a home where they are kept for a longer term.

5472. Is there anything punitive in your discipline, that is to say, is your discipline disagreeable to them?—Oh, no, not at all. They are as happy as the day is long I believe, and those that have tried to do well almost invariably say when they go out how extremely happy they have been. We have excellent matrons to whom they really become attached, and they come back to see us over and over again after they have left, and we give them a reward at the end of the year if they remain in their situations and have a good character. I think there is nothing of that sort at all.

5473. Do you think you find the general public ready to take cases that are recommended by you as being likely cases?—Yes, I think our cases are rather favourites with the class of people who take the servants. There are a certain class of people, not of a very high social position perhaps, but people who are anxious to help in philanthropic work, and rather in that way than any other, people who keep one servant. I should never recommend them to take these girls where there was more than one servant, but only in cases where they work rather with the mistress.

5474. Would you recommend the extension of a refuge such as yours, supposing you are aided by the State?—Yes, I think so. Undoubtedly it is a refuge which has a good character, though perhaps I say it that should not; but people like Mr. Merrick, and people who know about it, look upon it as one of their first refuges. We were for a long time rather pressed to take convicts for the last nine months. You know they are sent to a home for nine months before they are set at large.

5475. What has been your experience with regard to the convicts who have served their time and come to you for the nine months?—Well, there are some who have done well. It entirely depends upon the nature of their offence. Of course we have the power of sending them back and then they would have to finish their term. Therefore we have a great hold over them while they are in the refuge, but of course it is not a good thing for the other women to have people with them who have committed burglary—say fifty times—and all that sort of thing.

5476. From the startling statement you made to us, that not one out of twenty drunkards reformed, would you be of opinion that there should be a reformatory to detain such women?—Certainly.

5477. You are very strong about that?—Yes. At Holloway some times there are women who have been there fifty or sixty times in the year for a week. What on earth is the good of that?

5478. Have you in your mind at all any idea if these women were sent to a permanent home for habitual drunkards how that would be paid for. Have you any idea that it could be made self-supporting in any way?—I think they could to a certain extent, because we are self-supporting to a certain extent, though we depend on subscriptions as well, but they can do laundry work and needlework; and such things as that, of course, are remunerative. I should say after they have been taken up for drink five times, or whatever number you like to fix, that they ought to be sentenced for not less than a year to an inebriate home where they are treated for it as a disease. It is no use for less than a year.

5479. And even if so, after those terrible statistics you have given us, I suppose that is not much?—I should like to say two years.

5480. From your great experience, will you give us any general opinions you have before we pass to the detailed questions which Miss Orme and other members of the Committee will put to you? Will you give us any general opinions you have as to the improvement of these women beyond what you have said as to habitual drunkards?—I do not think I can. Of course there are the remand cases as I told you. I do not know that there is any other particular improvement that I should suggest.

5481. (Miss Orme.) What sort of industry do you teach the women in your homes?—Laundry work, and, of course, they do all the work of the house, cooking, parlour work, house work, laundry work, and needlework. We make some of the Government shirts for the navy, and we make all our own outfits, and we take in needlework. We often have orders from ladies for needlework for giving away and that kind of thing.

5482. And I believe the women make their own dresses?—Yes, everything that is used in the home. We give them outfits when they go to service, and it is all made by them in the home.

5483. Do you consider the sort of needlework they do will be particularly useful to them as domestic servants?—Certainly. They do plain needlework of all sorts. They have to mend their things as well.

5484. Have you skilled instructors?—We have what we call a workroom superintendent, a person who is able to see that things are properly given out and properly made, and who is responsible for them.

5485. What sort of work do you think is, on the whole, most suitable to teach these women with a view to their earning their living afterwards?—Of course for our class of women, especially house work, because they are intended to be servants. I think it is not a good thing their being taught that which leads them to laundry work. There is nothing more pernicious to the women than going to the public laundries. There is no question about that. They are sometimes a drunken set and a bad set, and they earn perhaps a 1*s.* a day and go home. But some of these girls like it because they have their liberty in the evening.

5486. Should you say that criticism applies equally to the finer sorts of washing, such as ironing?—Where they are done at those public laundries it is the laundry itself which is the bad place.

5487. For instance, we find that some women in the provincial prisons are educated very carefully in fine laundry work and ironing?—Yes.

5488. Then, I suppose they may get good places as laundry maids in private families. That you would approve of?—Thoroughly.

5489. You do not think the temptation to go into the common laundry and live in their own homes would be a bad thing?—If they wish to be disreputable, of course. There are a certain number who prefer the laundry work, because they can go out into the streets and do what they like after their work is over, and they have their shilling perhaps in their hand.

5490. So long as these women are with you they never go outside your door?—Yes, there is generally one who is occasionally sent out to post, or anything of that sort.

5491. For errands?—Yes.

5492. But you do not license them out as girls are licensed out in reformatories?—No, they never go outside the gates.

5493. Is it your opinion that that is the best possible plan?—Well, of course, we could not exactly trust them out. We should not know what they were up to.

5494. If you had women in your house, say for two years, do you think it would be possible for some months before they leave you to let them go out for a day's work so as to try them on their own responsibility?—I do not think we could work that with our present house and our present staff and all that sort of thing. There are homes which receive them for longer periods, say for a year, two years, and so forth; but we only keep them now for six months, and therefore many of them are willing to come to our home who are not willing to go to one where they would be kept for two years. You can hardly wonder at it.

5495. From your experience of such women should you say it would be a good thing to have a home where they could be gradually allowed their liberty instead of suddenly leaving absolute seclusion?—Of course that is the plan with the convicts when they let them come to these homes for nine months, although they are not allowed out; they have a great deal more indulgence and comfort so to speak than they have in a convict prison, but with regard to the other women they are not like women who have not had their liberty for a long time. A convict prisoner has perhaps not been at liberty for 10 or 15 years, but these women have not had perhaps more than a three months' sentence, so that they are used to public life, so to speak.

5496. I believe you have had cases where they get on very well with you, but almost immediately after leaving your home they have been tempted to drink?—Yes.

5497. Convicts?—Yes and the other women too.

5498. Do not you think you might obviate that difficulty by giving them a certain amount of liberty before they finally leave you, by letting them go out for a day and seeing whether they return without going into a public-house?—Well, I do not think we should be very willing to try it in our home.

5499. Do you think it would be a good plan in a home organised specially for the purpose?—Yes, I think that might be. Of course constantly they would get drink when they went out, and we cannot tell what other harm they get. That is where it is. You cannot tell what company they get into if they are out by themselves for a day.

5500. So that you think it would be a dangerous experiment?—I think very dangerous.

5501. I believe you have no convicts in your home now?—No, not at present.

5502. To what do you attribute the fact that you have none now when you used to have some?—Partly, I think, because we have been rather disagreeable about it. The last one or two they suggested to us, I think we said were not suitable for our home and we sent one back who misbehaved herself and so forth, and we are not altogether sorry that we have not got them. At the same time we have never had any notice of anything of the sort. I may also say that there are much fewer convicts.

5503. Because of the short sentences that are now being given?—Yes, there are much fewer convicts.

5504. Have you had any complaint from some of the women as to their not having the benefit of a home like yours when they have only a three years' sentence?—No.

5505. Has that matter come before you?—No. Do you mean convicts.

5506. I mean the convicts sentenced only to three years. They do not get any period at the end of their time in a home?—I did not know that.

5507. How long do you think really a young girl ought to be in your home in order to have any material benefit done to her—I do not mean an habitual drunkard?—Well, to go through a real course of training and so on, I should say certainly not less than a year.

5508. But you think it would be of advantage to her probably to be with you longer than that?—I think in many cases it would if they would stay, but being a voluntary home we cannot say they shall stop a year, or they would say, "we will leave to-morrow." However, we insist on their giving us a week's notice, and I think only one left in the whole year of her own accord.

5509. Supposing these girls were sentenced to remain with you for a certain period, what should you consider a really beneficial time, so that you might have a chance of making respectable servant girls out of them?—I think a year would do it. I think some would think it unfair if others were sentenced to less time. I think if some were actually allowed to go out at the end of six months, others would consider it unfair. Those who were kept in for a longer time would consider it unfair to them if they were being kept longer under the same roof and in the same home.

5510. I mean to say supposing you could say what sentence a girl ought to have to remain in a home like yours compulsorily, in order that you might have the best chance of turning her out a respectable servant with a chance of getting good wages?—Well, I should say a year.

5511. Have you had any girls in your Home that you have known to have been in industrial schools?—No, not that I know of.

5512. Or in reformatories?—No.

5513. So that you have no practical experience of the effect of these institutions?—No.

5514. What do you think is the effect of imprisonment on a woman who goes into Holloway, say, for the first time. What do you think is the effect on her mind?—Well, according to what they express, if they are really not low women, I think the shame of the thing makes them intensely anxious never to go back again.

5515. So that the first imprisonment is really a wholesome thing?—I think so.

5516. You have, of course, a good deal of conversation with those that you visit in Holloway?—Yes.

5517. Do you think that the arrangements for religious services and visits of the chaplain, and so forth, are the most beneficial that could be suggested for women?—Well, in the first place there are such an enormous number of women that, of course, the chaplain can give a very short time to each of them. They have to attend the services daily.

5518. You mean the prisoners have?—Yes.

5519. Do you think those prison services have much effect on them?—Well, I am not prepared to say that I think they have.

5520. What form of religious worship do you have in your own home?—We have the clergyman. He is not a High Churchman. You see we profess to be undenominational. We have had a City missionary, who has held services on Sunday and in the week days, and a most excellent man he is; we have had him ever since the foundation of the home, but I am sorry to say that now he is getting very old and past his work, and of late we have had the clergyman of the parish, Mr. Morecombe, who is also, I think, a nice man, and he or his curates have taken a service one evening in the week. Then the City missionary comes on Sunday, and some lay person comes in the afternoon, and gives them a little reading and so forth.

5521. Then, of course, you have daily prayers?—Yes, by the matron.

5522. And all that is arranged to be carried on in an undenominational form?—Yes.

5523. Do you think it would be an advantage in large prisons like Holloway to have female scripture readers?—An admirable thing.

5524. In addition to the chaplain?—I should think so.

5525. I believe you are a member of the Prisoners' Aid Society?—Personally, do you mean.

5526. Yes?—No, I do not think I am.

5527. Have you had much to do with those societies?—No, I have not.

5528. So that you have no opinion as to whether they are working usefully?—No, I have not.

5529. You say you find employment for women chiefly in domestic service?—Yes, I might say solely.

5530. Then, what do the women who learn laundry work with you do? Where do they go?—Into the small places, where they have to do laundry work generally.

5531. Even in London?—Yes.

Miss Fry.
15 Nov. 1894.

5532. Do most of your girls go into London service?—Yes, or the suburbs—those endless small places which there are, such as at Dalston, and that sort of place.

5533. You said you thought an habitual drunkard's home could be made almost self-supporting?—Well, perhaps, almost self-supporting is too much to say; but certainly they could earn a good bit of money.

5534. But supposing the women were sent for, say, two years, would it not bring it much nearer self-supporting than yours?—Yes.

5535. Because they would get more skill?—Yes, that is our difficulty in our laundry work. We keep them such a short time, that by the time they are good ironers they go away from us.

5536. But if you had none but women who were in for two years, you could make it pay much better?—Yes.

5537. Do you get as much work as you want?—Yes.

5538. From private families?—Chiefly.

5539. You have a good drying ground and a large laundry, I think?—Yes.

5540. How many hours a day do your inmates work?—Well, I do not know that I can tell you that exactly.

5541. But about?—I think they have their breakfast at 8, and then they leave off at 6, I think.

5542. Then they stop for dinner?—Yes, and they have an hour in the garden after dinner. Then in the evening they are read to, and so on.

5543. They do not work again in the evening?—Not at laundry work.

5544. And you never have over hours in case of a sudden order for laundry work, do you?—No, except very occasionally.

5545. Then really they do not do nearly as long a day's work with you as if they were in a laundry?—Well, I suppose in a public laundry they stop work at 6 o'clock, do not they?

5546. I wish they did?—I do not know anything about that.

5547. If you worked them for the regular labour day they would pay better than they do now?—I say we stop at 6, but I am not prepared to say that if the laundry work were not quite finished that they would not have to go on for another hour; I think that is so.

5548. Do you give them anything in the way of instruction?—Yes, they learn to read and write, and have a little schooling.

5549. What time in the day is that done?—That is done in the work-room. I cannot tell you exactly at what time of the day.

5550. And, so far, that interrupts the work?—Yes, it interrupts the needlework.

5551. And those who are working in the laundry?—I do not know what happens to them.

5552. It does not interfere with their day's work?—No.

5553. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I have in my hand a book which gives a list of the reformatory and refuge unions; does the one I have marked refer to your refuge?—(the book was handed to the witness.) Yes, that is ours, only it is not a year, it is six months.

5554. This is for 1892, and therefore there is a little difference now; but is the accommodation the same now as it was then?—Yes.

5555. I see the accommodation is put down at 31?—Yes.

5556. And it is the same now?—Yes.

5557. And the age at which you receive them extends from 16 to 40?—Yes.

5558. And the class of case you receive is females on their discharge from metropolitan prisons and from country prisons; fallen women not received?—We do not profess to receive fallen women.

5559. There appears to be a mistake here. It says they remain for a year?—That is a mistake.

5560. They remain for six months?—Yes, perhaps, sometimes longer, but very seldom.

5561. There may be an exceptional case of a year?—The exception is anything longer than the six months.

5562. That is the exception?—Decidedly.

5563. You say that a great number of them are remand cases?—That is a thing that we have fallen into of late.

5564. Just allow me to ask you this. I think I heard you say that there were 28 remand cases?—Yes.

5565. And there is accommodation for 31?—Yes, and there were 28 remand cases in the course of the year.

5566. How many pass through your refuge in the course of the year?—Last year there were 91.

5567. And 28 of those would be remand cases?—Yes.

5568. Now you say the remand cases are generally made up of small thefts and drunken cases?—Yes, drunk and disorderly cases.

5569. The small thefts which would come to you would be cases which must naturally be dealt with under the First Offenders Act?—Yes.

5570. And the others, the drunken cases, have not been sentenced?—No.

5571. How do you receive them; you have a quantity of prisoners to choose from?—Well, these remand cases are brought to the home from the police courts by a lady who is there—one of these missionary ladies, or by the male missionary from the Police Court Mission. The magistrates say to them, "Well, you may take that woman to a home."

5572. Without mentioning Miss Fry's home, or anybody else?—Yes, they do not know what home.

5573. They are simply told that if a person expresses a wishes to go to a home they are discharged?—Yes.

5574. But are you made aware whether they are bound over in any recognisances to come up if called upon?—No, we are not.

5575. Not you or anybody from your home; but do you know whether the people whom you receive are bound over in any recognisances?—They are not, as a rule.

5576. You gather that from what they tell you?—Yes; well, from what the police court missionary tells us when he brings them.

5577. Nobody is sentenced to your home, it is purely a voluntary home?—That is not correct. These remand cases are told that if they have not a sentence they are to go to a home, but they do not say you are to stay at the home six months, or whatever it may be, but it is simply that they are sent off to a home and left.

5578. I suppose they are all aware of the fact that there is no possibility of detaining them?—Yes, they know it perfectly well.

5579. Every one of the women who go to you know perfectly well that they have a perfect right to walk out any day they please?—Yes.

5580. And the law does not allow anything else, does it?—No; therefore, you see, practically these remand cases, if they choose, can get off scot free.

5581. But if in so very few of the remand cases you are able to do anything for them, may I ask why you take them?—Because we do not like to refuse them.

5582. You have any number of cases to choose from. I daresay when you go to Holloway you are only able to take a certain number?—It is not so. Of course there are an immense number of women in Holloway who do not wish to go into a home, and of course, when I go there once a week for an hour or so, I see, perhaps, eight or nine women out of 800 or 900.

5583. And if you did not take those your home would be more or less empty?—Yes.

5584. And if you did not take these cases you you would have nobody in your home?—We should not have so many.

5585. Then you take these really because you cannot get others?—Yes, we do; we take them if we have room for them.

5586. I suppose the lady, or whoever she may be who communicates with you with reference to these persons is very well known to you?—We know her by name, I do not know her personally. You see, we are there once a week, when the Committee meets, and any case that has been brought to us during the week we see on the Wednesday. The matron has a certain amount of discretion in her power, and anyone she has taken in from the police courts we see on the Wednesday.

5587. But if you have only accommodation for 31 you must surely refuse a good many?—Yes, at times we do; at times we are quite full, and we send notice to the prisons that it is no use sending anybody else.

5588. Of course it is purely voluntary. You from time to time turn away people?—Yes.

5589. And take those whom you think you can best deal with, I suppose?—Yes.

5590. Now I understand you to say that in your visits to Holloway you see people from time to time undergoing a week's imprisonment over and over again?—Yes. I do not very often see them.

5591. But you said just now, "What is the good "of a week to a person who goes there time after "time?"—Yes, but I do not often see these cases.

5592. I thought you made that remark?—Yes, we sometimes have them brought to our home, we will say sent by Mr. Merrick, whom I may never have seen.

5593. Do I gather from what you say that anything in the shape of a short sentence to an habitual drunkard is equally futile as a week—anything up to a month, say?—I should say so, most decidedly.

5594. Therefore, sending them for a week is really much the same as sending them for a month, as, whether it is one or the other, neither will work any reformation?—I think not.

5595. You advocate rather that they should be sent to prison prior to any other steps being taken, and you ground that upon saying that the shame of being in the prison is likely to stop them from going there again?—Yes.

5596. Do not you think that the shame of being brought up, say, to a police court, and being locked up in a police court might not very well have the same effect?—No, I think not, because I think the discipline of the prison is one of the things that affects them; and the food does also.

5597. Do you go this length that you think everybody should——?—Be locked up?

5598. Yes?—Well, I think the generality of them certainly would be better for being locked up.

5599. Whether it is the first time, the second time, or the third?—Yes, I speak from experience in our home when I say that those that have not been locked up are unruly and unwilling to submit to the discipline of the home, which is not at all severe.

5600. And that every person, whether brought up for the first time or the second time, should undergo imprisonment?—I think so certainly.

5601. Then under those circumstances I should rather assume that you do not agree with the "First Offenders' Act"?—Well, as far as I understand the "First Offenders' Act," I do not; but I am not prepared to say that I do thoroughly understand it.

5602. The "First Offenders' Act" is for the purpose no doubt of providing that a person should not be sent to gaol for a first offence if possible and to save him so far as possible from that. You do not agree with that?—No, I do not.

5603. You think that nothing short of imprisonment pure and simple is likely to deter a person having once committed a crime from doing so again?—I should say so, as a rule. Of course there are exceptions to every case. There may be cases in which a woman has accidentally got into some trouble through influence or something of that sort.

5604. But your idea generally would be the other way taking it all round?—Decidedly.

5605. Do you find that it is difficult to get women who have been discharged from imprisonment to submit to go into a home?—I think those who have any wish to return to respectable life know that it is almost the only means of their doing so.

5606. But do you find many who are willing to go to a home after they have undergone a short imprisonment?—Well, a good many are.

5607. Then they would be the people you want?—Those are the people, pure and simple, who originally our home was intended for.

5608. Then why did you change your practice?—Chiefly because Mr. Merrick sent us these remand cases. We have worked with him for so many years, and if they do not know what to do with them, they are told that they must either go to a home, or they must be imprisoned; therefore, they are sentenced to go to a home.

5609. Then you have really changed your practice against your better judgment?—We have, so to speak, fallen into it.

5610. Against your better judgment?—Yes, rather against our better judgment.

5611. I have just one other question to ask you with reference to the people who have been convicted of drunkenness. Of course I am not speaking now of voluntary homes for drunken people?—No.

5612. But would you be of opinion that for drunken people, that is to say, for habitual drunkards, there should be a sort of special home?—Yes, undoubtedly. You see one great difficulty in all inebriate homes at the present day is that we cannot send a woman there without paying for her. There is many a woman we would gladly send there, but we cannot offer to pay for them.

5613. But they are taken in only voluntarily?—Of course they are only voluntary homes.

5614. I am talking of a place where they can be sent to?—Yes, that is what is wanted, I think.

5615. (Dr. Bridges.) I think you said that you had in the course of last year 91 admissions?—Yes.

5616. Can you say approximately how many of those 91 were cases connected with drunkenness?—Well, a good deal is caused by drunkenness that we know only the result of. There were 61 for theft, two for illegal pledging, two for assault, two for manslaughter, six for attempted suicide, 16 for miscellaneous offences, one for forgery, and one for breaking windows; but then you see drunkenness is so much at the bottom of many of these things.

5617. How do you connect drunkenness with theft?—That they steal to pawn for drink. Illegal pledging is from drink also.

5618. Would you say that out of those 91 prisoners there were a certain number who were not drunkards?—Yes.

5619. How many of them do you think?—I do not know that I can tell you that.

5620. I meant rather from your conjecture. How many of those do you think were not specially addicted to drink?—Well, from what I have heard, of course I can only give a very rough guess. You see we have 91 cases, and I might say, perhaps, that half of them had nothing to do with drink, but at the same time I feel we cannot by any means always get to the bottom of it. There are some cases where there may have been drink at the bottom of it without our knowing it.

5621. Have you had much to do with young girls?—No. We do not profess to take them under 16.

Miss Fry.

15 Nov. 1894.

5623. Have you noticed, in cases that have come before you, whether they were vigorous healthy women?—No.

5624. Were they broken down and rather depressed and exciteable women?—I should say as a rule they are not what I call strong healthy women. They vary very much. A good many of them are strong healthy women when they are out in service afterwards.

5625. Would you say a considerable proportion of them are?—You see they come to us impoverished by the prison diet.

5626. I will come to that afterwards; but taking their constitution, as far as you can form a judgment of it, would you say that a considerable proportion of them were rather undersized?—Yes.

5627. And with rather poor constitutions?—Yes, I should say they were.

5628. You anticipated a question I was going to ask you when you said that they came to you impoverished by prison diet?—Yes.

5629. That is the diet on which prisoners are placed during the first period of their imprisonment?—Yes, the short sentences. We have a very liberal diet in our home.

5630. Have you seen reason to think that the separate confinement to which they have been subjected in prison has had a depressing effect upon them?—No, I do not think so, because I think they all manage to communicate enough to keep their spirits up.

5631. You spoke of the difference between the remand cases which have not been in prison, and you contrasted them with the cases that have been in prison. You said that the remand cases were more rebellious and more troublesome to deal with?—Yes.

5632. Am I to take it that the prison life has had physically a sobering effect upon them?—Yes.

5633. That may be connected partly with the low diet?—Yes, and I think the discipline to which they are obliged to submit in prison has been very good for them. You see many of these young women are naturally without any sort of discipline of mind or self control. They are undisciplined altogether.

5634. But the principal discipline to which they have been subjected during the period of their sentences is the dietetic system?—Yes, and the separate and silent system; because they must be strictly obedient to the prison rules and so forth.

5635. You were beginning to speak about the diet that you give them in your home. Can you at all compare that with the scales of prison diet with which you probably are familiar?—Well, our women have meat—I am almost sure I am right in saying that every day they have a good dinner; and they have tea and coffee for breakfast, and that sort of thing. Instead of having the gruel stuff they have in prison they have bread and butter, and all that sort of thing—what I call good ordinary diet.

5636. Such as a general servant would have in after life?—Yes, exactly.

5637. You spoke of a garden. Have you much ground round your home?—Our home has been originally a good gentleman's house in Hackney, which had a good garden at the back, of certainly an acre and a half. We have sold part of that, which is now, of course, built over, but we have retained a piece which I should say is three times the size of this room.

5638. A space of three times the size of this room, then, would be the space in which they would take exercise?—Yes, but we use it also as a drying ground.

5639. If you occupy a space such as you have described as a drying ground, there would not be very much room for exercise, would there?—Well, probably they would not take their exercise at the time the things are out drying.

5640. What is your rule as to exercise?—I do not know that I can say for certain, but I think it is for an hour after their dinners that they go out. There is plenty of room. The amount of washing is not sufficient to prevent the women walking about perfectly amongst it.

5641. And at the end of the six months, you would say, you send them out in a better physical state than they come in?—Unquestionably, but I think a great number of this class of women are not very bright mentally.

5642. Many of them are rather below the average standard of intellect?—Yes.

5643. (Miss Orme.) What is the largest size that you think a home of this sort ought to be, in order that the matron may know the women she has under her?—Well, I feel that our matron has quite enough to do. We have a matron superintendent over all; we have a laundry superintendent; we have a work-room superintendent; and we have a younger woman who is downstairs in the kitchen, and so forth; and I think they have got as much as they can do. Then of course they have to receive the ladies, I mean the ladies who come for the women, and they have to take them to their situations, and to see them off by train if they are going home, or whatever it may be; so that they have outside work as well.

5644. Of course great moral influence is exercised by the matron over the prisoners?—Yes.

5645. How many women do you think can be beneficially put under one matron, so that that moral influence may be sufficiently strong?—I am sure I do not know.

5646. Should you care to have your home, for instance, larger, under one matron?—No, certainly not. I think our attendants have quite enough to do, and I think our matron exercises a most excellent individual influence over them, and has a marvellous knowledge of the women, and I can suppose from custom she is able to take a very correct view of them.

5647. You think about 30 is as many as one woman can really influence in that way?—Yes.

5648. When you get places in domestic service for these young women, do you think that it prevents your chance of doing so, if they have served a term of imprisonment?—No, I do not think so.

5649. You do not think it affects those employers you have told us of; those ladies who keep one servant?—They do not mind.

5650. They do not mind whether they have been in prison or not?—No, they come to us because our girls have been in prison. It makes no difference to them whether they are remand cases or whether they have been in prison.

5651. You do not think there is any particular disadvantage to a woman in after life in having served a short term of imprisonment?—Of course the ladies who take them know all we know about them, but our agreement with them is that if they do well with them, it goes no further, and that when they have lived there for a year or 18 months, and regained their character, the next lady who has them is not told that they have been in prison. The thing is over then. You cannot have it stick to them all their lives.

5652. You think, in the first instance, when you find them the place, it is no disadvantage to the women to have been actually technically in prison?—So many ladies say that the girls they get from the common registry office are worse than our girls.

5653. You do not think there is any popular prejudice against taking that class of women into service?—Not among that class of people.

5654. (Sir Algernon West.) You talk of the shame which comes upon these women the first time they are sentenced to a gaol?—Yes.

5655. Do you think that shame rapidly works off, and that with a second or third conviction the shame ceases altogether perhaps?—Yes, I think it does wear off.

5656. Then do you think that preliminary shame is the only deterrent to imprisonment?—Yes, and I think they really dislike the punishment.

Miss Fry.

15 Nov. 1894.

5657. Then do you think there is any reformatory element in the prisons?—Well, of course there is the teaching of the chaplain, and of some of the warders. Some of the warders have a most excellent influence over the women. There is one whom I especially know in my work, who I consider takes the greatest pains with the women.

5658. In what prison is that?—In Holloway. She is really the attendant of the chaplain. She always attends him when he sees the prisoners. He never sees them alone.

5659. You said that you attended your refuge once a week at a committee meeting. May I ask you how that committee is framed. Is it all philanthropic ladies?—Yes.

5660. Would it be a fair question to ask whether it works satisfactorily and well?—I think it does, quite.

5661. You do not find these ladies are perhaps a little too sentimental?—I do not know about gentlemen, but it is always the case with ladies' committees that there are one or two, or perhaps three, who rather take the lead in it, and practically do the work. The others help as far as they can, and especially in our individual committee; we have one lady who looks through the laundry books, and another who looks through the needlework accounts and sees about the buying of the materials and so forth.

5662. And you think really that it is a good practical working committee?—I think it is.

5663. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Would you allow me to ask you another question. What number of your inmates take their discharge after a short stay, and perhaps against the wish of the matron?—Very few; for instance, last year only one left of her own accord. That is all. One left to seek work. That was practically leaving of her own accord; she thought she could get work outside.

5664. That included the remand cases?—Yes.

5665. And they all stayed?—Yes.

5666. Of their own accord?—Yes, but of course these remand cases whom we get situations for, that is the bulk of them, either run away, or steal something, or get tipsy, or come to no good.

5667. Then they did not stay?—Yes, they stayed with us for their six months, but after that we give them up, and when they go out and get at liberty they do these things.

5668. Do you know, as a matter of fact, that a great many at these different homes do not stay, but they simply accept an offer of being taken to a home to elude punishment?—Yes, I do not know about other homes. I have no knowledge at all of that.

5669. I dare say you have heard that that is one of the drawbacks you have to contend with; that you have no power to keep them against their will for a day or an hour?—That is what one feels.

5670. Do you think that there ought to be some compulsion to make a person who has voluntarily accepted a home, and undertaken to stay for six months, do so? Do you think that there should be some compulsion as to that?—I do.

5671. The same as in an inebriate home?—I certainly do.

5672. That if a person binds herself to do a certain thing and does not do it, she is to meet with some punishment?—Yes, I think it ought to be said to them, "Instead of sending you to prison I send "you to a home for six months."

5673. And that there should be some means of enforcing their staying there for that time, and if they do not do it something should be done like bringing them back to the court where they have been sent from?—Yes, certainly.

5674. (Dr. Bridges.) I would ask you if you have any medical supervision of your home?—Yes. In the first place we have a certificate for those who have been in prison at Holloway, from the doctor, that they are in good health, that is to say, that they are free from disease; but we have our own doctor who attends voluntarily, though, of course, we give him a small present. He comes and sees every new case that comes in, and he visits the home once a week, and sees that they are all right; that is to say, if there is anything wrong with them the matron tells him.

5675. Has he his attention specially directed to what you were mentioning as to the rather feeble character of the mind of any of them?—Yes. He has often remarked it himself, and we occasionally have sent them to the London Hospital as out-patients, if they have had anything that we felt required it.

The witness withdrew.

Miss Reynolds.

Miss Reynolds, co-Secretary with Miss Fry, of the "Elizabeth Fry Refuge," called and examined.

5676. (Sir Algernon West.) Miss Reynolds, you have heard what Miss Fry has told us?—Yes.

5677. Is there anything special which you wish to say, further than Miss Fry has told us?—Miss Fry has practically endorsed my views in all respects. My work is to see the women when they are out; her's when they are in prison. I see them when they are placed out. I entirely endorse all she says about the remand cases. They do so very badly in service.

The witness withdrew.

Mrs. Meredith.

Mrs. Meredith* called and examined.

5678. (Sir Algernon West.) We understand that you have devoted the greater part of your life to the study of this question of prisoners who have been discharged after their sentences?—Yes, and to a knowledge of the prisoners generally.

5679. Will you tell me how long you have been engaged in that good work?—For more than 25 years. Since Colonel Henderson came home from Australia. That is the time I began to know something about it.

5680. Will you tell the Committee what prisons you undertake mainly?—Only the convict prisons. When the convicts failed us, we have had something to do with other prisons.

5681. Now there are no convicts within reach of London. They are at Woking, for instance?—We do not mind that. We applied to have Woking visited latterly, because we cannot get at the convicts.

5682. When you fail to get convicts you send for the other prisoners?—We set up a mission at the prison gate, and we send a lady to the gate.

5683. Will you give the Committee your experience in the work you have undertaken?—I do not know exactly what to tell you. You see the convicts are a class in themselves.

5684. But you do not confine your labours to the convicts now?—We only employ prisoners now. We find the rest get into employment, and we do not bother with them.

5685. Are you in communication with the Prison Commissioners?—Yes.

* For an account of the various institutions created and superintended by Mrs. Meredith, see Appendix V.

Mrs. Meredith.

15 Nov. 1894.

5686. And you hear of cases that go to Portland or Woking? Do you go to Portland or Woking?—No; we have nothing to do with men; we are a Discharged Prisoners Aid Society for the female prisoners.

5687. It is really limited to that?—Yes. The other thing we do is out in the street. I may tell you about that, I think, because that you can interfere with. When we found the convicts diminished in numbers and that there was great competition for them, and also when we learned from the women that they were repeatedly getting short sentences for drinking and getting put by for a couple of days, when they came out of Millbank we set up a mission at Millbank Prison gate, and there one of our sisters, dressed in the garb of the sisterhood, met the women coming out. There were some of their acquaintances generally there. They were not convicts, but only short sentence women, and they were asked if they wanted employment, and were told that we could give them employment for as many days as they chose to take it.

5688. What is your experience as to the number that take the employment under your mission?—We require 80 women a day, if not 100. We can give work to 200 a day; but we cannot get the women.

5689. And what do you get now from Woking? It is a very limited number from Woking, is it not?—We do not get them from Woking. They go to the Prisoners Aid Society. They will not all go to a Prisoners Aid Society, because they have to work. We will not compel them to work, but if they stay with us they must work.

5690. What is the result of your work? Is it at all self-supporting?—It is very encouraging all along.

5691. What is the work: sewing, or what?—Not at all. It goes on much better than formerly because it is greatly increased in importance. We set up a laundry for them. We cannot get enough labour to supply the labour of the laundry, and we are obliged to employ a few paid hands besides; but our takings will give you some idea of our business. Our takings average from 100*l.* to 150*l.* a week. The business is enormous and too fatiguing for us ladies, so we got the services of a good man who took the financial department off my shoulders. That is Lord Rookwood. He took it off my hands. The fault is that we cannot get hold of the prisoners in sufficient numbers for our work.

5692. Is your laundry self supporting?—Yes, quite. It is not profitable because the labour is so unprofitable.

5693. But you do not require any aid either from the public or from charitable contributions?—It was established at a very heavy expense—some 6,000*l.* or 8,000*l.*, which we did not get from the public, but which we want to get from the public. We want to clear it off. We want to get our money back. It is a fine large business and we want to get it taken up properly.

5694. How many women are now employed in your laundry?—There were 78, I think, to-day.

5695. And have they all passed through periods of a convict sentence?—Well, I hope so. I will not be sure of that, because when we have not enough prisoners we have to get others.

5696. Do you find any objection on the part of what I may call free labourers to work with women who have been convicts?—Not a bit. In fact we prefer the convicts, if we have the choice.

5697. They have all worked in the convict prison at laundry work?—Yes.

5698. Do they live in your institution?—No; that is a principle which I have always opposed. We can give them no shelter whatever, but we appoint them to certain lodging houses with families that we get to take them in, and we guarantee to pay the price of their lodging. We make it worth while with families to take them in, and so we quarter them all round our neighbourhood, and that neighbourhood is not remarkable for drunken cases in the morning.

5699. Are your convict women perfectly free and at liberty to go when they have done their work?—Certainly. I am sorry to say I wish I had some control over them.

5700. By that I gather you would like, at the expiration of their convict period, that they should be bound over to you, so to speak, for a year?—I do not know about that, but I should like to have police supervision to keep them from going wrong when they leave she laundry. They have no one to watch them. The best safeguard is that we keep them at work till they are tired, then they go out and go home to bed. They go home to bed and they come in the morning, and if they are not there before 8 in the morning at prayer time we do not give them any work at all, but we turn them out.

5701. What are your hours?—From 8 in the morning until 7 o'clock in the evening.

5702. With an interval for meals?—Yes, we supply the meals, we do not let them out of doors, and we do not let them have drink of any description.

5703. How do you supply these meals—from what fund?—We have a fund we collect money for which is called the Prison Mission Fund. People give to it with a desire for their conversion. We get more subscriptions for that than we should for a business like a laundry. It would be absurd to ask for subscriptions to that.

5704. Their hours are from 8 in the morning until 7 o'clock at night and after that they are perfectly free?—Yes.

5705. Do you find a large proportion of those that you employ leave you?—We find them all attend to our orders. When they have gone we know nothing of what they do. We have had some for 10 or 12 years or longer who have had no breakdown and no imprisonment in between, but as long as we find the work and make the women feel comfortable so long there is no more going to prison.

5706. Do you find many of these women give way to drink?—We do not wish to part with them. We wish to keep them and they rather wish to stay.

5707. Could you give the committee the figures of those you employ?—We have statistics that we publish annually, but these are only convicts. There were only 28 convicts in the last six years, and that with the tremendous number of convicts there are; at this date, to-day, though there is that number of prison women in the laundry out of the 78 there are only 12 convicts.

5708. Therefore the great proportion of your working women are prisoners that have been in prison?—They have been generally in Holloway; formerly Millbank.

5709. Do you find any difference now in the conduct of the convicts from that of the prisoners?—Oh, yes, convicts are well trained to obedience and order, and you have got something to work upon; but as to the others, no. As to the others, if they take two or three days' work, it is as much as they will, and then the fluctuation of that prison mass is a great nuisance.

5710. And the convicts have been disciplined, you think, by their convict imprisonment, to good order and discipline?—Yes.

5711. And in many cases it has broken them from drink?—Yes, in a great many cases, but in many cases the lengthened imprisonment will not cut off the drink.

5712. Would you be in favour of establishing inebriate homes to which habitual drunkards should be sentenced?—Yes, if you can keep them long enough.

5713. What would be your suggestion as to that?—Five years, nothing shorter.

5714. You think it would take five years to wean an habitual drunkard to be a sober woman?—I do not know that it will do it, because I have seen them after they have been 15 years in a convict prison, and a woman will come out and the next day will get drunk. In a convict prison they do not receive any medical treatment to stop the career of the drink thirst. In none of our prisons is that done, but if anything they have the thirst more strongly from the aggravation of the prison diet. I make that remark because in France the diet is so much more pleasant and at the same time so much more useful. It is the same in the German prisons, but in our prisons nothing of that kind is thought about.

5715. They do not take into consideration, you think, either in diet or treatment, the effect of a woman being addicted to drink?—No, and in our prisons they get such a monotony of diet. Now, if we get them the moment they come out, they might have a fried herring, or something of that sort, and we give them meat or fish; we do not force a lot of soup down them. The consequence is that they are never made irritable over their food, which is always happening in the convict prisons.

5716. (Miss Orme.) Do you find that their living in these lodgings rather than in a home has a good effect upon them?—Very good. I would not put two women to live in a house together under any circumstances. One woman spoils another directly. That is my experience.

5717. Who actually pays for their lodgings?—They actually pay it themselves, because we stop it off their money.

5718. Do you actually pay the money, or do they pay the money?—We pay the money. We could not trust them with 4*d.*

5719. About what wages do they earn?—Their board and 1*s.*

5720. 1*s.* a week?—No, 1*s.* a day.

5721. Besides their food and lodging?—Yes, and they get it paid every night. We close our accounts with our convict women every night. We do not exactly manage in the way that Scotland Yard does. We could not do with having a row over it constantly.

5722. If you pay them 1*s.* a day besides their food and lodging, you are paying them above the market price?—No, we take out the 4*d.* for lodging.

5723. The 1*s.* a day then is the wages and besides that you give them board?—Yes.

5724. And nothing else?—Nothing else. We stop 4*d.* for lodging.

5725. What do they buy their clothes out of?—That is a certain sort of charity. We sell very cheap clothes to them.

5726. What do you suppose they spend the 8*d.* on?—I am afraid it is on beer. That is not allowed by us, but I would not take anybody's liberty from them after they have served a long imprisonment.

5727. But do they not put by any of the 8*d.* to buy their dress with?—I am afraid they get their dress where they can. I do not undertake to know what they do when they leave us. They come at 8 o'clock in the morning perfectly sober, or they are not allowed to come in, and we understand that they come to do a day's work, and they do a day's work. If they never appeared again there is nothing for us to complain of.

5728. You have no clothing club?—Yes, we have.

5729. Do they pay anything towards that?—Yes. It is not exactly a clothing club; it is a penny bank and they put in their money once a week, that is, those who will.

5730. Can you give us any idea whether any of them do save any appreciable sum?—Yes, and they have it out to buy clothes. We sell clothes, and they may buy from us if they like. We have a shop where new and second-hand garments can be bought cheap. One thing we encourage very much is their having a little furniture.

5731. Instead of furnished lodgings?—Yes; but we do not do that until we know them a little; but when we have had them a couple of years and have a little hope for them, if they want to have an unfurnished lodging we help them to a little furniture.

5732. You have told us of the bad effect of the prison diet on women accustomed to drinking. You think the exercise they get in prison is enough for them. For instance, is that walking in the yard sufficient for them?—I would not send them walking in a yard. I have never passed through a convict prison without objecting to the walk as a danger to the prisoners. I think they want more continuous labour of a mechanical kind. They want the open air somehow if they can get it.

5733. Should you approve of their having extension exercise, or anything of that sort, in the ground within the prison?—Well, I do not know. I do not know what effect it would produce on their minds or their thoughts, or whether it is free from danger.

5734. You have had great experience of the children of prisoners?—Yes, I have 200 of them at present in the Princess Mary Village Homes.

5735. Do you find the parents' instincts are very much inherited by the children?—They inherit the powers of their mother. We want to divert those powers to good instead of evil. Like all criminals, the children are very clever. They do not take education; they will not be educated if they can help it. It is very hard to make them learn anything literary.

5736. What age do they come to you?—We like to take them at birth, but we get them as soon as we can.

5737. (Sir Algernon West.) Are you paid for them?—No, the Government gives no pay for the children until they are six years old. According to the Industrial Schools Act, we get no money for a child until it is seven years old, although the magistrates may commit a child to us at any age. We have several at five or six months old, and they remain with us until they are 16. They do very well. The number of our failures is about 4 per cent.

5738. (Miss Orme.) What are the principal things you bring them up to?—Domestic service, and anything else they are fit for. One of them is now a certified school mistress.

5739. (Sir Algernon West.) May I ask you this question on the same subject? When these children are growing up, do you allow them to see their parents, or their relations?—Once in three months on a proper recommendation.

5740. But if you knew the parents were thieves and bad characters you would not allow it?—Certainly not.

5741. You conceive that you have absolute power to keep them apart?—Yes

5742. From all your great experience, do you think there is anything of a reformatory element in a convict prison?—I do not know. I do not know what hours they have, for instance they allow for teaching any kind of good morals.

5743. I gather you think distinctly that greater attention should be paid in convict prisons to the food and medical treatment of those who have been habitual drunkards?—Yes.

5744. You said you would give us some figures to show the number of those women you employ in the laundry that stay with you and those that go?—As to the number that stay, well, when we have, say, 80 women employed, that means that we find 80 women in lodging and food, and payment; and it is our experience that they conduct themselves pretty well. If they want to do badly again they go away, and then we transfer to the police our report of them. We give the police a report to say they are not with us, but that they are gone, so that we have nothing more to do with them.

5745. Do you ever take these women back?—Yes, as many times as they have been in prison; but they must have been in prison again before applying.

5746. A woman must have been in prison again after she has stayed away. If a woman has stayed away for a week you would not take her again unless she was imprisoned again?—Not unless she had been sick, or something of that kind. We make exceptions.

5747. The result of your work is perfectly satisfactory?—Yes, I would not alter it in any particular.

Mrs. Meredith.

15 Nov. 1894.

5748. You think it would be a very bad thing for the convicts to live in a home?—I think it would be a very bad thing for the whole country if these women were not allowed to be perfectly free on liberation. They should have employment provided for them to earn their living. I would make attendance on it profitable, and not compel residence.

5749. You would give them partial freedom?—Yes.

5750. Would you limit that to any period?—Yes. According to the nature of the case.

5751. I understand you think that a convict on leaving the prison should have a kind of licence, but should be looked after, and be under control for some months?—Yes, and I would have no money given them on coming out of prison; not a penny of gratuity. I would stop all that.

5752. You have had large experience in these matters. Could you give the Committee any further general ideas that you have. We have got a very large reference as to the administration of local prisons and convict prisons, and we should be glad of any of your suggestions derived from your practical experience?—I am not able to speak from knowledge of the interior of prisons, because the Prison Commissioners do not permit one's knowing anything about them. I complain of the Prison Commissioners that they do not like ladies to go into a prison to find how they could be really useful. When I got my permission to visit the prisons it was from Sir George Grey, and nothing could exceed the freedom of that permission. When it ceased to be so free I ceased to go. When I was told I was to have the matron with me when I was speaking to a woman, and that I must not gather the women together, I said, "Then I will not go any more." When I went to the prisons formerly it was understood that I might have the command for the time for from 20 minutes to half an hour of the whole area where the women were in the large wings of Brixton Prison, say, with 500 or 600 women in them, and that I might address them as they sat in their galleries, and after I had done the women were allowed to make a remark to the matron, who referred them to me if they wished to have any further communication with me, but I did not walk round the cells. Then if any woman wished to speak about her state, herself, or her children, and to tell me what her views were on going out of prison, I saw her the next day in a private cell with no matron there. That was fair play to the women, and fair play to me; but when that ceased I never went again.

5753. Can you tell me how that ceased?—I could not tell you There were changes of officials.

5754. There were orders given you that you were not to do this?—They altered the regulations without communicating with me.

5755. (Miss Orme.) At what date was that alteration made?—Well, I go more by the official changes. There was some new heads of departments came on. It was when the Commissioners were first appointed. I had previously nothing to do with anybody but the Home Secretary.

5756. (Sir Algernon West.) That was about 1877?—If I wanted to say anything, Sir George Grey said to me, "You must publish nothing about this prison, "but if you have anything to say you must come and "say it to me."

5757. Your idea as to the advantages that would accrue are these, that if you could find ladies who would take upon themselves that very arduous duty, and would do as you did before 1877, it would be advantageous?—Yes, I think so.

5758. You think you could trust a lady to have good sense?—I would not send any lady who had not. The ladies who belong to my association are well trained. I have just proposed to the Commissioners to send two of those ladies, and it has been agreed to send them, but not agreed to give them the old freedom, and the ladies do not like to go. I do not think the ladies like to go through all the corridors to see the women. It will do more good to speak in general terms to a group than to discuss personal affairs with individuals. It is not good for a woman to have half an hour's private interview in her cell with a lady visitor.

5759. Do you work your institution by a committee of ladies?—No, but by an association of ladies who are deaconesses.

5760. It is all, I believe, Church of England?—Yes, our association is Church of England.

5761. But a good many of your convicts are Roman Catholics I suppose?—Yes, nearly all of them. But we have no business to deal with the question of their religion. Our aid is given without distinction of creed.

5762. You were good enough to give us your opinion that women should be allowed to be in a state of semi-independence when they come away from a convict establishment for a time, or from a prison?—Yes.

5763. Should that period, whatever it is, be added to their sentence?—No.

5764. Or taken off their sentence?—Taken off, but I would not shorten their sentences. They are short enough now; I would not give them any remission such as they get now.

5765. Do I understand as to a convict who has a sentence of five years, that you would allow her on good conduct to shorten it beyond what it is now, and that you would take a year off to put her in a state of semi-independence?—No, that was tried and it was a failure.

5766. Then, in fact, you would add a year's semi-independence to a five years' sentence?—Yes, but I would detain her in some neighbourhood. To tie a woman to a neighbourhood, you must assure her that she can get her living there. It would be of no use attempting an impracticable thing, but I think it is practicable; the consignment principle might be adopted. It has not been an utter failure in the Colonies.

5767. May I ask you a general question. Have you any experience of the working of other prisoners aid societies?—Not a bit. There are some who have homes into which they take the women, and associate them together, and attempt to form a family of them. I only know that I do not approve of that system. The women do not benefit each other. It failed morally; pecuniarily it was profitable. My experience is that officials endeavour to retain their situations at any cost. Their evidence as to morals is not always reliable. I prefer deaconesses, who have no personal interests to serve; women trained to work out certain principles.

5769. What institutions are you connected with besides the laundry and the children?—Such as deal with women and children abroad, as well as at home.

5770. (Miss Orme.) You were telling us of the way in which you used to address the women prisoners when you could gather them together. Would it meet your views if it were arranged that a lady of experience like yourself could address them in chapel or in one of their large rooms in some prisons?—That would be very good indeed. There are unnatural burdens thrown on the chaplains. I have the greatest pity and regard for prison chaplains; they must be tired of seeing the same faces before them every morning and of reading the same prayers.

5771. (Sir Algernon West.) Do not you rather pity the prisoners too who are always seeing the same chaplain?—I do indeed. I think a little variety would be better for both.

5772. (Miss Orme.) Then would you approve of ladies from time to time addressing the prisoners?—Yes.

5773. Would you also approve of female scripture readers being appointed?—They are now.

5774. Not in all the prisons?—No, but in the convict prisons.

5775. You think that is an important matter?—Yes; the reader would require special instruction.

5776. In what way?—In order to enable her to convey suitable lessons to the prisoners.

5777. So that you think giving them addresses in the chapels would be preferable to doing it in the cells?—Yes; for example, I offered a temperance lecture by Lady Elizabeth Biddulph, and was refused. Other subjects, similarly moral, could be provided. Ladies of ability, in this way, could do great good. Such a woman as Lady Biddulph would be useful on the Prison Commission, to regulate such matters as visiting, reading, &c., by volunteers in prisons. Mrs. Meredith 15 Nov. 1894.

5778. She is an excellent lecturer?—Yes.

The witness withdrew.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time.

Miss Jane Taylor Gee called and examined. Miss J. T. Gee.

5779. (Sir Algernon West.) You are the matron of the Liverpool Prison?—Yes.

5780. Will you tell the Committee how long you have been there?—I joined the service in December 1867.

5781. Also, will you tell us what your experience was before that time?—I was matron at Manchester from the 1st of July 1877.

5782. Did you start as matron, or had you been a warder?—I started as a warder.

5783. When did you first start as a warder?—I was a warder until 1871, school mistress from 1871 until 1874, chief warder from 1874 till 1877.

5784. From when?—From 1867.

5785. Where were you warder—at Manchester?—At Manchester City Gaol.

5786. Then your experience has all been with northern prisons?—Yes.

5787. You have some convicts at Liverpool also, I think?—Yes.

5788. Apart from convicts, how many prisoners have you?—351.

5789. And how many convicts?—None at present.

5790. I think, when I was there, you had a few?—Yes, I had.

5791. Do you think it is a good system to send convicts to a prison on their way to a convict establishment?—I think so.

5792. You do not think it does any harm?—I do not know that it does any harm.

5793. I think you attribute a large proportion of your prisoners to drink?—Yes, I attribute the greatest proportion of them to drink; in fact, in almost every case it is drink. Even if they are in for felony, it has been drink that has been the beginning of it.

5794. Do you at all know what happens to the prisoners when they leave the gaol?—I do not.

5795. Or whether they revert to crime?—Well, many of them do, because they are met at the prison gates outside by their own friends, and taken to drink. There are a great number of them who go out on Saturday morning, and they return again on Monday or Tuesday. Of course they have been met, and they have got drunk; and they are not able to stand it.

5796. Could you tell the Committee at all, out of that 351 prisoners that you have, how many of them have been old offenders?—We have very few first offenders at Liverpool, very few indeed.

5797. The large proportion of them are habitual criminals?—Yes, they are; they are a very low class indeed at Liverpool—much lower than at Manchester.

5798. You, I think, have very short sentences at Liverpool, as a rule?—Yes, very short sentences indeed.

5799. Sometimes for a day?—Yes, for a day, and three days; there are a number for three days, and some for five, six, or seven days, for 14 days, and a month.

5800. Those are the Recorder's sentences?—Yes, some of them are. He often sentences them to one day.

5801. You say they are constantly in the habit of coming back?—Yes.

5802. Do any of them like coming back?—Yes, they like coming back; they say they come home again. Many of them, have no other home.

5803. Will you tell us a little about the labour you have for your prisoners?—Well, we have washing for the prisoners only, and the officers; we do not do any outside washing now, because it is so far away, and there are a great many laundries about. We do a great deal of very good knitting.

5804. That is all for prisoners?—Yes.

5805. You do not work in Liverpool gaol, except for prisoners?—Well, we pick beans now; that is a new thing. They like it very much, too.

5806. That is for women who are not strong enough for the other work?—Yes, the oakum pickers I put on the beans.

5807. You are disusing oakum as much as possible?—Yes.

5808. You think oakum is bad mentally?—Yes, I do not care for oakum at all.

5809. There is no harm in it?—No.

5810. It is not cruel to the women?—No, not at all.

5811. But, mentally, you think it is a very bad occupation?—Yes, they do not feel they are doing any good, I think.

5812. In the face of so many prisoners coming back again at Liverpool, I should like to ask you what experience you have of the prisoners' aid societies? I believe there is a South West Lancashire and Wirrall Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society. Do they do much good?—Well, the magistrates come up every month, and any prisoner who wishes to see them can do so. There is a notice in the cells informing them that they can see a member of the visiting committee if they wish.

5813. You have a very good visiting committee?—Yes, very good indeed.

5814. At Liverpool your committee visit frequently, and take a great interest in the work?—They do.

5815. And they are in communication with the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society?—Yes, the chaplain is the secretary of it.

5816. Do you find the chaplain's work lapses into the very monotonous work of going round to the prisoners as a matter of course, or is he able to distinguish individual prisoners?—Yes, he is very quick at distinguishing them.

5817. And helping them?—Yes, he takes great interest in the first offenders, especially the young.

5818. Will you tell us how much you are able to separate the young from the old?—I generally keep the younger ones in one ward.

5819. What are the youngest you have?—The youngest we have at the present time is 17. We have only about two of 17 now. We had a reformatory girl in, but she has been sent off to Bristol. She was 14. We have none of that age at present.

5820. Under what age is it you report at once to the Secretary of State?—Under 14.

5821. Do you have any skilled instructors in your laundries?—No.

5822. Who superintends it—one of the warders?—Yes.

5823. And I suppose she is accomplished in that?—Yes, she is.

5824. Are you quite satisfied with your warders?—Yes, quite satisfied.

5825. Are they satisfied?—I think they are.

5826. Do they complain of overwork?—No.

Miss J. T. Gee.
15 Nov. 1894.

5827. What are their hours?—From 6 in the morning until 6 in the evening, except twice each week, when they are on until 10.

5828. And do they have any remission of the other work in consequence?—Yes, when they are on 10 o'clock duty they have two hours relief in the afternoon.

5829. And out of that time they have their meals, I suppose?—Yes, half-an-hour and 10 minutes for breakfast, an hour and 10 minutes for dinner, and the same for tea.

5830. When you receive prisoners how late at night is it?—Sometimes we receive as late as eight o'clock, but not very many.

5831. Would the warder whose turn it is to be on duty from 6 to 10 superintend that?—No; if the prisoners have not come in the two reception warders are told off to wait until the last van comes. Of course if the last van is received, and odd stragglers come in from the country, the warders on duty do it.

5832. But if the van has not come in?—Then the reception warders are not to go until they are. They do not take any other night duty on that account.

5833. They are relieved from the night duty?—Yes, and on that account.

5834. Do you think there is any reformatory element in gaols?—I do not quite understand you.

5835. Do you think that the discipline of the gaol really makes women better?—I do not think it does them any harm.

5836. But you will not go further than that?—No.

5837. I will ask you a very broad question. From your great experience, have you any suggestions to make in any way as to an improvement in the way of treatment or discipline of prisoners, diet, or anything else?—I should like to see No. 1 diet abolished. I should like to see them have something warm in the morning. I have thought that for many years.

5838. What is your reason for that?—They come in tipsy the night before; then the next morning they do not feel very grand, and they are given cold water to drink. I think it would have a good effect if they had a pint of gruel. In the old days they had a pint of gruel night and morning, and bread in the daytime. I think that is better than the stirabout.

5839. Are your remarks limited to No. 1 diet?—Yes; I am quite satisfied with the others.

5840. Do you find much waste of No. 1 diet?—Yes; 19 out of 20 women do not eat it.

5841. They cannot eat it?—They do not like the stirabout, and they leave it.

5842. They leave it because they are not in a fit state to eat it?—That is about it.

5843. When the governor is away on his holiday there is no deputy governor?—No.

5844. Then the chief warder takes the command?—Yes.

5845. And I suppose you would prefer his being in command. You would feel that you were behind your man?—Yes, I prefer having a man behind me.

5846. Do you ever have to call in his assistance?—Never.

5847. I think you have very few women under prison punishments?—No, we do not get very many; the prisoners require firmness and kindness.

5848. But your kindness is so great that it appears they all like coming back again?—You must not let kindness mean weakness; I do not mean that.

5849. (Miss Orme.) Do you think there is any communication between the prisoners in chapel?—Not if the officers do their duty.

5850. How near do they sit to each other?—About as near as you and I are now.

5851. Not nearer than that?—No.

5852. Then you have plenty of room?—Yes, we accommodate about 200 females in the chapel, and they try to talk if they are not watched; but of course the officers are on the alert, and if there are six of them in the prisoners are not able to talk.

5853. You think, from your experience, it would have a very bad effect if the chapel was so crowded that the women sat close to each other?—Yes, a very bad effect.

5854. You do not approve of that?—No.

5855. Do you separate the first offenders from the others in chapel?—Yes.

5856. And do you think there is any talking going on by tapping on the cell walls?—Yes.

5857. I suppose if anything of importance happened in the prison it would be known to the other prisoners?—I do not know that it would. We had a death last week, and I do not think anyone knew it.

5858. Then you do keep up separation to a certain extent?—Yes.

5859. Should you approve of preachers being allowed to come to the prison, from time to time, to give addresses on Sunday?—Yes, I would, it would have a very good effect; it is the same old monotony, and the same old faces they keep seeing. I know the Bishop of Manchester addressed them a few years back at Manchester Prison, and they were very attentive to him.

5860. You think that had a good effect?—Yes, it was a little change for them.

5861. Would you extend that to allowing a lady if she were carefully chosen, to give an address to the women, say, on temperance?—Yes; it would have a very good effect.

5862. You would like your women to have such an address?—I should, indeed.

5863. Do you think when a young woman is sent to prison for the first time, it has a good effect on her, morally?—Well, it does not do her any harm.

5864. Do you think it has more effect in bringing her back to a good life if she has a short term of imprisonment than none?—I think it would.

5865. Do all your officers take their meals together?—Yes; they have a general mess.

5866. Who cooks it?—A prisoner under the superintendence of an officer.

5867. What sort do you choose for that?—Always a fourth stage prisoner, one that has not been in before, a respectable one. I always mind that. In these positions of trust, I am careful of that.

5868. Can you suggest any improvement on that plan?—I think if officers were to do it alone it would be better. It is rather hard on a prisoner to smell these good things.

5869. Would it lead to a little pilfering, do you think?—It might, if it were not carefully watched, if an officer were not on guard.

5870. You have told us of the hours of your warders. Who are in charge of your galleries during the night?—There is a valve with an electric bell in the guard room. Warders sleep there, and if a prisoner rings a bell they have to go and answer it. They have to go to the chief warder and visit the cell.

5871. The two warders sleeping in that room have been on duty during the day?—Yes.

5872. They do not feel able to rest, I suppose?—No, they feel as though they were on duty. They never know when a bell may ring.

5873. Do you think any of your warders are overworked; do you think the strain is too great for them?—I do not think so. I could do with two more, but I think even with the night work it is not too much at present.

5874. I suppose the strain is very great?—It is very great and very monotonous.

5875. And the mental strain too, if you have disorderly prisoners to manage, as I suppose you have?—Yes, they require checking.

5876. You never call in any male warders to help you?—Never.

5877. Can you give us any instances where you managed a disorderly prisoner yourself?—Yes, only last Monday a prisoner came in. The governor and I were in a cell quite across from where she was, and she began to break her windows. The governor said, "Pop her in handcuffs." I went straight to her, and

I said, "What do you mean by this?" and she said, "Someone has been laughing at me through the windows." I said, "Oh, it is the drink that has been laughing at you; come here." She said, "I will not have those on if you bring all the prison to me." I said to the officers, "Go outside," and then I said to her, "If you will take my advice, you will let me "put them on quietly, or else I shall bring all the "officers," and she said, "All right, matron, put them on."

5878. After a tussle of that sort, I suppose you feel rather tired?—Yes, I am often tired. I did not have any tussle.

5879. I meant a mental tussle?—That is often the case.

5880. Do you do any needlework in the prison?—We make all the women's clothing, all the officers' dresses, the knitting and patching. We have a lot of repairing.

5881. But you do not think knitting is of any use to them after they leave the prison—they could not earn their living at it?—Yes, many of them learn how to finish a stocking off, but that is not very good pay when they get outside.

5882. There is no market for that?—No.

5883. Do you think you could teach them needlework which would pay them better?—Well, needlework is very poorly paid, and we are so crippled with short sentences, that there really is not time to learn them much.

5884. Should you say the chief reason against your doing that which would enable them to learn something in prison, is that they are with you for so short a time?—Yes; we can learn them the laundry work better than anything else, if we have it to do.

5885. When they leave you do they go into public laundries?—Sometimes they do.

5886. Is not that very bad for them if they are liable to take to drink?—Yes it is, and then they return to us.

5887. It is not a good employment for them, is it?—I do not think it is.

5888. What should you say was the best employment for those women who have been in prison several times, if we could do as we liked with them? What is the safest position for them to be in?—I should not like to say.

5889. Domestic service?—No. I would not trust them there. They would fall again.

5890. You cannot tell us what you think would be the best thing for them?—No, truthfully I cannot, although I have thought of it so often. It is all over again.

5891. (Sir Algernon West.) Do you think it would be useful in the case of the long sentence prisoners, that there should be some institution where they should have partial freedom, that is, that they should not go back quite to begin the world afresh, after having been under the discipline of the prison?—Yes, that would have a very good effect. You can appreciate that.

5892. And in that case would you let them have some mitigation of their punishment, and then go into this partial freedom?—I would not give them any mitigation; I would let them finish their sentence first.

5893. And then add to that this partial freedom?—Yes.

5894. (Dr. Bridges.) Have you a great many hysterical women among your prisoners?—Not many.

5895. They do not often have fits of hysteria?—Very seldom indeed; in fact, I do not remember one for some time now.

5896. Are some of the women under you rather weak-mined and feeble-minded?—Yes very feeble-minded women. They are basket girls who sell fish, and kawk lemons and walk about the streets in that state. They really do not do any work in Liverpool. Laziness is at the bottom of it all.

5897. I was asking you whether a good many of your prisoners were rather below the common standard of intelligence?—They are.

5898. I do not mean of knowledge, but of intelligence?—They are rather a simple sort of women I may say.

5899. A little silly?—Yes, a little silly; it is the drink.

5900. I see that you wish to tell the Committee that you think drink is at the bottom of almost everything?—I do think so.

5901. But do not you ever have thieves who are very sober people?—Well, we have occasionally, but they have said to me, "Well, I had a drop too much, and then I did it; I should not have done it unless I had that drink."

5902. But to make a regular clever thief it does not do to drink too much?—No, but sometimes it has been the origin of it, and got them into bad company.

5903. How long does it take a woman to become a good laundry woman, to get up fine linen, and to wash a shirt, perhaps?—About a week, not more than that. I mean that they cannot iron a shirt the first thing they do.

5903A. And you think that a week would be long enough for that?—Yes, I think a week would do it.

5904. (Sir Algernon West.) Just in continuation of that, do you do any fine work? I mean you have told us that you wash shirts for the prisoners, but when you say it takes a week to make a person learn how to iron a shirt, you do not mean that would be to iron a shirt for people outside?—If we were to teach a prisoner to iron a shirt, she would quite do it in a week.

5905. Really?—Yes; there is not much art in it, if they give any mind to it.

5906. Do you know what are the pecuniary results of your labour at Liverpool? Do you know what you can make? Apart from the washing for the prisoners you do some washing for the outside public, do not you?—No.

5907. That has all come to an end?—Yes, because we had not sufficient customers.

5908. In fact, you have no labour except for the prisoners?—That is all, and mail bag making.

5909. You have said there was a great deal of difference between the prisoners at Manchester and Liverpool. Do you put that down to the length of sentence at Manchester as against that at Liverpool?—Yes, and I think they are more industrious at Manchester, there are more factory hands there; they are not such a loose lot as they are at Liverpool.

5910. Tell me what happens about children. When a woman is going to be confined, she is confined there?—Yes.

5911. It makes no difference to her?—No, she is sent to the hospital.

5912. When the child is born, how long is she allowed to keep it?—For nine months. We have got nice cradles for the children, and if a prisoner is sentenced for longer than nine months, it has to be sent either to her friends or to the workhouse, but it is very seldom that we have to separate them. If it is only a few weeks, of course, we leave it with her.

5913. Have you any lady visitors?—No.

5914. Do you think it would be any assistance to you if you had either a committee of ladies or lady visitors?—No.

5915. You would rather not have them?—I would rather not have them.

5916. You think they would interfere too much?—Yes, I would rather not have them.

5917. You do not think it would be of any assistance to prisoners to have ladies taking an interest in them when they go out?—There has been a lady attached to the police court who takes an interest in them. She comes up for them when they are discharged.

5918. We have had a witness to-day, who talked more of convict prisons, but she said she had given it up, because she was not allowed, as she had been previously, to talk quietly and personally to the prisoners, but she was always accompanied by warders and so on, and she thought that useless. If this lady, who is attached to the police court, comes to your prison, is she allowed to visit in the prison at all?—No, she never comes in.

Miss J. T. Gee.
15 Nov. 1894.

5919. You never have a lady visitor?—No, never.

5920. The inspector goes round every month, I think?—Yes.

5921. Could you tell us whether he places himself in communication with the visiting committee?—I cannot answer that question. I do not know.

5922. Then I have got no further particular question to ask you, but I should like to ask you a general question, founded on all your long experience. I should like to ask you, generally, whether you have any suggestions to make in any way beyond what you have done for the improvement of the treatment and discipline of prisoners under your charge?—I do not know that I have.

5923. You have told us about the diet. You would like to see an improvement there?—Yes, I should like to see that improved.

5924. And the chaplain's services changed?—Yes.

5925. I am afraid you take rather a gloomy view of the result of your prison at Liverpool. You think you are very bad?—They are a low class. I am very sorry to have to say it, but I must say they are an exceptionally low class.

5926. When you say so many of them like being in prison, I suppose that is the habitual criminal. I suppose the great sense of shame attaches to a person when she first comes in?—Yes.

5927. That is the real punishment?—Yes.

5928. That soon wears off?—Yes.

5929. By the second or the third time, perhaps?—Yes; I have no faith in them after they have come a second time. I give them up, then, as they generally come again.

5930. Do you have many who come for the first time and do not come again?—Very few indeed.

5931. And I suppose it goes on increasing after the second and the third time?—We have a woman in now who came in on Monday, and she has been in over 200 times.

5932. Always for trivial offences?—Yes, seven days. When she comes in she says, "Seven days again, matron."

5933. (Miss Orme.) Could you give us any instances where prisoners come back to you almost immediately in consequence of some act of their own?—Yes; very often they go out on Saturday and come back on Monday.

5934. That is because they come back drunk; but can you give me any instance where a woman has wished to come back and has proceeded to do some act to secure coming back?—Yes; a very short time ago a man saw a prisoner who had been discharged that morning take her shoe off and deliberately throw it at a window. He said, "What have you done that for?" She said, "To go back to prison again. I have nowhere else to go."

5935. Would your experience lead you to approve of lady visitors coming in with the leave of the authorities, and going about your prison without the warders, and visiting your prisoners?—I do not think she ought to see the prisoners alone.

5936. But you would not at all object to the prisoners being collected together, either in chapel or in the room where they receive instruction for a visitor to give an address to them?—I should approve of that.

5937. Have you anything to suggest as to the way of treating these habitual drunkards. What do you think ought to be done with them?—I think they ought to be put in a place by themselves, something between a prison and a workhouse.

5938. For how long?—For an indefinite period. But you should make them work. I am a great advocate for work. I do not believe in laziness.

5939. Do you think they should be kept there until they are better?—Yes; but I have no faith in a woman that takes drink. I do not think she is ever better.

5940. You say "indefinitely," but you do not mean they are to be put in for life?—No, I would leave them in, perhaps, for two years.

5941. And from your experience of the sort of work they can do, do you think they would maintain themselves?—Yes; I think they would take an interest in it. Washing and knitting is the best work.

5942. And do you think they could really maintain themselves?—Yes, if the washing could be got.

5943. If women of that class were taken out of prisons, would it have an effect on the remaining prisoners?—It might have.

5945. You think it would be a good thing for the prison discipline?—Yes.

5946. (Sir Algernon West.) With reference to that woman who has been in over 200 times, do not you think it would have been better if the law allowed her sentences to have been cumulative, so that each time she went in she would have gone in for a longer time?—Yes; it is hopeless when you have a case like that.

The proceedings were adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, November 16, at 12 o'clock.

TWELFTH DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Friday, 16th November 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B. (CHAIRMAN).

JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
Miss ELIZA ORME.

JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Dr. T. C. Shaw.
16 Nov. 1894.

Dr. THOMAS CLAYE SHAW called and examined.

5947. (Sir Algernon West.) You are, I think, the Principal of the Banstead Lunatic Asylum?—I am.

5948. Will you kindly tell the Committee who you receive. What classes of patients do you receive?—We receive pauper patients chargeable to the County of London, and also occasionally criminal patients from the prisons. We have received patients from Broadmoor whose sentences have expired. We have one man there now. They are all pauper patients chargeable to the county of London.

5949. You divide, therefore, those that are criminal and those that are not, I suppose?—Not in the treatment; not in the wards.

5950. But I mean to say the man who is not a criminal, if he recovers his health, will be let out?—Yes.

5951. And the others you detain as in a prison?—Yes.

5952. (Dr. Bridges.) How many years have you been at Banstead?—Eighteen years; since the opening of the building.

5953. Previous to that, I think you were medical superintendent of Leavesden Asylum?—I was.

5954. How long were you there?—I was there seven years.

5955. That is an asylum for imbeciles under the Metropolitan Asylums Board?—Yes. I may say that amongst those imbeciles were a good many people who have been in prison a good many times; just as now at Banstead there are a great many people who are reckoned as pauper patients who have not come to us from the prisons, but who have, I know, been in prison at various times.

5956. In addition to those two appointments that you have had you are, I think, lecturer on lunacy, at St. Bartholomew's Hospital?—Yes.

5957. And you have been so for a long time, I think?—Yes, I have for more than 20 years.

5958. Can you give the Committee any idea of the number of persons at Banstead who have been received from prison?—Yes, 68; 36 men and 32 women.

5959. In the course of what time?—Eighteen years. There are none there at the present moment.

5960. Of those prisoners a large number are, I believe, what they call "remand" cases. I do not know whether you are aware of the system pursued?—No; they are people who have been tried and sentenced, and in a great majority of cases have become insane after detention in the prison. As a rule that is so.

5961. I do not know whether you are aware of the system which is pursued in Holloway Prison. I believe that it is at Holloway Prison from which the larger number of persons come to you, is it not?—Yes, from Holloway and Wormwood Scrubs.

5962. A larger number have come during the last few years from Holloway?—Yes, certainly.

5963. I do not know whether you are aware that of those persons that are sent to Holloway, a large number are sent there as being doubtful cases, to be placed under examination?—Yes, I know that that is the case.

5964. Could you at all distinguish in those 68 prisoners that you have received how many are of that class, that is, persons sent to prison to be kept under observation?—No, I have no means of telling you that.

5965. Have many cases come before you in which you have been made aware, from your inquiries into the history of the case, that they have been considered as sane when sent to prison, and have become insane after imprisonment?—Yes, certainly.

5966. Can you at all give me the figure?—I cannot tell you the number, but I know it is a considerable number who have become insane since their imprisonment.

5967. Being sane on admission?—Yes, being sane on admission into the prison, on committal. By that I do not mean imbecile patients. I do not mean that they have been originally persons of weak mind, but they are persons who have shown distinct forms of insanity after their committal to prison.

5968. Having, as far as you are aware, shown no symptoms previously?—Yes.

5969. May I ask what is the source of your information with regard to that point; I mean what are your means of finding it out?—I find that out generally from the people themselves by finding out what part of the prison they were in before, and how they were treated before.

5970. Would you mind going a little into detail on that?—For instance, if a patient recovers or improves, or is able to converse afterwards, I ask him what his experience has been in the prison, where he was up to a certain time; and then I conclude (which I think is a very definite conclusion) that his insanity has come on since his admission into the prison. In some cases I certify on admission. It may be he was so on admission into the prison, so that I go by indirect and by direct evidence. The nature of the prisoner's insanity is often a guide as to how long it has lasted.

5971. What kind of evidence would it be that would convince you that a person had been in prison, and had been sane on admission into the prison? What would be the sort of information given by the patient to lead you to think that?—That he had not seen the doctor, that he had been treated in the ordinary way, or that he had been perhaps employing himself, or that he had been allowed out a certain time for exercise, and by his statement of what the condition of things was in the prison when he was admitted, showing that he had a fair idea of what was going on perhaps at the time he was admitted.

5972. In a short statement which you sent to the secretary you speak of a particular girl admitted from Wormwood Scrubs. I will not mention her name; her initials, C. A., are sufficient?—Yes.

5973. She was admitted into prison, and of her you say that you believe she became insane after her reception?—Yes.

5974. Could you furnish the Committee with any details of that particular case? It would clear our ideas if you could give us the details of one particular case distinctly, perhaps?—Well, she was a girl, as near as I can remember, about 17 or 18 years old. She was about the developmental period, which is a very awkward time for both girls and boys or young men. It is the time of puberty, which is a time at which criminal acts, which may mix them up with the police, are very apt to occur. She had been at work, and had fallen out of work, and I have no doubt that she fell into bad health, and I think she stole something. Then she was sent to prison, and was there for a time, and then developed those symptoms which clearly pointed to adolescent insanity, a particular form of insanity which shows itself about that period in girls.

5975. Could you give us any dates of that case?—No, I did not bring the particulars of that case with me beyond what I have stated there. I merely mentioned her case.

5976. Would you have the details?—Yes, I could send you the details.

5977. You take down notes not merely of the symptoms as shown to you, but of the previous history?—Yes, as far as we know it; but I came to the distinct conclusion there that she became insane, and first showed the symptoms of it soon after she came into the prison. I will not say that there was not an incubating stage before, but it is very clear to my mind that she showed the symptoms after she got into prison.

5978. Have any facts come to your knowledge bearing on prison life which would lead you to suppose that the circumstances of her life were unfavourable to her life?—The circumstances of the prisoner?

5979. Yes?—Well, of course, I am very much opposed to keeping people on low diet because they are criminals, or because they show violence, or because they show displays of temper. I am very much opposed to putting them on low diet, or to keeping them necessarily in seclusion, because I look upon these conditions as very often, in the majority of instances, resulting from temporary ailments, which is a medical question. I think that if you give them poor diet you increase it. I think that if you lock them up in those rooms for any considerable time, you throw them on themselves; you increase what is called their subject consciousness; you make them creatures of feeling and impulse; you prevent the development of thought and ideas; you stop altogether their object consciousness, that is to say, their relations with the external world, or what is going on around them, such as it is; and thereby you throw them entirely on themselves, making them introspective, impulsive, and incapable of controlling themselves. That is my experience. We very often find with insane people that, if they become noisy, we might put them for a short time in a room by themselves, but we never put them on low diet. We should think it a thing entirely opposed to all medical principles. We should put them, perhaps, if they were violent, for a short time in a single room until they became quieter; that is to say, perhaps, until they have had time to be treated medically, and we take them into the open air to exercise them in company of a couple of attendants, so as thoroughly, if possible, to increase their digestive processes; and we find that very often patients who are rather noisy in the single rooms become quieter in associated dormitories. I had a very striking instance of that the other day. Some patients were sent up to me from the Exeter Asylum, because they had not accommodation for them; they were not criminals; they were said to be very noisy, and they wanted special accommodation at night. We tried them in an associated dormitory, and they have been perfectly quiet since. We find frequently that putting them in a single room tends to foster hallucination, throw them on themselves, and by increasing the subject consciousness to render them mere creatures of impulse.

5980. By "subject consciousness" you mean thinking too much about their own feelings, and thinking too little of what goes on outside them?—Yes; they have no opportunity of thinking of what goes on outside, and therefore their feeling, not being transposed into thought, acts as an excitant or depressent, as the case may be.

5981. I do not know whether you know that strict injunctions are given in all prisons that persons who are suspected of being of unsound mind are kept under observation in associated rooms?—I did not know that they were; I think they ought to be, of course.

5982. That regulation would be entirely in accordance with what you think to be right?—Yes, certainly.

5983. And you are aware perhaps that the medical officer of the prison has the fullest liberty, and indeed it is enjoined upon him to see that their diet is suitable for their case?—That is when they have shown symptoms.

5984. When they are under observation, I meant to say?—Yes, I know that he has unlimited power of ordering what diet he likes.

5985. That being the case, and supposing the medical officer avails himself of that freedom, would you consider, from what you have heard of the subject from your patients, that there was still anything in the prison life that was prejudicial?—Yes. I do not think you get any advantage at all by putting people on low diet.

5986. We assume that, for persons with regard to whom there is such a suspicion of insanity as justifies their being placed in an associated room under observation, the low diet ought not to prevail?—No.

5987. Then, my question was, whether any other circumstance had come to your knowledge with respect to prison life which had led you to think that it tended to promote insanity among persons who had not exhibited any symptoms before?—Yes; I question very much whether they get sufficient open-air exercise.

5988. That would be one element?—Yes, I think open-air exercise is extremely important.

5989. I rather gather you mean that there may be cases in which no sign of insanity has shown itself justifying the person being put into an associated cell?—Yes.

5990. And in which the current discipline, involving confinement, might have been prejudicial?—Yes, I do think so.

5991. And such a case as that which you have mentioned of C. A. is, in your opinion, a case in point?—Absolutely. I think that the ordinary prison discipline applied to a case of that sort would have a most detrimental effect on the girl.

5992. You are of opinion, I think, that prisoners, as a rule, are apt to commit insane acts. In your statement to the Secretary I think you say criminals being, as a rule, either insane persons, imbecile of neurotic taint, or people who have degenerated and become demoralized by toxic agents, such as opium, drink, &c., are more apt to commit insane acts, such as suicide or homicide?—Yes, I do; I do not believe in such a thing as moral insanity without a brain impairment; I do not believe in moral insanity without an actual imperfection of the brain, or a degeneration of it. I do not think you can have such a thing as moral insanity, that is absolute wickedness, if you have a bad person, without some neurotic taint or some nerve affection which renders him incapable of appreciating the condition of things in which he lives with society at the time.

5993. Assuming that is a sound view, are you prepared to go so far as to say that criminals, as a rule, exhibit that neurotic taint?—Yes, I do; I think that if you examine them by psycho-physical processes you may almost universally detect it. Such, for instance, I mean, as examining into the shape of the palate and experiments with regard to reaction time.

5994. Will you explain to the Committee what you mean?—Well, of recent years a series of experiments has come into vogue called psycho-physical experiments, by which you are enabled to test the rapidity with which a person can answer to a stimulus presented to him. It is found in proportion as persons have degenerated or are imbecile, or have had good brains at some time which have degenerated from toxic agents, that they are incapable of responding to these stimuli as shown by a reaction time apparatus, and if you trace the history of those people you will find there is something in their family which is certainly one of the causes of insanity. For instance, you will find there is drunkenness in the father or the mother, or you will find rickets, which is a very frequent case, or you will find some form of epilepsy. If you examine into the early history of one of these children you will find that when a child he suffered from convulsions or night terrors, which are the early elements of physical incapacity, and you will find that as he grew up to the age of puberty, which is from about 15 to 20 years, and which is the age when they are apt to fall into criminal habits, he or she exhibited instability; and you will find that the attacks have been periodic according to the periodicity of the sex. If you examine into their early history you will find that, and you will come to the conclusion that these are people suffering from congenital weakness, which we call a neurotic taint, and then it is very easy to see that they are soon influenced by external causes, by people with whom they come in contact; that they easily fall into bad habits of drink or become demoralized by opium taking or various other toxic agents which they meet with in their course until they come into the hands of the law. That is distinctly shown in all of them; perhaps I ought not to say in all of them, but I am pretty confident that in all of them there is something which can be found out in them which shows a physical disease.

5995. I suppose your experience of criminals is exclusively derived from what you have seen as a physician to a Lunatic Asylum?—I have not had any prison experience.

5996. Would you not say that there are certain crimes which display a very large amount of sagacity and a considerale amount of audacity of character, and of prudence and rather high intellectual qualities?—Yes, such as foresight and so on; but that is not inconsistent with the insane condition of the patient or with neurosis. We find some imbeciles, and even an idiot patient occasionally, who has highly developed faculties in some particular, but the fact of his having those faculties does not make him able to maintain his position in society, because his brain is not equally balanced all round. He cannot put himself, as we say, in thorough relationship to his environment. The sane mind is the mind of a man who appreciates the circumstances in which he lives, and who is able, by comparing this and that, and by allowing this process to be balanced in his mind against that, to adapt himself to circumstances; that is to say, to bring himself into true relationship with his environment. At the same time it allows for what may be called sparks of genius in some people. For instance some of them may be able to lay plots and even exhibit sparks of genius, and yet they cannot be accepted as sane. On the other hand, some of the greatest geniuses we have are notably the most insane.

5997. Are you prepared to say that all criminals should be regarded as patients?—From my point of view I do, and I must.

5998. Would you say that they should never be punished?—Well, of course that is a very difficult question, but do you mean should have no punishment at all?

5999. Yes?—Well, I think that it ought to be of a very limited character and entirely subordinate first of all to medical treatment. I think that most of these symptoms of violence, and displays of temper, and thefts, and such criminal acts as that, are due to a bad condition of health, grafted on to a bad condition of morals, and in very few instances indeed should I punish them.

6000. A very large part of the criminal lunatics that come under your observation I suppose, are addicted to the use of these toxic agents of which you speak, I mean drink or opium?—Yes, a good many of them, the majority of them. Sometimes it is morphia. At the same time I have had some of those distinctly weak-minded people to whom you referred. There is a notorious case which has been with me for a long time. He was a housebreaker; he had served long terms of penal servitude, and I think it was a mistake ever to have put such a man in prison. He was a candidate for a lunatic asylum for a long time before his imprisonment.

6001. I think you have already told as that in all cases in a prison you would yourself object to prolonged solitary confinement?—Yes.

6002. What do you call prolonged solitary confinement?—Keeping him there and never taking him out for two or three days. I should call that very bad treatment from my point of view.

6003. Does your objection apply to keeping a man in seclusion so far as several hours a day is concerned, and setting him to work for that time, but taking him out to the chapel and to the exercise ground, or to occupying him for the greater part of the time?—Yes, I would do that. I should not object to that provided that it did not go on for too long; provided he had his proper diet, provided he was taken out and exercised, and provided he was made to do a certain amount of work. I think that might be necessary, and I think it is occasionally necessary to put people by themselves, especially when they are violent.

6004. How long would you be prepared to carry on that moderate seclusion of which I have just been speaking?—A man then would be in his cell chiefly for the night you mean?

6005. No; supposing he were at work in his cell during the day?—Then I should think he ought to go out for two hours in the morning at least, and two hours in the afternoon; he ought to have a fair diet, I do not say a stimulating diet, but he ought not to have the simple bread and water diet. If he is able, he ought in addition to that to do some work, and then I think you might watch him and treat him medically, and judge by his condition what to do with him. Then I think you might keep him for a considerable time under those circumstances.

6006. (Sir Algernon West.) Do your remarks apply to all prisoners, or are you still talking of prisoners who have shown some evidences of insanity?—No, I am talking of all prisoners.

6007. (Dr. Bridges.) Most of the criminal lunatics who come under your observation are, I believe, short sentence cases?—Yes, they are. We have only one long sentence, that is this man who was transferred from Broadmoor after his sentence expired, but being still insane he was sent to us, and is there now. He is an imbecile.

6008. Do you think that that class, the class who come on short sentences are specially liable to be of weak or excitable brain?—Do you mean those who go into prison for the first time, and therefore have short sentences.

6009. No, there are cases of those who have been in prison over and over again with short sentences, for drink, for instance?—Yes.

6010. There is a well known case which is reported in the papers this morning?—Yes.

6011. Do you say that that class is more especially liable to this instability and this neurotic condition of which you speak?—Yes, I do. I think so. I think it is because when they get outside they get exposed to those influences again, and cannot resist them, and therefore come under notice again after a short period for a second or a 22nd time, or whatever the number may be.

6012. Then I suppose I may take it from what you have said that you are of opinion that a great deal of medical observation and attention should be given to all the inmates of a prison?—I do; I think that the treatment of prisoners is very much allied to the treatment of lunatics, and is essentially a medical question.

6013. You are of opinion that the principal officer of a prison should be a medical man?—Yes. I think he ought to be, I think there would not be any difficulty as regards the discipline of the prison, because there are asylums of which medical men have the superintendence, and now in all the English asylums medical men have the superintendence of them. They have the disciplining of a large staff of officers, and, of course, of those people who are mentally affected, as I think most prisoners are. I have no doubt about it. It has been very much better for the insane since medical men were put at the head of establishments of that kind. There was, of course, a time when they were not, and when they were subordinate to a lay officer in charge of them, and I am sure that it has been very much better, both for the management of the place and for the people themselves, since medical men have been at the top. I base it on the fact, which is a pretty well known and acknowledged fact now, that crime is a medical question.

6014. I suppose that you would admit that if you went into any ordinary prison you would not expect to find the inmates in such a condition that you could sign a certificate of insanity for them; I mean such a certificate as you would sign as a responsible physician?—Of course that is a very difficult question. Some of them may have been improved by the prison treatment; some of them may recover, and therefore if you saw them coming out at the end of their sentences a great many might be improved. A great many of them, for instance, are admitted in a condition of delirium tremens.

6015. I mean you would hardly go so far, would you, as to say that the mere fact of a man committing a crime, that is to say, such as a burglary, would justify you in saying, "I believe that man to be "insane, and the reason why I believe it, is that he "has committed a burglary"?—No. Of course I should have to examine the person, but I should be pretty confident that in examining him I should come to something which, in the great majority of instances, would justify me in signing a certificate for him.

Dr. T. C. Shaw.

16 Nov. 1894.

6016. But you would feel bound to find that from evidence?—Yes; I should have to find it from his physical condition. I should have to justify the thing from the physical condition, and from the history of the man, if I could get it.

6017. And would you not also be bound to find evidence satisfying you that the man was deranged, apart, I mean, from the crime which he had committed?—Yes. I say I should consider myself bound to find evidence of bodily instability.

6018. Of brain instability?—Yes, I include that in the body. For instance, the measurement of the head and sundry other tests, would have to be gone through.

6019. More than that, I mean?—Supposing I could not find any delusion about him?

6020. Yes.—I think to rely solely on delusion is a most dangerous thing.

6021. Would you expect your certificate to hold good in a court of law?—Yes, I should.

6022. Although the man might have no delusion whatever?—Certainly.

6023. And although there might be no evidence of his mental state, except the fact that he had committed a burglary?—But I think there would be evidence.

6024. You would expect to find it?—Yes, I should expect to find evidence that I could certainly put down on a certificate.

6025. With regard to this class whom we should all agree were, if not lunatic, yet at any rate in a weak-minded condition, of whom there are a certain number who have been reported to us as having been in prison, would you say that they require a great deal of medical observation?—No, I do not think they require very much medical observation, but I think that they ought to be seen medically every day. You get to know the patients. Of course they require a very careful examination to begin with. Then if a man is not taking his food you have that reported as a prominent thing, and you come to the conclusion that something is wrong with him. Then you have him weighed periodically, and you judge from his appearance. If he is losing weight you come to the conclusion that there is something radically wrong.

6026. But with regard to the admission of all prisoners, whatever their reported mental condition is, do you consider that they ought to be subjected to an exceedingly close medical examination on admission. I mean with regard to defining what their state is?—That is the right thing to do, I think, but, of course, it is an immense undertaking. Still it is the proper thing to do in my opinion. I have no doubt that a great many people are discharged from prisons at the expiration of their sentence, who would come under the class that you are speaking of now. They come to me afterwards—sooner or later they come to me—or, at all events, a great many of them. I wished to find out in order to tell the Committee how many patients we have in the place who were at one time or another under treatment, but I cannot do it. In the first place they will not tell me, and in the next place I have no means of finding it out. Then I have attendants who have been warders at Coldbath Fields, and other prisons who recognise a good many of the patients as old prison inmates, and I may add that a great many of these people are of the class I am describing, suffering either from a primary kind of insanity, which never shows itself in what is the most prominent sign to most people, that is, in a delusion, but it shows itself in general unsteadiness of conduct, in disobedience when they are young people, in acts of mischief of a more pronounced kind later, and, finally, as they go on through the developmental period they become downright criminal, and then develop into lunacy. So that it is a gradual process.

6027. With regard to your remarks as to exercise I gather that you attach great importance to that?—I do. If we get a very violent patient, as soon as possible I take him out and have him exercised. If we have a suicidal patient I take him out and have him exercised, and we find the very greatest difference directly. There is a very great difficulty in treating the insane comfortably in bad weather. If the weather is such that they cannot get into the grounds, it is bad for them. If we have to promenade them in the corridors they get restless, and you can scarcely go into the wards, they are so noisy.

6027*a*. Have you any distinct opinions, not merely with regard to exercise, but with regard to the employment of persons who are in this unstable or neurotic state?—I think it is absolutely necessary for any chance of restoration to a better state of things. We employ them on the land chiefly. I prefer to employ them in the open air when it is possible. Such people as have been painters and carpenters I sometimes employ at their own trades, though generally I prefer a change of occupation for a person who is distinctly insane. It gets him out of a groove.

6028. What would you do with the man who has been a town labourer who comes from the London slums?—I should put him on the land. At some of the asylums where this plan has been much cultivated they put the gentlemen patients to labour on the land with a spade; but where persons are dangerous you would not like to trust them with such things as spades. Then we have them harnessed, as it were. They are not really harnessed, but they practically draw carts about. They go in gangs of about 25. We find it is exceedingly useful. They get open air exercise; they sleep much better; they take their food better; they are more contented, and they are quieter.

6030. I would ask you just one more question on the system of solitary confinement. Whether in the strictest sense, or in the modified sense in which it is usually practised in prisons, are you of opinion that it leads in men to the vice of self-abuse?—Yes, and in women too. Therefore it makes them very much more impulsive. Nothing makes them so inclined to resent what they may interpret as an insult, or anything to annoy them, as that habit, which is very very common if the practice is kept up of seclusion.

6031. (Miss Orme.) What sort of exercise would you recommend for women in prison?—Needlework, washing.

6032. No, not work, but exercise?—Walking about.

6033. Walking in the yard, round and round, in the way they do now?—Yes.

6034. Do you think that is sufficient for them, as it gives them no exercise for the arms?—Do not they do the laundry work?

6035. Some of them do, but, of course, that is not in the open air; but you think that slow walking, round and round the yard, is sufficient?—I do not like them going round and round the yard. I should like to have a place for them where it is better planted, but I suppose that would not be right in a prison. I should prefer a more ornamental place than they have, and I do not see what possible harm a garden would do, but I suppose that would be thought against the incidents of prison discipline, and therefore I think the option of giving them prolonged exercise——

6036. Should not you recommend some lighter form of exercise, such as gardening, for women as well as for men?—Yes; I think, instead of having a plain ugly piece of ground to walk about in which is simply exposed to the sky, it would be better if they could have a garden.

6037. I mean, if they could do gardening, should you recommend light work of that sort for the younger women?—I think it would be the best thing for them if they could do it.

6038. You think that would be an improvement?—Yes.

6039. With those prisoners who have told you they were sane on entering prison, you have no means of knowing whether they have had some period of temporary insanity earlier in life?—Only from the friends who visit them, and in some instances, i.e., from the nature of the insanity, I have come to the conclusion that they have.

6040. So that it would not be the prison life that has first induced the insanity?—No, but it may have aggravated it.

6041. Is not it the fact that women who have suffered from temporary insanity in that way are very careful to deny it if you talk to them about their early life?—Well, they will generally tell you where they have been. They will tell you if they have been in other asylums.

6042. Then they say they were ill, perhaps?—They do not always recognise that they were ill at the time. It is not that they wish to deny it. Some of them will tell you that they were ill, and that they were very bad, that is in their clearer moments; but a great many of them do not recognise the condition in which they were. It is not that they wish to deny that they ever were so, but that they do not know that they were so. A considerable number come to us and recover, and do not remember at all being ill, and therefore they will deny that they have been ill. Others will say that they were ill, and they know that they were.

6043. So that, for that reason, and also because of them wishing to conceal it, you would get a good many cases where they would not tell you of early periods of temporary insanity?—Yes, certainly we should.

6044. (Mr. O'Connor.) The patients you have just spoken about would deny to you that they have been with you before?—Or at other asylums.

6045. Do they forget that they have left those other asylums?—No.

6046. In what condition must they have been when they left them?—They may have been removed or they may have been cured. What I meant was that they do not remember anything of their condition when they were at a place, and therefore they will say they were not insane, but if you came to know that they had been at such and such an asylum they would perhaps tell you that they had been there.

6047. I thought your answer was that they denied in many cases that they were in those institutions?—I meant to say that they do not say they have not been in those institutions unless you ask them directly.

6048. You regard criminality as a physical matter rather than as a moral matter, if I follow you rightly?—According to my view the moral demonstration depends on the perfection of physical structure.

6049. An evil tendency you would attribute to some physical cause?—Yes, from my point of view, that is the only way we have of estimating it.

6050. Would you, on the other hand, attribute to physical causes tendencies which are good?—Yes.

6051. Then good and evil from your point of view are virtually alike?—Of course that is a metaphysical question, but from my point of view that is the only way we can estimate them. We cannot imagine metaphysically what you call the functions of mind apart from brain matter.

6052. I would like to ask you this, whether your psycho-physical tests, if applied rigidly, would not show that everybody was more or less insane?—Well, they show this, that there is a standard according to which, if people are able to come up to the standard, they practically do not get into trouble, and do not get into prison. They are what we call "good citizens," but we find if people are not capable of coming up to this simple standard, they fall off and turn out what we call bad people, or what, in other words, we should call imperfectly developed people.

6053. It is a relative matter?—Yes.

6054. Do you think that the fear of punishment has any psycho-physical effect?—No, I do not think it has, certainly not with the insane.

6055. Have you a paddded room at Banstead?—Yes, several.

6056. Have you a straight jacket?—Yes, we have one, but may I say that during the 18 years that the asylum has been opened it has only been used on one occasion, and that was at the suggestion of the Commissioners of Lunacy. It was against my wish altogether, but I did it at the suggestion of the Lunacy Commissioners.

6057. I suppose you have a certain amount of discipline to maintain in the establishment?—Yes.

6058. And I suppose that the inmates of your establishment are more or less amenable to rewards or punishments, or to the prospect of that which is pleasant or that which is unpleasant?—Yes.

6059. Do you think there is any kind of insanity which requires to be treated by methods other than purely medical. Supposing, for instance, insanity took the form of assault and robbery with violence, do you think that personal castigation might be a good medical treatment for it?—I should not like to say that in some cases it might not be advisable, but we can treat them without it.

6060. Suppose you had a child who in a very low degree manifested that psycho-physical restlessness and unruliness which resulted in his mischievous conduct, do you think whipping might be safely resorted to as medical treatment?—I do not think it would do any harm if it were done under certain conditions, but I do not think it would improve the boy.

6061. You do not think there is any fear of sparing the rod and spoiling the child?—No, I have had them like that, and I know that they are amenable to other influences medically, and also what we should call hygienic and sanitary. Where a father has punished a child I have recognised a disease, and I have been able to combat the tendencies of the youngsters by medical and other means.

6062. At any rate, your experience enables you to say with certainty that a considerable proportion of prisoners are more or less affected in a way which calls for medical treatment?—Yes, I am very strongly of that opinion.

6063. And it may well be that many prisoners are sent to prison in a nervous condition, which, if recognised at the time of admission, would secure them medical treatment?—Yes.

6064. Would you say that in a large prison where 50 or 100 or 150 people are brought in in a single day, it is possible for a medical man to take such a diagnosis of each particular case as to be able to recognise the forms of insanity?—No, I do not think it is possible all at once, because I think it sometimes requires a considerable period to find it out.

6065. It may well be then, that a man who is really a lunatic would pass the medical officer on the day of his admission without provoking the least suspicion of the mischief which is in him?—Yes, he might. I find it sometimes—not always—not easy to re-certify a patient on one particular day, because the symptoms of insanity are very often periodic, intermittent, and undemonstrative; and the person who has power one day to conceal a delusion, if he knows the cause of his being there, cannot help the next day demonstrating it if the conditions of his bodily health are not so good.

6066. You set great value upon cheerful occupation in the treatment of the insane?—Yes, of course. With that view we go, I think, to extremes rather. We provide them with theatres and all sorts of amusements, and take them on picnics.

6067. But you think the prison experience goes to the other extreme?—Yes, of course it does.

6068. Let me assume that a prisoner who is mentally affected, though not obviously so, has passed the medical officer on a Saturday night, would you say that it would be likely to benefit him or to injure him to have him kept in solitary confinement from the Saturday until the Monday, owing to there being no Sunday exercise?—I think it would injure him, certainly. I do not see what object there is in putting the man in solitary confinement.

Dr. T. C. Shaw.

16 Nov. 1894.

6069. But the great majority of prisoners are in solitary confinement?—Yes. To my mind that would be rather a mistake. When I admit a person who is said to be insane, even if I cannot see his insanity, I do not put him in a single room, but on the contrary I put him in a dormitory with two or three others to have him better under observation. I can find out a great deal more about a man in that way than I can by putting him in a single room.

6070. The confinement of all the prisoners and dealing with them in gross from Saturday until Monday is therefore a thing which, primâ facie, you would deprecate?—Yes, without getting any exercise on the Sunday, do you mean?

6071. Yes?—I think it is a bad thing.

6072. We have had it in evidence over and over again that in most prisons men are locked in their cells from Saturday to Monday, with the exception of the time for church and for any exercise they have?—It seems to me to be a very wrong principle.

6073. You think it would have a very deleterious effect on the prisoners?—I think so for the reasons I have given.

6074. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I have before me the Appendix to the Report for 1888–89 of the Commissioners, and I see in that report that there were a number of 407 prisoners sent to Holloway for the purpose of being put under examination, so that a report might be sent as to their state?—Yes.

6075. Of course I am assuming, and I have a right to assume, that none of them would have been sent unless there was something strange in their manner so as to justify anybody sending them to have their state inquired into?—Yes, certainly.

6076. I notice that out of those 407 cases, there were 215 who were reported sane at the end of seven days, 107 who were reported to be of weak and impaired intellect. A question was put to one of the medical gentlemen, I think, from Holloway upon this, and he said that those persons were not insane, and he had one of his own letters put into his hands, the form of which was, "I see no sign of actual insanity, "but I am of opinion that the man is of weak and "impaired intellect"?—Yes, that rather bears out what I have been saying.

6077. I am putting these figures to you; 85 were reported to be insane. Now what would you recommend should be done in cases where such a large number as 107 are returned to the Court which has to deal with them as not being insane but of weak and impaired intellect?—Of course that is the crux. That is a very difficult question to settle. It is a very expensive question, because there can be no doubt that if these people go out again, at any time if they are unable to get work, or if they are led away to drink, they will go back again to the prison, and that will happen time after time. Perhaps the most economical, and certainly the proper treatment for them, in my opinion, is to have them kept in some sort of an institution. If the Government would have another sort of criminal lunatic asylum on the principle of Broadmoor, for patients who are not of so bad a class as they are at Broadmoor, I should say personally that would be a very good thing. I think they ought to be kept under supervision, or, at all events, under medical supervision for a time, and under certificate until it is considered that some of them have passed that period of life of which I have been speaking, which is so very dangerous to these people of the lower orders, and if you had a little healthy discipline, and they had been taught and instructed, which is possible, in handicrafts, a great many of them might be made useful persons.

6078. I think there is no doubt we may assume that a great many of that number of 107 who come up to be dealt with are dealt with, either by being sentenced or not, and come under the head of prisoners who were in that state; not being reported as insane?—Yes.

6079. Would you let me draw your attention to what I think rather a startling thing. In this same year 1888–89, I see in the Appendix that 59 were reported as cases of insanity from prisons. Now so far as I have been able to test it, it appears that 16 cases of insanity which were sent from prison occurred within 14 days of the imprisonment?—Yes.

6080. Would that induce you to think that the origin of the insanity occurred before the imprisonment, or could have been due to the 14 days imprisonment, or that the seeds were laid before coming into prison?—I should think it is most probable that the seeds were laid before the person went into prison, and that therefore it was most important that the person should have very careful medical attention during the whole of that time. I should think seclusion in a cell or anything like restriction of diet would be calculated to bring on or to expedite and to hasten the development of the outbreak. Fourteen days is a very short incubation period for insanity, except in some particular instances.

6081. That would be 16 out of that number?—Out of 407, do you mean?

6082. No, out of 59?—Yes.

6083. That would leave 43 cases?—Yes.

6084. I do not want to go through each particular case, but assuming this to be true, that 43 of these cases which, added to the 16 cases, would make up the 59, were entered as having been in an unstable, weak, deranged, disturbed, moody, excitable, morose, peculiar, and dull, uncertain, or strange condition of mind on reception, would that, in your opinion, rather point to the possible seeds of insanity having been sown prior to the imprisonment?—Yes.

6085. And not arising out of anything to do with the prison treatment?—No. That probably was the cause of their coming under the action of the law.

6086. Do you know of your own knowledge that for some years there was a great disinclination on the part of medical gentlemen, for certain reasons, to certify as to lunacy?—Yes, and there is now very great reluctance, especially with the better class of persons. In fact, it is almost impossible in some cases to get lunacy certificates, and I think the consequences of that will be disastrous.

6087. That is true as to the better classes, but that also pervades pretty nearly all classes?—Yes, it does.

6088. And in the lower classes because really there is no motive power in a great many of them?—That is it.

6089. And so they pass by neglected and unthought of?—Yes, and I think the evil of it will show itself in a few years.

6090. That is an evil and a growing evil?—Yes, I think it is bound to increase the neurotic condition of individuals, and there are a great many people who think now that there is more of what is called neurasthenia than there used to be, owing probably to the fact that you are stating.

6091. Do you think that may possibly be some reason for the growing numbers which find their way into prisons?—I think it is, and with reference to those imbeciles about whom we were speaking just now, for whom I said some sort of accommodation ought to be provided, persons of that class, if they remain outside and have children, would be sure to have children of a very much more degraded type, getting down towards the animal, and the consequences must be more disastrous to society in general.

6092. (Sir Algernon West.) I suppose you attribute a great deal of crime to insanity and drink?—Yes, directly or indirectly.

6093. Should you be in favour of having special homes? When I say homes, I mean that habitual drunkards should be sentenced to an inebriates' home, instead of being sent to prison?—Yes.

6094. And keeping them for a long time?—Yes.

6095. It is no use sending habitual drunkards to prison for a month, or even three months?—I do not think it is any good.

6096. Will you tell me the shortest time in which you could hope to produce any effect on an habitual drunkard?—I think he ought to stand a test of 12 months. Of course, in our asylums now, or, at least, in very few of them, are intoxicating drinks used, and especially is that so in the one I am connected with, where we have no intoxicating liquor of any kind. They do not have it even as an ordinary article of diet. It has been stopped.

6097. Does that excite or reduce the craving for drink?—If a person comes in whose insanity is clearly traceable to drink, he does not get a drop. We knock him off his drink at once. He has milk, perhaps, and plenty of exercise in the open air, and if he stops five, six, seven, or eight months, he comes to see that he can do without it; and I have the histories of people who came under these conditions and have left, and I find that afterwards they go on without it. It has been a very good thing, indeed, to do away with all alcohol in asylums.

6098. Then you would be strongly in favour of such homes, and you think that they would diminish largely our prison and our insane population?—Yes, I do. I cannot tell you what the exact proportion of those suffering from insanity owing to drink is, but I think it is very much larger than is supposed. I have been recently making some post-mortem investigations, and they result in this, that whereas in the general hospitals the proportion of patients dying from kidney disease ascertained by post-mortem examination is about 25 per cent., yet in our post-mortem examination we find kidney disease amongst the insane to be about 45 to 47 per cent., and I cannot account for this except by assuming it comes from drink. I do not think, for instance, that worry would cause renal disease except to a certain extent, but these are not the classes of people in whom worry occurs. In those cases I have taken considerable pains to examine very carefully the relatives of the deceased, and I find that though at first they have said he has not been a drunkard, still it turns out that there has been a great deal of drinking going on, which no doubt has contributed to the enormous amount of kidney disease we get in asylums. It has not been published, but I shall publish the fact. I am going to use it, and it is at the service of this Committee. These facts refer to women as much as to men.

Dr. T. C. Shaw.

16 Nov. 1894.

6099. (Mr. O'Connor.) May I ask you if you have taken the trouble to distinguish the cases that have been a long time with you and those that have been only a short time under your treatment. I would ask whether the same proportion of kidney disease presents itself in your post-mortem examinations in cases where persons have been a long time with you as presents itself in the case of short-period patients?—Yes; with those who have been a long time with us we do not find so much.

6100. The height of it comes from persons who have been with you for short periods?—Yes, and in cases of general paralysis we find it very often.

6101. (Dr. Bridges.) You were asked with regard to the utility of inebriate homes, and the period for which you think a patient should be detained there?—Yes.

6102. Do you make a distinction between women and men in that respect?—I think the women are, perhaps, rather more difficult to cure than the men; but I think 12 months would be a very good time. I do not think less would be of much use.

6103. (Sir Algernon West.) I have no more questions to ask you, but I should like if you have anything to tell us that we have omitted that you should do so, because any statement you may make would be acceptable to the Committee?—No.* I think your questions have been so very apt and to the point that I have practically nothing more to say that would interest you.

* Dr. Claye Shaw wrote to the Secretary on the evening of the day of his examination as follows:—

"It occurred to me, after leaving the Home Office, that it would have been better to have availed myself of the Chairman's permission, and have stated that I do, of course, acknowledge a class (limited) where bad initial training, otherwise schooling in 'vice,' may cause a young and otherwise healthy brain so to function as to render the person out of accord with the proper social environment, and hence may bring him under the cognisance of the law, or, as it is called, make him a 'criminal.' In such a case, anthropometric observation alone might not detect a physical defect. But such cases scarcely come under the class to which Dr. Bridges alluded, and I only now mention them to save myself from being understood to have meant that every 'criminal' is organically diseased. That such persons ever become 'criminal' is accidental, not necessary, as in those of the true criminal type."

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Richard Gorst called and examined.

Mr. R. Gorst.

6104. (Sir Algernon West.) You are the secretary of the National Association of Certified Reformatory and Industrial Schools?—That is so.

6105. Is that a philanthropical school?—Not exactly; it is a combination of the schools. It is an association of the schools really for the purpose of watching the interests of those schools, and for promoting what we consider would be for the good of the schools.

6106. Are you identified with those schools. Do you represent the committee of Redhill, for instance?—Yes; the committees nominate representatives to sit on the council of the association.

6107. And, therefore, you are really speaking the views of the reformatory and industrial schools?—Yes, generally.

6108. I see it was established in 1881?—Quite so.

6109. And the representatives and managers of two-thirds of the schools which are now under the inspection of those are represented on your council?—Quite so.

6110. Have you read Mr. Trevarthen's evidence that he gave to the Committee?—I have had a summary of it.

6111. One of the main points, I think, of his evidence was in favour of raising the age for boys going to Redhill?—Yes; there is a strong feeling amongst managers of reformatories that the age might be now beneficially raised to 18.

6112. That is 18 on entrance?—Quite so.

6113. Retaining them until when?—21, that is their desire.

6114. The present ages being 16?—Yes, 16 for admission.

6115. Up to what age?—To 21, until last year when Lord Leigh's Act was passed which limited it to 19.

6116. Notwithstanding that, you are strongly in favour of the ages being raised from 19 to 21?—Yes, there is a very strong feeling in favour of that.

6117. May I take it that Redhill is a type of other reformatory institutions?—I think you may.

6118. And the best type?—I think so, it is the leading institution of its kind in the country.

6119. Mr. Trevarthen, I think, was very strongly in favour of this—that a boy entering that reformatory should be purged of his crime, that is to say, that his punishment, whatever it was, should be over, and that he should let every boy start with a clean sheet; in fact, I think he said every boy was told when he went, "There is no more punishment for you if you "behave well"?—There is a strong feeling amongst managers that the punishment for a crime should be given, and that a youthful offender should be purged before entering into the reformatory. They do not like it to be regarded that the reformatory is part of the punishment, but rather that it is a training school to fit them for better things.

Mr. R. Gorst.
16 Nov. 1894.

6120. Still, you would be in favour of shortening the time of punishment, I suppose, and adding to it the time which it was necessary the boy should remain in a reformatory school?—Quite so.

6121. You would not care what that punishment was, or how short or how long it was?—No; the managers of reformatory schools are not so much concerned as to the character of the punishment, provided they get a sharp and adequate punishment.

6122. Would they be in favour of flogging for boys?—I think so.

6123. That would satisfy them without imprisoning them?—I think it would, but they feel that there should be some period intervening between the committal of a youthful offender to a reformatory, and his reception into the reformatory to permit him being cleansed, and to permit of arrangements being made for his reception.

6124. What suggestion would you or your council give for carrying out that, because that seems very difficult, does it not?—It has been suggested that local authorities should be asked to establish houses of detention for juveniles only, and that the county councils should take the control of them.

6125. I suppose your object would be that while in that house of detention the different classes of boys should be sifted?—Quite so.

6126. And that they should be sent to an appropriate place for them?—Just so.

6127. Would you separate criminals and non-criminals?—If possible I would.

6128. Would you put them in the same house of detention previously?—If possible, not.

6129. Would you tell the Committee what classification of boys you would make as between the criminal and suspected boys; perhaps you can define that to the Committee?—That would depend very much on the charges brought against the child, and the known character before being brought before the justices, and the particular class to which they belong. It would be very desirable that there should be a bureau or some official charged with the duty of classifying those cases and selecting the schools suitable for them.

6130. These reformatories are kept up now, to a great extent, by voluntary contributions, are they not?—No, not to a great extent. The chief sources of income are the Treasury allowance and the contribution from the local authorities from which they are sent.

6131. Which is mixed, I think?—Yes.

6132. Are any of these reformatories self-supporting, or nearly self-supporting?—Most of them are.

6133. I mean, of course, by the labour of their inmates?—Yes, a great number of them have no subscriptions at all. They are self-supporting in that they make the Government grant, and the local authority grant, suffice with the earnings from their trades.

6134. How many reformatories are there?—About 50.

6135. Are there too many?—I should not say so at present. There has been a distinct tendency not to send boys and girls to reformatories of late years. There has been a falling-off in the number of admissions.

6136. Could you tell us what is the average of boys who pass through these reformatories who you know are leading honest lives?—I believe from 80 to 86 per cent.

6137. May I ask you if these inquiries as to their honest lives are really carefully made?—I think so.

6138. It is not only a letter to say, "I am going on all right"?—No, the system is that they issue a form asking certain questions about a former inmate, and that form has to be signed either by his employer or some responsible person in the locality he lives in, who knows him; possibly a clergyman or minister of religion of the church or chapel he may attend, or possibly the school board official; and very often they are signed by the superintendent of police.

6139. And you think you can really account satisfactorily for an average of from 80 to 86 per cent.?—We have to produce this information and to give chapter and verse for each child.

6140. That really can be relied upon?—Certainly.

6141. Then, your general recommendation would be that in all cases of juvenile offenders there should be a house of detention. How many houses of detention do you think there should be; one for each county, or what?—One for each populous centre. For a large centre like Manchester possibly two would be sufficient, one for boys and one for girls; the same for Liverpool. In smaller towns one house would be sufficient.

6142. You know it has been said that there is great temptation to the managers of these reformatory schools to keep boys up to 21, that is to a greater age than they are kept now, in consequence of the advantage they are to the funds of the school. Do you think there is anything in that?—It might apply in a few cases, but I do not think it is general.

6143. In the case of a boy sentenced from 16 to 21 (which is a long sentence) would not you allow a discretion with the managers to recommend that such a boy, for instance, if an opportunity came to emigrate him, should have the sentence mitigated?—Certainly, if he could be discharged on a conditional discharge that he should not make use of his being sent abroad for getting discharged and then come back by the next ship. That is one of the things that managers of reformatories have to suffer a good deal from.

6144. But if they could really investigate the case, and find it was a bonâ fide case of permanent employment, you think a discretion, at all events, should be given to the managers to recommend it?—I should approve of that, but not that he should be finally discharged. The managers should be invested with powers of a conditional discharge.

6145. Something like a ticket-of-leave?—Yes, practically.

6146. Do not you think the fact of a boy going to prison leaves a taint upon him; that is to say, that it makes it more difficult for him to find employment?—Well, opinions in our association are very much divided on that point. For instance, they think that in England it does not deter a child from getting an honest living, while as to Scotland the very opposite opinion is held.

6147. Now, do you think the same objection in Scotland would apply to a boy who had been in a reformatory?—It is of reformatory cases I am now speaking.

6148. The question I asked you was with a view to your statement that the committees would all like punishment for a boy, and that a boy should be imprisoned and punished before he got to the reformatory?—Yes, there is a general feeling that they should be punished.

6149. In addition to that, do you think the fact that he has been in prison before going to the reformatory would operate on employers?—I think not.

6150. The fact that they have purged it by going to a reformatory you think is sufficient to find them employment?—I think it is.

6151. In the paper which you put before the Committee you do make a classification of reformatory schools in this way: "Schools for seniors from 14 to "18 years of age. Schools for juniors from 10 or "12 to 14. Schools for crippled and physically weak "or diseased children." And then you add: "That "a department of the inspector's office be created for "the classification of cases, and for directing the "committing authorities as to their disposal." That is the recommendation of your council?—Yes.

6152. In that recommendation you take the schools for sentences of from 14 to 18?—Yes; that would be on the assumption that the age of admission is raised to 18.

6153. Then you also recommend, I see, that the Treasury allowance should be increased?—Quite so.

6154. Do not you think that they will be able to support themselves by the labour they undertake, and the grant from the local body, and the Treasury grant, such as it is, at present? What reasons have you for wishing an extension?—In the case of senior schools of course there would be an increase in the staff and expenses of management consequent upon the introduction of trades of a more varied and highly skilled character, which would be necessary if you had older boys; and in the junior schools because of the less remunerative character of their labour if the classification I have spoken of were carried out.

6155. Then I understand that your main recommendations are to raise the age, to have a preliminary house of detention where boys can be sifted?—Yes.

6156. And that the existing reformatory schools are satisfactory and produce very good results?—Yes.

6157. And that the cost paid by the country should be greater?—Quite so.

6158. (Mr. O'Connor.) Have you any connexion with industrial or reformatory schools in Ireland?—Not very much. I know some of them, and I have been to them; but I do not know much about their working.

6159. Would the observation you made about the fact of boys having been sent to prison not operating against their getting employment refer to reformatory schools in Ireland as well?—No, I was confining my remarks entirely to England.

6160. What is your relation to the schools? Are you concerned with the occupation of the boys, their dietary, their punishment, and the disciplinary aspects of the establishments, or with the pecuniary aspects?—Do you mean my own personal relation to them?

6161. Yes, the association of which you are secretary?—Of course we deal with all questions affecting the welfare and interests of the schools.

6162. Can you say if any of the schools within your period have been closed because of unsatisfactory pecuniary results?—I think one or two reformatory schools have been closed of late because of the falling off in the numbers.

6163. Then I suppose there is a difference in the pecuniary point of view between reformatory schools, some being more and some less successful?—Of course the Treasury grant is more to the reformatory schools than it is to the industrial schools.

6164. I am speaking as between reformatory schools themselves; some would be more successful, and some less so?—It would depend on the circumstances of the school, and its situation and its power to make the most of its labour and its industries.

6165. But the fact is, there is a distinction to be drawn between different reformatory schools?—Yes.

6166. Some are more successful and some less so from a pecuniary point of view?—Yes.

6167. Still those are conducted at a profit?—Not exactly at a profit, because money is spent in the development and improvement of the establishment. Sometimes they may save a little on their general fund, but it is generally spent in improving the premises. That is my experience.

6168. Are any of the reformatory schools proprietary institutions in the sense that the owners can, if they like, when they realize a profit appropriate it?—No, I do not think so.

6169. They have no power to do so?—No, I do not know of a single case.

6170. There is no case in which the proprietors if they realize a profit can deal with it as their own?—I know of one or two private schools managed by private gentlemen (that is by one man), but I know the school is very heavily in debt.

6171. I am speaking of schools where a profit is made?—Yes, but I do not know of any such case.

6172. Have you had occasion to require the removal of boys from reformatory schools to asylums at any time?—Well, I know only one case; that was at the North Lancashire Reformatory, where a boy was found to have lost his reason, and efforts were made to send him to a lunatic asylum. That is within the last few months.

6173. Can you say whether the medical attendants of the reformatory schools have at any time made any reports with reference to the mental condition of the inmates?—I do not know of any such reports.

6174. Have there been any special observations with regard to insanity?—No, I do not know of any such reports.

6175. There is very little insanity, perhaps, in the reformatory schools?—Very little indeed, excepting the moral insanity, which, I take it, is a species of insanity.

6176. You recognise moral insanity as something more than the result of some physical defect?—Quite so.

6177. (Dr. Bridges.) Is not there a considerable difference in the results of different reformatories? You spoke of the average of those reformed being about 80 per cent., I think?—Yes.

6178. But there is a large margin of difference on both sides, is there not?—Yes.

6179. I mean sometimes the number of those cured falls as low as 70 per cent.?—And lower, I believe, in a few instances.

6180. Has your association, or have you, formed any opinion as to what constitutes that difference?—I think it is mainly a difference in the material that has to be dealt with, and dependent on the circumstances of their disposal after leaving the school. Some are more favourably circumstanced than others. For instance, in a town like Liverpool you will probably find a greater number of them returning to their old associations, where they would be less able to resist temptation.

6181. I suppose there are differences of treatment in the different institutions?—So much difference as results from the character of the individual in charge.

6182. Is not there a difference in structure; for instance, at Redhill you have classes, I think?—That is a large institution. Most of our reformatories are small places not containing more than from 60 to 100; but there are a few that go up to 200.

6183. Taking those of 100 and up to 200, are all of those placed in detached buildings as at Redhill?—No, I think there is only one other reformatory than that at Redhill that has more than one building.

6184. Would not you think that that might possibly have something to do with the result, and that the greater power of classification that is given by having separate buildings the better the result?—I should think it would be a decidedly good thing.

6185. Have you made any investigations as to the causes of failure. Assuming the failures to range from 10 per cent. to 30 per cent., have you at all examined that?—I hardly understand your question.

6186. You have reported that a certain number of boys who leave you are doing badly?—Yes.

6187. Have you formed any opinion as to what that failure has resulted from?—Well, I think there is a certain percentage of boys who find their way into reformatories who are incurable. You may do what you like with them, but I am afraid we should have to confess we should not succeed with them. Then, of course, the surroundings and after circumstances of a child are answerable for their failure.

6188. Could you tell the Committee at all of what nature the failure is. Has the boy generally got into trouble from theft, or has it been from some crime of violence, or has it been from drink?—The greater number of failures arise from theft; from the crime of dishonesty.

6189. (Miss Orme.) Does your association include girls' reformatories?—Yes.

6190. What is the opinion of the association as to the age for girls?—Do you mean on admission?

Mr. R. Gorst.
16 Nov. 1894.

6191. Yes; as to a higher age for admission, what should you approve?—Well, the recommendation applies to both girls' and boys' reformatories, and the recommendation is that it should be extended to 18.

6192. And for them to remain until 21?—Quite so.

6193. Should you approve of young women of 20 and 21 being in the same institution as young girls?—Certainly not.

6194. Not even in separate houses in the same school?—If they could be kept distinctly separate without any access to each other, then I should say it would be permissible.

6195. But the separation would have to be complete?—I think so.

6196. Do you make any difference between the age at which you would admit a girl into a school, and the age to which you would keep her if she had been under your management for some years?—Yes; I do not think it would be desirable to admit a girl up to, say, 21. We might keep a girl up to that time for her own good, but I certainly think it would not be desirable to admit a girl up to 21.

6197. Supposing, for instance, you had a junior school for girls, of, say from 14 to 17, you would keep girls until they were 17 in that school?—Not always; we should use the licensing system, and I think it is a system which could be applied with great benefit to girls. It does not follow that because a girl is sent until 17, that she should be kept until 17.

6198. Supposing for her own benefit it was necessary to keep her, would you keep her in the junior school until she was 17?—Yes.

6199. Would you admit a girl of the age of 17 to the same school?—Certainly not.

6200. The age varies according to whether you have had her under your charge for some years, or whether she comes fresh to you?—It would be quite a different thing.

6201. How many institutions do you think you would have to have to separate these classes?—I have not given much consideration to the number of girls' reformatories there are in the country, but no doubt you could multiply the number.

6202. You would have to have several in order to carry out your principle?—No doubt.

6203. You spoke of these houses of detention for juveniles; what would be the benefit of such a place if we could have it in comparison with an ordinary prison?—I do not know that there would be any very special benefit, except that it would meet a growing sentiment of the time, that it is undesirable to send a young child to a prison. It would not be a prison, but it would still enable the authorities to punish a wrong doer before drafting them off to the reformatory school.

6204. But apart from that public sentiment, you do not yourself see any practical difference in a child being kept in an ordinary prison, quite separate from the other prisoners, and being put in a house of detention?—Of course I quite agree with those who believe that it has a damaging effect personally. I am not now speaking for my association, but I think it has a damaging effect on the child's character to send it to prison.

6205. As to the chance of getting employment in England?—Yes, for that reason too.

6206. I thought you said that in England it had no effect?—Now I am speaking in my personal capacity, and not speaking of the feeling of the association, which is decidedly what I have already stated.

6207. Do you know whether the feeling of the association is that it has any bad effect on the child's character to send it to prison, supposing it is kept entirely separated from other prisoners?—It is believed it has not; there is a division of opinion upon that, but the preponderating opinion is that it has not any bad effect.

6208. Have you any reason you can give us why there has been this falling off in the number of reformatories?—I think it is owing to a growing sentiment on the part of magistrates, not to send young people to prison. Up to last year it was a condition that they must go to prison before being admitted to a reformatory.

6209. So that if the obligation of going to prison were removed, you think you would get a larger number of children sent to reformatories?—I think it is very probable.

6210. Can you give us the percentage of girls who are saved in reformatories?—I cannot without the official returns.

6211. Could you let us have that?—Yes.*

6212. (Mr. De Rutzen.) I understand from evidence that we have had, that you rather object to being considered penal reformatories, or to being called penal reformatories?—Well, we have not any penal reformatories in the strict sense of the word, and the word "penal" is objected to.

6213. I understand that you rather desire that the offence, whatever it may be, shall be purged by imprisonment before they go into a reformatory?—Yes, that is the feeling in England.

6214. Is that your feeling?—Personally it is not.

6215. Then what would your view be?—I should administer punishment either in one of those houses of detention that I have already spoken of, or by birching.

6216. Before entering your reformatory?—Quite so, that is what I mean.

6217. Of course, if the age is increased up to 18 for admission, these persons would be liable to be sent to reformatories who had committed very grave offences, such as robbery with violence, burglary, and so forth, which is often the case with lads of 17 and 18?—Yes, in such cases as that I do not see that there would be anything else, but a short term of imprisonment prior to going to a reformatory.

6218. That is your view, but you say a great many people think the offence should be punished before the reformatory system begins?—Quite so.

6219. You entertain a different opinion, and I suppose are of opinion that the two must be taken together;—the number of days imprisonment should be coupled with the four years detention in a reformatory. It is all one?—Well, as the sentences now stand, that is not so. They get 10 or 14 days imprisonment, and four or five years in a reformatory.

6220. The Act of Parliament rather stops that at the present time, and makes that, at all events, quite optional, and, in many instances, boys come to you without any imprisonment at all?—Yes, that is so.

6221. It has very recently come into operation, but do you think that that has had any effect one way or the other upon boys being sent to reformatories?—I think it has resulted in an increased number being sent since it came into operation.

6222. Now, taking your view that you would like imprisonment, and that imprisonment should precede sending them to reformatories, where is the difference between reformatories as they exist and penal reformatories?—Well, penal reformatories would be for the drafts from other reformatories of unmanageable cases, where they would require to have a sterner discipline and a better staff.

6223. But would there be any difference. Taking your view that there should be a previous imprisonment, it becomes a reformatory tacked on to a prison?—I do not quite understand the question.

6224. Your view is that there should be imprisonment prior to a person being admitted to a reformatory?—Quite so.

6225. Then that in no sense differs, does it, from imprisonment with a reformatory treatment?—Well, I suppose it scarcely does, if you are exact in the definition of terms.

6226. Then would a penal reformatory for all classes of boys, put under one head, meet your view?—A penal reformatory for exceptional cases.

6227. No, for all cases?—Oh, no, not at all. It is not my idea at all that we should have a penal reformatory for all cases.

* According to the Report of the Inspector of Reformatories for 1893, of the 406 girls discharged in the three previous years, 307 were stated to be doing well, and only 20 were known to have been convicted of crime since their discharge.

6228. But I thought you said that in all cases you liked to have the offence purged by imprisonment prior to taking them into a reformatory?—Yes, quite so; that is the feeling of our association.

6229. Is not that rather a distinction without a difference. Take the case now of a sentence for burglary, an offence which is often committed by lads of 18. I suppose you would not consider that seven or ten days imprisonment would fully satisfy such an offence as that?—Well, scarcely.

6230. Then it must be the imprisonment plus the reformatory system that follows after it?—Yes.

6231. Is there any power at a reformatory to refuse to take any particular lad?—Yes, it is quite optional with the manager.

6232. It is perfectly optional?—Yes.

6233. Have you known many instances where, even in bad cases, where from some misfortune, some weakness, a lad which has been convicted has been refused at a reformatory. I have an instance in my mind just at the present moment where a boy has not got the use of his right arm, but if in every other way he is fitted for a reformatory, would you take a lad like that?—At present we are debarred from taking him, inasmuch as we have to produce a medical certificate that he is suited for the discipline and training of the Institution, which a boy with a useless arm would not be.

6234. And however bad a criminal he may be, if he is not fitted for industrial training, you say you would rather be without him?—We are not allowed to take them.

6235. Have you any suggestions to make of any kind?—I submitted one to the Chairman just now, which is that we should have a classification, and that there should be schools for that class. It is felt to be one of the weak parts of the system that we have not provision for that.

6236. I was thinking of the possibility, taking your view of it, that there should be a penal reformatory that would be obliged to take cases of that description, whether they liked it or not?—You would destroy the voluntary character of the management if you compelled the managers to take a case that they were not cut out for dealing with.

6237. (Sir Algernon West.) Where are the reformatory schools for girls?—There are several in London, but I cannot tell you where they are without referring to the Blue Book.

6238. Are they managed by committees of ladies entirely?—Yes, I think they are in almost every case.

6239. And that is supposed to be satisfactory?—Yes, I think so.

6240. Now I ask you as a general question whether you have got anything more to say that you have not said in answer to the questions that have been put to you, and whether you have any suggestions to make?—Well, I have one or two points on my list, but I am not sure whether the Committee will consider them relevant. One is that at a conference held in London in July last, it was determined to memorialise the Secretary of State on one or two points affecting our schools. One was that many cases of criminal children are now handed over by magistrates to voluntary agencies which are uncontrolled and uninspected by the State; that as a consequence of this practice such children are not subjected to any adequate discipline or training of a reformatory character, and that criminal and non-criminal children are thus brought into close relationship with each other to the detriment of the non-criminal children, and that voluntary homes have no power to detain such cases, and magistrates have no power to commit for any definite period, and that some confusion and injustice arises from the want on the part of the magistrates of a clear understanding of the respective spheres of action of the various classes of schools. Those are points which we had intended to press upon the attention of the Secretary of State, and we suggested that a circular should be issued by the Secretary of State to magistrates, through their clerks, defining the respective spheres of action of those schools. Another point you have not touched upon is, that we ask that powers should be given to managers to transfer without prosecution, and with the consent of the Secretary of State on the recommendations of the inspector, cases from an industrial school to a reformatory school and vice versa, so as to secure better classification; and that there should be an extension of the powers of control after discharge from reformatory schools, as is the case now with industrial schools.

6241. I take it that the broad distinction between an industrial school and a reformatory school is, that in reformatories boys have been convicted of crime, and in the industrial schools they have not been convicted?—That is it; but there has been a disposition of late years to strain the Industrial Schools Act, which has somewhat arisen from the idea that it is not desirable to send young persons to prison, and they have strained the Act, and have brought many reformatory cases under the operation of the "Industrial Schools Act."

6242. (Miss Orme.) Is not it the case that you have industrial schools that can receive children physically affected, such, for instance, as that at Brentwood?—That, I think, is a truant school.

6244. Have not you any schools under your institution that receive children who are physically affected?—No, I do not know of any.

6245. There is nothing in the Act to prevent it?—There is one point here about the operation of the Reformatory Schools Amendment Act of 1891. It is felt that its operation has introduced a large amount of uncertainty and some confusion into the working of the Reformatory Act; and it is believed by many managers that it will greatly impair the success of the system, first, by reducing the age of discharge from 21 to 19; and, secondly, by limiting the application of the power of licensing in a great number of cases, which power is considered to be one of the most useful powers possessed by reformatory managers; and, thirdly, by reducing the area of operation of the Reformatory Schools Act.

6246. (Sir Algernon West.) What is their power of letting out a boy who has an opportunity of employment; do they possess that power?—Yes, quite so, with a boy whose character justifies his being released on license.

6247. Does this Amendment Act prevent that?—Not in so many words, but it says a young person must leave at 19; and if he only comes at 16 it does not give them a sufficient length of time to have any effect upon his character. That is what is meant. I do not think there is anything more that I need refer to. Except a point which I wished to bring to your notice about the superannuation of officers, but I hardly thought that you would entertain it. There is also a question of a grant in aid of certificated schoolmasters employed in reformatories, which is somewhat of an anomaly.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time.

Dr. Tennyson Deighton Patmore called and examined.

6248. (Sir Algernon West.) We know you are medical officer at Wormwood Scrubs?—Yes.

6249. How long have you been there?—I was promoted from Woking to Wormwood Scrubs in February 1881.

6250. Was Woking at that time a convict establishment?—It was a convict establishment for lunatics and for invalids.

6251. Were you medical officer as well as governor?—I was assistant surgeon at Woking for two years.

Dr. T. D. Patmore.

16 Nov. 1894.

6252. Then you were promoted?—Yes, to the post of medical officer at Wormwood Scrubs.

6253. How many prisoners have you at Wormwood Scrubs?—We have to-day 1,104.

6254. On an average, how many entrances do you have each day?—I should say, on an average, male and female put together, between 12 and 15; I have not prepared an exact estimate, but, according to the sessions, we have, perhaps, from 7 up to 34 daily.

6255. On these prisoners coming to Wormwood Scrubs, they are always examined by yourself or your assistant?—They are all examined by my assistant or by myself that day, and they are all seen by us both the next day. I see them especially that I may detect any despondency, depression, or insanity.

6256. Do you think you are able to give sufficient time really to investigate such questions as that?—I think that when they are seen that day, the object is to make sure that they are in a condition to sleep that night safely in the prison as distinguished from the hospital; and I consider that we do that. I can then usually detect, and I presume most doctors would detect, whether the man is in a condition where there might be danger of suicide, or of small-pox, or any infectious disease; the next morning I go myself, and my assistant sees them again most minutely. The women I look to myself, but I am talking of men now; perhaps you will take the men first.

6257. Yes?—The men are seen the next morning again by the assistant surgeon, so as to fill up all the records and different documents minutely with regard to their condition, mentally and bodily. Then I see them with the special purpose of seeing that they are not depressed, that they are not insane, and that they are not unduly unhappy.

6258. Your experience, you say, has been directed mainly to insanity. Will that enable you to say whether you think imprisonment is conducive to insanity or not?—I have watched the mental aspect of prisoners very closely, and I have seen nothing in the prison which tends to produce insanity. Much of course depends on the proper selection of the superior officers.

6259. Do not you find that the prisoners on their entering into prison are of a very low type?—I have to deal with two classes in connexion with this question, convicts and local prisoners.

6260. Let us deal with the lunatics first?—I find that a very few prisoners are of a decidedly low mental type, although there are more of a low physical type.

6261. What kind of proportion?—I should say if there is one in 30 of markedly low mental type, it is as much as there is, and I must say the theory of the great degeneracy of prisoners does not apply in my experience.

6262. Do you find many of these people come in from the visible effects of drink?—They are not very drunk when we get them, though, of course, we know they are in for drunkenness, and some of them show it in their faces, but I hardly ever have a prisoner who is reeling. I frequently say to a man, without looking at his paper, "You are evidently in for drink," and he says, "Yes, sir." Another man comes in and I say "Drink again," but they are not reeling with drink.

6263. Can you usually detect an habitual drunkard, granting he is perfectly sober when he comes in?—I think if your mind is specially directed to it you can, but taking (as we do) a lot of men, unless I were trying to detect them I should not know all the habitual drunkards.

6264. A large proportion of those prisoners have suffered from drunkenness?—Yes, but perhaps not so many as you think.

6265. Is it entirely a London population?—Ours is entirely, I presume, a London population; even the convicts, I think, are from near London.

6266. Do you find any marked difference between the convict and the prisoner?—I find the convict, speaking generally, is a remarkably clever, intelligent man. I disagree with those who assert that convicts are mostly very low in type. The convict is a clever professional man, who has chosen his career and does it consistently. I mean, of course, the convict who returns time after time to prison.

6267. Can you answer me the question why convicts go to Wormwood Scrubs at all?—That is merely a Home Office rule.

6268. They do not go to serve their sentence as convicts there?—A few come to us now for a few months only.

6269. You do not know any reason for their being put into the local prisons?—We merely have them sent to us. I do not know any reason for it, I presume it is merely administrative.

6270. Do you think it objectionable to mix prisoners and convicts?—I think you would get better management if you had only one class of prisoner under the same building. The hardened convict needs a firmer rule than the shorter term prisoner; and when the mind is attuned to the one it is not easy to rapidly change it for the treatment of the other, and this perhaps in the space of an hour.

6271. In a paper I have seen of yours, I think you object, very properly, to the terms of classification "first offender" or "first conviction." Do you think any great classification can be made, and, if so, what should it be as to the different classes of prisoners?—I think I may say first that you cannot know a first offender. With regard to the classification, I think, certainly, that, whether they are first offenders or not, when they are young they may be pliable, and, therefore, at some period of youth there should be some classification.

6272. That period of youth, I think, you are inclined to put low?—I think so.

6273. Not higher than 16?—I would not stand to a margin of 16 or 17 actually. Some boys who come in look 16, and they are only given as 14. If a boy looks 16 to a doctor's eye, or if he is 16 in his appearance of strength or development, I think he should be classified as of that age, but if you get a youth who is not developed, then, although he is 17, he might be classified with the others.

6275. Then you would be in favour of juveniles, as classified by the doctor, being kept in a different part of the prison altogether?—In speaking of juveniles, we are talking only of males now. I think if you have juveniles at all, they should not only be in a different part of the prison, but that they should be shut off, if possible, from the others, so that you really might have some relaxation of discipline and extra reformatory influence.

6276. Do you think there is any reformatory influence at all in prisons at the present day?—I think there is a reformatory element. I do not think it probably does very much good among the men, but I think all the officers try to produce it.

6277. Are there any reformatory results?—The chaplains would know more about that, of course. I have spoken to chaplains, and they tell me that "amongst the boys there is some reformatory "influence, and amongst the girls a good deal"; the percentage, I fancy, is much larger amongst the girls than amongst the boys.

6278. As to girls, would you apply the same rule as to allowing the medical officer to decide as to their apparent age?—I think with girls the age would probably be much higher at which you could reform them; and other people whom I have consulted think so too. I think very likely you might separate girls up to 20 with great advantage.

6279. We have heard from some witnesses that there is a great disadvantage from juveniles being seen at all by adult prisoners, and that they are very apt to meet them afterwards and say, "You have been in prison"?—I have only lately heard so from speaking to the warders, otherwise I do not know that; but it appears that women will agree to meet young women, who have no home, at the prison gates. These girls are then taken under glowing promises to some rooms, and the rest happens which you might expect; so that that answers your question that they should not be seen by the elder women.

6280. In this paper you say you think the association of boys has a greater contaminating influence than the association of men with boys?—If they are associated together so that they can talk, then I think 30 boys together would do each other more harm than one boy mixed up with 50 grown-up men, who will rather ignore him.

6281. Do you think there is a tendency amongst juveniles to try and make themselves out older than they really are, and to think it rather a grand thing to be an adult prisoner?—I have not formed an opinion upon that.

6282. I want to revert to a question I put to you earlier. Do you think you and your one assistant give that attention to all these various prisoners that they ought to have?—I think not; as it is difficult to give all the attention one would wish to special and important cases, when a considerable part of one's time and energy are occupied in sharing routine, and almost mechanical duties, with one's single assistant surgeon.

6283. May I ask what proportion of your day is taken up by what you call mechanical duties?—I will explain my day's duties. I should rather have used the term "routine" than "mechanical." One goes into the prison shortly after half-past 9 in the morning, and then I see all the prisoners who are reported for punishment, and I sign for every prisoner who is reported for punishment, so that after my signature is given the governor has no responsibility as to the effect on the prisoner's health of the punishment which he awards. I certify that the man is fit either for a heavy or a light punishment or for none at all. These are most responsible duties. It is possible that even death might result to a prisoner from an error when certifying a man for corporal punishment.

6284. What kind of time does that take you?—Possibly half an hour.

6285. Not more than that?—One really cannot allow it to take longer.

6286. You cannot spare the time for more?—No, I have to hurry it. Then I go to my hospital, and I sign up papers and read the various night reports and letters from the Home Office. I may have to settle some cases as to the mental condition of prisoners, possibly I may have to certify a man's fitness for corporal punishment and attend the same. Then decide on the diagnosis of some cases of malingered disease. Then I will have a letter perhaps from the Home Secretary as to whether a gentleman who has got into prison, and is somewhat depressed is likely to have his life endangered by further imprisonment, and on my reply depends, perhaps, that man's imprisonment. One may have five or six things to do in the morning which require a very keen description of judgment. After that, I go round my hospital with my assistant surgeon. I have about 50 beds generally in the male hospital, which are not generally all filled. As a rule, one's general average in hospital might be 36 or 40. Having prescribed for those cases, and done any little operations that are wanted—we do all operations ourselves.

6287. You are a surgeon?—Yes. Having done that, I go and see all the men who came in the night before for the purpose I have told you; that is, specially as to their minds, and then I consider that I can tell, as a rule, whether a man is insane or not if I have not more than a few to do; but if I had 30 or 40 or 50 men to do in the time, it would be difficult and perhaps impossible. However, having done that, I go to the female prisoners, and do the entire work of the female prison myself.

6288. Without your assistant at all?—I consult at times with him on the female cases, but I do the entire female work myself. Then there are punishments to be certified for again, and I see all the casual complainers, which is usually done by my assistant on the male side. I do all the female work myself whatever it is, which requires great care to prevent dissatisfaction, and we know that women always give more trouble to the doctor than men do; if a man will take you two minutes, a woman will take you 10; that would be the morning's work, and would vary, and would take me up to 1 o'clock or half past 1. Of course I should be in and out of the prison during that time, possibly seeing some warders and others who are ill. That would be a routine morning's work, and I think that though one should do the hospital and know everything that is going on, the chief doctor should have two juniors under him, and I do not think he should go round and see each individual, but I think he should see those who are seriously ill, and go round and pick out those whom he may think demand, for any reason, his particular care.

6289. What you call mechanical work is merely visiting the cell to see if anything is the matter?—Yes. The more important duties are general supervision and inspection, with a close observation of the effect of imprisonment on all the inmates.

6290. Have you any strong opinion as to whether the exercise given to prisoners is sufficient or not?—I rather think that ought to be decided on a hygienic question whether an hour a day is sufficient. I should like to see it more myself, when men are working in their cells.

6291. Would you like to see any exercise except that of mechanically going round in a ring?—I think it would do a great deal of good to their bodies and minds, and induce a spirit of obedience and order if they did some simple extension exercises for a short time.

6292. You would not be afraid that drilling might lead to a breach of discipline or insubordination?—I think if you drilled them regularly and systematically it might, but I think if you merely put them to extension exercises, that it would have a very ameliorative effect on the low types.

6293. I presume you would prefer spade exercise and digging if you could get it?—I would prefer garden work and digging for everybody, gentlemen included. They would like it.

6294. And you think women would benefit equally, certainly the younger women, by some sort of arm extension exercise?—I am very much afraid that women would not do it. Women prisoners will not do anything co-ordinately together. I do not think they would do anything in a mass, but I think women would be very much benefited by light garden work of any kind, if it were only by weeding beds, I am afraid they would not do the arm exercises, they would not obey.

6295. Are you in favour of useful as opposed to useless labour?—Absolutely; entirely.

6296. You would like to abolish useless labour?—Absolutely, except for tramps or vagabonds who are utterly idle. I think the useless labour might be kept for them until they asked for useful labour, because often they will not do the useful labour, and tramps and vagabonds, probably, would only spoil things.

6297. Then put in that form it would be a prison punishment if a man practically said, I do not like useless work?—The uninteresting, useless, labour would lead idle men to wish for higher work.

6298. I suppose oakum picking is distasteful?—It is very monotonous, and it has next to no results.

6299. Have you seen cases of bleeding hands from picking oakum?—No, absolutely nothing of the sort I have seen slightly tender hands at first.

6300. Seeing that you have told us that you are responsible for all punishments, and that you relieve the Governor entirely from all responsibility, I will ask you this question. You were the medical officer at the time of the outbreak at Wormwood Scrubs?—I was.

6301. Can you tell us whether, in your opinion, there was anything in the nature of hardships or unnecessary punishments that led to that outbreak?—What led to it, so far as I can make out, and I have enquired very closely, was, some of the rules for locals were a little different from the rules for convicts and the convicts became jealous at the locals having certain privileges; not realising that they were convicts at the time, and that the locals were locals. I am not sure that there was not some little want of proper firmness in the governing for some months before that. There was a Governor who had to be superannuated, as he was breaking up, and there was subsequently some period of unsettlement owing to changes of governors, during which some laxity perhaps crept in.

6302. Therefore you would attribute it rather to laxity than to undue severity?—I am quite sure of that.

6304. (Mr. O'Connor.) Can you give us the exact date of the retirement of that first Governor?—I could give you that, I say this with great caution, because I know that things were a little weak at that time.

6305. That is before he retired?—I will tell you exactly what did happen. You have the date of the outbreak as it was. I think it was the 19th of December, 1891, when the outbreak was.

6306. The date of the retirement of the Governor is what I want to know?—He last appeared in our prison a good time before that, but he went sick on the 13th of October, 1891.

6307. Is that the superannuated officer?—It says, "went sick"; but that means he did not do any more work, but that he disappeared from the place.

6308. Then he did not come back?—I have got this from the clerks; apparently he never came on duty after that, but I think that weakness, though it was months back, reflected itself months later.

6309. (Sir Algernon West.) The great object of my question is that that, distinctly, did not arise, in your opinion, from undue severity and undue punishments?—I am quite sure of that, because when we had Colonel Garsia as Governor, we never had anything of the sort. I was with Colonel Garsia as a convict doctor. We had 700 or 800 convicts, a far more dangerous sort of prisoners, and never had anything of that kind. Two or three years ago we had 1,000 convicts there, and nothing of that kind ever occurred, because we were kind but severe.

6310. (Mr. O'Connor.) Was not Colonel Garsia in charge on the date of the outbreak?—I believe he was there for 17 or 18 days.

6311. Was he in charge of the gaol on the date of the outbreak?—He was. He was there from the 12th of December until the 3rd of January.

6312. (Sir Algernon West.) And what was the date of the outbreak?—The 19th of December.

6313. Is it your opinion that it would be better to combine the office of governor and medical man, or rather that all governors should be medical men?—I consider that if you could get doctors who have the administrative qualities that military men have it would be better.

6314. It would be an advantage, you think?—If you got them with the social qualities which influence prisoners so much, then a well-chosen medical man has such an immense other advantage in the work that I think such a medical governor would be advantageous in a prison.

6315. What visitors do you have at Wormwood Scrubs?—Do you mean magistrates?

6316. Yes, I mean is there a visiting committee of justices?—We have a large number of justices who visit once a month.

6317. Do they take an active interest in it?—Yes, they take a very close interest. One of their number visits as often as he likes, but always every week.

6318. Is there such a committee for the women's side?—I believe one lady comes, but I know very little of what she does. I was told the other day that she only sees the people that are going out, but I do not think she comes to influence them indiscriminately.

6319. Have you ever had any experience of ladies' committees of that kind?—No, I have not.

6321. Will you tell the Committee what would be the shortest time in which any sentence would be likely to do good to habitual drunkards?—I have not read much about it, but from my experience of what I know of them I should say a year would be the shortest time.

6322. Have you any experience of the work done by the Prisoners' Aid Society?—No, it does not come in any way under my knowledge.

6323. (Miss Orme.) What are your opinions about the best punishment for women?—I know that they should be very short and very sharp, and the moment a woman is penitent, which they very soon are, the short, sharp, punishment should be instantly stopped. That is, as a rule, but there may be exceptions. I think the handcuffs are very beneficial to naughty passionate young girls. That is as a restraint really, but the restraint becomes a punishment, although they are not really put on as a punishment.

6324. Are you in favour of dietary punishments?—Yes, administered with great care; but I do not like long dietary punishment. I do not think long dietary punishments are advisable. It is much kinder and more humane with all people in prison to punish them severely rather than in a long lingering way.

6325. Do you approve of the diet at present given to the female prisoners?—I think, especially since I have had my mind specially directed to it, that the No. 1 diet that they have for one week may be improved: rather I should say they have it for five days, not for one week. It is generally said that it is given for one week, but it is only five days, because the first day they come in and the day they go out they do not get it; but I think that stirabout which they do not like, and do not eat much, should be improved.

6326. I suppose the amount of punishment necessary for prison offences depends very much upon the influence of the matron?—Yes, very much.

6327. Have you got the care of the health of the female officers in your prison?—Yes.

6328. Do you find they are over-worked or that they have too long hours?—I do not think their hours are too long. I think their life is monotonous and depressing. If all of them lived in prisons which abut on streets they would get out quickly from their work, and would not feel it, but prisons being situated away from the community, as a rule, they do not get out much. In our place when they go off at 8 o'clock they cannot get out. Three nights a week they only get off from 8 to 10, and, therefore, on those three nights they have only a little sad room to be in. Therefore, though it is depressing, I say the hours are not too long.

6329. Some of those female warders have the responsibility of answering bells at night from the cells?—Yes.

6330. Do you consider that if a warder is sleeping in a room like that at the end of a gallery, subject to answering a bell, that she is able to rest at night?—I consider that possibly having to answer the bell at night should count entirely as night duty, and that she should not be on in the daytime, because a person who knows she may be summoned cannot sleep soundly, and I think it is wrong for a woman who has done duty in the daytime to do anything of a night.

6331. So that you would count that as part of her hours of duty?—I would have a person sit up so as to be more on the alert, and I would have it called night duty.

6332. Would she have very much to do?—She might not have much to do, but I mean to say it would be better if you could utilise her and have her up, and if so it must be counted as night duty.

6333. Do you think there would be anything to do in the shape of inspecting the cells. Do you think it would be at all useful to have her awake?—I think essentially that a woman who has done her duty in the day, should not have to be awake in the night.

6334. Have you formed any opinion as to the effect of prison discipline on educated women, as compared with its effect on women of the uneducated classes?—I think that generally in men and women the educated ones bear it quite as well, if not better, because they are more philosophical.

6335. So that a lady in prison really is not suffering a harder punishment than a working woman?—I have talked to them, and I have talked to men also and inquired about this, and I find that when once they have got into prison the well-educated do not feel it more than the others, as far as an outsider can judge. It is perhaps because they are more philosophical, and can review what has happened and what may happen, and the opportunities of reform.

6336. You do not think the want of interesting books makes it much harder for them?—I think if they did not have books it would be harder.

6337. But are those books which you have likely at all to interest educated people?—In the library we have very excellent books. We can have all kinds of books. The Government does not put any restraint upon it, except that they must not be tawdry love-stories. They can have any books. It simply rests with the chaplain to select them. They ought to have plenty of books, of course.

6338. (Dr. Bridges.) Is any of the ground to the south of Wormwood Scrubs Government ground?—It belongs, I think, to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, but not at all to the Government. It is used now for grazing and things of that sort.

6339. Supposing you had a space of ground round your prison, you would be in favour of utilising that space for prison labour?—I am more than in favour of that. I think it is most desirable to have open-air work for the men, because you cannot get much depression with open-air work, and physical exercise, and sunshine.

6340. That would seem to imply by contrast, as you are obliged to keep the people at work under cover in their own cells, that that work is to that extent depressing?—It is depressing to all people to work indoors without open air, and it must be more so to a person who has got his conscience laden.

6341. Supposing a person had a tendency to some mental disease, a tendency which did not show itself in any marked symptom upon the admission of the prisoner, but one that might be latent, do you think that that somewhat depressing influence of prison labour which you have just spoken of might tend to develop that seed and make it grow?—I do not think prison labour is depressing, but I think it would be an improvement to have open air.

6342. It is depressing by contrast?—I know what you mean. I think unless the doctor is very smart in detecting that, and putting them out to some other work, when necessary, depression might occur; but personally I have been very careful to have an open-air party into which I can slip a man directly.

6343. With the comparatively limited ground at your disposal you are able to organise that?—We have lots of ground for 10 or 20.

6344. What kind of work do you give them?—We have a lot of flower beds, and then they have to clip the grass. We have some acres of grass, I believe 6345. Coming to the general question of insanity, on which I think you have something to say, I should like, in the first place, to call your attention to one or two particular cases, looking on them as illustrating the general system. You, of course, are familiar with the way in which your reports are drawn up?—Yes.

6346. I have here the report ending the 31st of March 1894. I would like to ask you about a male prisoner, who is numbered 4592. Was he a man of 25 years of age?—Yes, I remember the man well. He was 25 years of age.

6347. A shopman?—Yes.

6348. His offence was felony?—Yes.

6349. He was convicted on the 1st of December 1891, and sentenced to 18 months' hard labour?—Yes.

6350. His mental condition on his reception into prison was reported as sound?—I see that.

6351. He was not known to have been previously insane, and after 14 months in prison he displayed signs of melancholia, with eroto mania, and the supposed cause of insanity was sexual excess?—If you will allow me, I will look that case up.

6352. There is another case, of which the number is 9006; a man of 48, of imperfect education, a labourer, brought up for stealing, and sentenced to three months' hard labour in February 1893. Apparently sound on admission, and after two months, dementia showed itself?—I am not quite sure that this first man had been with me the 14 months, so that I cannot speak of it without looking at my notes. This man was, perhaps, not with me all the time. As to the other case, two months is not, I think, at all abnormal, because it is quite possible for a man to come into prison and after two months show symptoms of something we have not seen before. I think even with lunacy experts, that is possible; so that on two months I have no remark to make, but I can give you full reports of this case from my own notes taken at the time.

6353. Yes. Then you have told the Committee that you are exceedingly careful in the examination of prisoners upon admission; and that we have not the least doubt upon. Do you think it possible that in those cases the mere fact of detention in prison, working upon a man, with the consciousness of having committed a crime, might have had an injurious effect upon him?—I have never seen a case, except once, where a man had murdered his brother, I think it was, and he had hallucinations of seeing this creature he had murdered. Possibly, with his crime always on his mind, the solitude of his cell may have been partly responsible for the insanity, but it is not a fair case.

6354. In the two cases I have just read, without referring to your notes, you would be prepared to think there was some other cause for it?—I should be inclined to think that one was produced by extreme masturbation in prison for 18 months, and I am almost sure that the other case had nothing to do with imprisonment.

6355. Judging from the official reports which appear year, after year in which these cases are detailed, there appear to be a good many cases of insanity attributable to masturbation which are attributed in these official reports to it?—I have not said much of that in my report, because I do not think it is always easy to find it out. However, it may be so.

6356. I was going to ask you whether you thought that in such a case as this one of two months, that I have called your attention to, the comparative segregation in his cell, that is to say, the cellular system in fact, may have somewhat encouraged that habit?—If a man was shut up, he would be more likely to indulge in that habit. I think that would apply specially anywhere if a man was shut up. I do not think that applies to prison especially, but to any case where a man is working alone, and had a tendency to that habit.

Dr. D. Patmore.

5 Nov. 1894.

6357. I was only saying would the solitary system do it?—I have not been in the habit of encouraging warders to spy for that, because I do not think it would answer any great purpose, but I can only say I think a man shut up alone would be more likely to do it.

6358. You have some general observations I think you wish to make upon insanity?—I do not believe much in statistics, except taken in connexion with facts and great knowledge. I think these statistics are very fallacious when you compare them with the outside population. Suppose, for instance, we take a village of 1,000 people, and you have possibly two people go mad in that village. Now, if you take a prison with a population of 1,000 people, and compare it with the two who go mad amongst the village population and stop there, the whole thing is fallacious, because the village population is stationary for the year, and is only 1,000 in the year, but the prison population is always changing, and is, perhaps, 4,000 or 5,000 in the year; and, as we catch every madman, of course we get more in our 4,000 or 5,000 than there would be in a village with 1,000. We have five times, at least, as many to deal with in one year in the prison; and in other prisons perhaps they have 10 times as many. Where you have men coming and going, as we do with the short-sentence prisoners, we supervise, it may be, 5,000 prisoners; but the daily average is said to be 1,000, and I fancy the statistics show so many lunacy cases, with a daily average per 1,000; but that is not so many lunacy cases in 1,000 men. It is so many lunacy cases in 5,000, perhaps.

6359. May I point out to you that, although that is quite true as far as it goes, yet, in the case of a prison where 4,000 people pass through in the course of a year, each person does not reside a whole year in the prison. Each person, on the average, only resides three months in the prison; and in the case of the 1,000 villagers, each of them resides one year in the village. I am not quite sure whether that is so?—That shows the difficulty of statistics.

6360. (Sir Algernon West.) There is a great deal to be said for your point, that you must not compare the 1,000 in a village with 1,000 in a prison?—And I think that statistics are so misleading that I cannot quite see the exact way to read them. The "Daily Chronicle" argues very carelessly on that matter.

6361. Have you any other point you want to mention to the Committee?—Well, I have another point I would like to tell you about particularly:—detecting insane prisoners when they come in. Every medical man knows that a man with the greatest experience may have to give three or four visits to a lunacy case before he can detect his delusion. Therefore, that delusion may go on for two or three months, and it may go on without the greatest expert detecting it. Therefore, I must not be blamed because sometimes I pass a man, and then suddenly, to our surprise, perhaps three months afterwards, he mentions, for the first time in his life, something which shows his mind is already gone.

6362. That points to the importance of somewhat increasing the medical staff?—I think undoubtedly, because then we would have much longer time to interview each person.

6363. Have you any other point you wish to mention?—Yes, I have one other point which I think ought to be understood. That is, that in prisons we have a large population of people, a great many of whom endeavour to malinger insanity, and we have to be extremely sure that the ends of justice are not defeated by our being taken in by the malingerer. Therefore, I personally keep a man much longer under observation, even though he may not be in hospital; and I watch a man because I am not sure whether he is a malingerer or not for a time, and it will very often take a long time to decide the exact distinction between malingering and insanity where the two are mixed. So that that will account sometimes for your seeing a person not certified for two or three months, because we are watching him, and finally we may detect some slight thing which would have been really overlooked outside.

6364. And, in fact, it is so difficult to detect, that occasionally you require to keep him under your very careful observation for two or three months?—Yes.

6365. (Mr. O'Connor.) How many do you say you have in the prison at one time?—One thousand one hundred all but six.

6366. How many women?—Roughly speaking, something under 200 now. At the present moment we have 196 women and 908 men, but we are low at present. Our accommodation goes up to something like 1,400.

6367. How many medical officers have you?—One medical officer and one assistant surgeon.

6368. When you go on leave what happens?—When I go on leave I get an outside man, but it is not very easy to get one.

6369. Do you think that, with your resident assistant and an outside casual medical attendant, the medical service at such a prison as Wormwood Scrubs can be properly done?—I think that that man, whoever that gentleman may be, not being actually responsible for the well-being of the prison, and not being under Government, is not likely to do his work so well as a man who is under Government.

6370. You have as much as you can get through from month's end to month's end?—The two of us.

6371. You, individually, I mean?—I do as much as my own energies will enable me to do, but it is not the number of hours, it is the work I have got to do, and the responsible nature of it which is so exacting, and often exhausting.

6372. Is your assistant fully occupied?—He is, I think, always, but the assistant has not the great responsibility that I have.

6373. The wear and tear on the system is not so great?—That is so; therefore more can be given to him to do.

6374. When you are away, and are replaced by a casual medical man from the outside, is it possible that the medical service of the prison is as efficiently performed as when you are there?—I think it cannot be as efficiently performed.

6375. Do you think you have sufficient medical staff with yourself and only one assistant at Wormwood Scrubs?—I think not. I consider that the head medical man should be free to be here, there, and everywhere, without being suddenly summoned to cut a man's toenail or open a boil.

6376. In the earlier portion of your evidence you spoke about "firm and judicious," and, I think, "kindly management" in the prison being important from a disciplinary point of view?—Immensely so.

6377. Would you say that, in proportion as administration is firm and judicious, the discipline of the prison will be better?—Undoubtedly.

6378. That with an improved discipline, the record of punishments will be lower?—Undoubtedly.

6379. Will you be inclined, then, to think, primâ facie, that, given two prisons with equal populations, one in which the punishments are, say, represented by X, and the other in which they are represented by 2 X, the presumption is that the discipline of the latter is not so good as that of the former?—I do not understand X and 2 X.

6380. Say 1,000 instead of X. Supposing you had twice as many punishments in one prison as in the other, you would be inclined to think, primâ facie, that the discipline of that prison was not so good as the discipline of the other?—Given exactly the same character of prison, then undoubtedly the larger quantity of punishment would show a deficiency of judicious, humane, and firm treatment.

6381. Have you ever had occasion to compare the number of punishments at Wormwood Scrubs with the number of punishments in any other prison?—I have not had occasion to do so.

6382. Would you be surprised to learn that the punishments at Wormwood Scrubs are twice as great in number as at other prisons?—I have not studied the other prisons in that respect.

6383. Would you say that the local prisoners or the convicts, as a rule, are the better behaved?—As shown by punishments, the convicts, I think.

6384. Therefore, in a prison where there are convicts you would expect a lower number of punishments than in a prison entirely composed of the worst class of prisoners, namely, the local prisoners?—I should expect less breaches of the rules where convicts are.

6385. Therefore in such prisons as Wandsworth and Pentonville you would expect more punishments than you would at a place like Wormwood Scrubs, where there are convicts?—We have only very few convicts.

6386. But pro tanto?—Yes, it is the judiciousness and firmness, and a certain amount of sympathy, which to a great extent, if you get them combined, will lower the punishments; but you must have the firmness, which is as important as the other.

6387. (Sir Algernon West.) Do you recollect the case of a prisoner, J. E.?—Yes, I have inquired into that.

6388. Do you know that he left Wormwood Scrubs, after being interviewed by you, in good health?—Yes, in absolutely good health. I am certain of it by that note of mine. That means I saw him privately. I saw he was sound in body and sane in mind. I can give you this* also, which is a little more interesting on the point. There is no doubt about that.

* This was the prisoner's record.

6389. He is in good health?—In good health both in body and in mind undoubtedly. Dr. T. D. Patmore. 16 Nov. 1894.

At this stage of the proceedings the Chair was taken by Mr. De Rutzen.

6390. (Mr. O'Connor.) The word there is "interview." Tell me what that means?—"Interviewed" is when I see a man specially out of the ordinary way. I have him in my room and see what condition his body and mind is in. I generally call that an interview. That word "interview" means I have gone particularly into that case, and am satisfied, unless I note anything wrong. I have got here "sane." The weight at that time was 147 lbs., whereas he came into prison weighing 144 lbs., which showed me he had actually gained a little weight, which is a tangible sign he was not wasting.

6391. Why was that word "sane" written?—To show he was sane and well in body and mind.

6392. You came to the conclusion that he was sane?—Yes. There is a little thing I would like to mention also. Another reason, I think, that the medical officer should not be trammelled by too many routine duties is, that I think he should have a perfect means of associating himself with lunatic work outside, and being in touch with lunacy, so that he may keep his mind clear for those decisions he has to make. I think a medical officer should be able to put it in his journal that he has been to Colney Hatch, or somewhere else, and that he should count it as part of his work. He cannot do that if he has only got one assistant to do half the work, and he the other. The medical officer should be in touch with the hospitals and their operations, which he cannot be if he has half of the routine work to do.

The proceedings were adjourned until Thursday the 22nd instant at 12 o'clock.

THIRTEENTH DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Thursday, 22nd November 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN).

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.
Sir JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.
RICHARD BURDON HALDANE, Esq., Q.C., M.P.
ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
Miss ELIZA ORME.
JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Colonel GARSIA called and examined. Col. Garsia. 22 Nov. 1894.

6393. (Chairman.) You are Secretary to the Commissioners and Directors?—I am; and also Inspector of Prisons.

6394. Will you tell the Committee what position you held before you came into the Home Office?—I have been 17 years in the Prisons Department, and previously I was 22 years in the army. I was appointed Deputy-Governor of Brixton Prison in April 1878, for duty at Wormwood Scrubs, with which prison I was connected nearly 14 years. For the first five years I took charge of Brixton Prison whenever the governor was absent, in addition to my duty at Wormwood Scrubs. I became deputy-governor in charge at Wormwood Scrubs except for a few months from December 1879 to July 1882, with all the powers of governor. I was transferred to Millbank Prison for male and female convicts, as deputy-governor in charge in July 1882, and remained there in charge until some time in 1884, when I had to return to Wormwood Scrubs, as Milbank had been converted into a local prison and there was no other vacancy for me. I remained as deputy-governor at Wormwood Scrubs Convict Prison and succeeded to the charge in 1888, which I held until October 1890, when the prison was converted into a local prison for males and females. I was then appointed in November 1890, to be deputy-governor of the local prison at Wormwood Scrubs for males and females, and ordered to take charge of the prison, as the governor had fallen ill during its change to a local prison. That was Captain Kirkpatrick. I was there in charge for two months, until the governor returned from sick leave. I was then appointed Secretary to the Departmental Committee on the Prison Officers' Grievances, their hours of duty, leave, pay, and superannuation, of which Lord De Ramsay was Chairman, from March till July 1891, when I was ordered to take charge of Wormwood Scrubs Prison, the governor having again fallen ill. There I remained until about the 18th September, when I was compelled, on account of ill-health myself, to go on leave for three months. I returned on the 12th December 1891, and resumed charge from Captain Schuyler. I was appointed Secretary to the Prison Commissioners, and the Directors of Convict Prisons, which were then two separate bodies, on the 1st of January 1892, and I was appointed Inspector of Prisons, in addition to the office of secretary to the two bodies, on the 1st of August 1892, and I hold those two appointments now.

6395. As secretary would you shortly describe your duties?—My duties as secretary are, that next to the Commissioners I am the working head of the staff of the department, and I represent the Commissioners and Directors when they are absent, and perform, sometimes (not infrequently when more than two Commissioners are absent) some of the work of a Commissioner. I conduct all correspondence in the name of the Commissioners, all papers and documents, except those relating to the appointment and promotion of prison officers. They all pass through me. I have charge of the general register of convicts, of the registration of all documents, the preparation of all standing orders, circulars, general instructions for the administration of the prisons, the communicating to governors of the decision of the Secretary of State on all sentences, petitions, &c. I arrange the distribution of convicts in local and convict prisons subject to the approval of the Commissioners. I am responsible for and witness the opening of all tenders for the supplies to the prisons. I am consulted sometimes by the Commissioners on questions of discipline which they honour me by asking me about on account of my personal experience. I receive all persons calling in regard to applications for appointment and people who are interested in candidates getting appointments or in any other prison matter. I attend all board meetings of the Commissioners and Directors and minute their proceedings. In fact, I am at the call of the Commissioners and of the staff at the secretary's office at all times.

6396. You are also inspector of prisons?—Yes; my duties as an inspector of prisons are these:—It was considered very desirable that the secretary of the department should be in touch with the prisons which was a want felt; and, on the retirement of Admiral Fenwick, one of the regular inspectors, the Commissioners recommended that I should be made an inspector of prisons in addition to the office of secretary so that I should be available for special inquiries in prisons, and in case of the breakdown of the inspectors from ill-health take the inspection of prisons when required.

6397. As a matter of fact do you often go to inspect prisons?—Well, I think I may say for the three years that I have been holding the post I have inspected nearly every prison once each year, and I have generally done it in my holiday. I have taken an inspector's duty of a district so as to keep touch with it, and I have relieved him so as to enable him to get leave. At this moment Major Griffiths is unable to perform his duties through ill-health, and I may have to with the other inspectors on duty inspect his prisons. I may say that as a rule I have gone to each prison once a year.

6398. How many inspectors are there now?—There are now four regular inspectors excluding myself and exclusive of the medical inspector.

6399. Do you think that the present system of inspecting is advantageous?—It has its uses I think.

6400. It is of a certain amount of use?—Yes.

6401. But not much?—I will not go so far as that. I think the inspectors now as at present constituted relieve the Commissioners very much. Briefly I would put it in this way: I would say they assist the Commissioners by inspecting each prison once a month or oftener if ordered. They report verbally as to whether the rules and regulations are properly observed, and as to the condition of the prisons. They have no executive power whatever. They can, in fact, give no orders being merely the eyes and ears of the Commissioners. They do hear applications and investigate complaints made by prisoners in connexion with prison offences. They do, in fact, grant indulgences in the shape of extra letters, extra visits, letters in lieu of visits, and so on, and they are sometimes made the means of communication with the governors. That is their use entirely.

6402. They have no executive power, but to what extent do you think they could be said to have actual authority and practical power?—They have absolutely none.

6403. But as it is known that they can report to the Commissioners directly, and that they will report to them, a word from them to the governors would practically have the force of a mandate?—Distinctly.

6404. And in that sense they would have power?—Yes, and I will go to the extent of saying that the mere fact of their being always en évidence to the governor and to the officials of the prisons gives them an immense power, whether they have it legally or not.

6405. Do you think that the system of inspection could be improved?—I think that every system which is regular, where a man goes regularly month after month to a prison, after a time becomes perfunctory.

6406. Would you approve of a proposition to transfer to the visiting justices some of the powers or the powers now held by the inspectors?—I do not think you could encourage the visiting justices too much. I have not had great experience of them, but from my experience I do not think you could encourage the visiting justices too much to take an interest in the prisons. They come, but they will not take an interest where they have no power. One of the chairmen of the visiting committees said to me the other day, "We are called upon to do your dirty work, "because we have no power except on an emergency to "carry out punishment, and thereby," he said, we do "not take the interest in it that we might."

6407. If the power of the inspectors were transferred to the visiting justices, of course the visiting justices would be bound to go regularly and often to the prison?—Of course, the Commissioners being responsible to the Secretary of State for the management of the prisons they could only ascertain the order of the prisons, and that their rules and regulations were carried out by personal inspection of the prisons frequently or by getting some servant of theirs to do so.

6408. But supposing additional responsibility was put upon the visiting justices they would in a sense be pro rata responsible with the commissioners for the state of the prison?—I quite agree with you.

6409. Do you think that the giving the visiting justices certain duties of inspection and power to report direct to the Commissioner or to the Secretary of State, would be sufficient to make them take a keen and lively interest in the work?—They possess that now in the prisons. They elect themselves, and I can quote from the Prison Act to show that they have power under the section of the Act which I am referring to. It is section 14 of the Act:—"Duties "of visiting committee.—The Secretary of State "shall, on or before the commencement of this "Act, make and publish, and may, hereafter from "time to time repeal, alter, or add to rules with "respect to the duties of a visiting committee, and "such committee shall conform to any rules so "made and for the time being in force, but sub-"ject as aforesaid, the members of such committee "shall from time to time, and at frequent intervals, "visit the prison for which they are appointed, and "hear any complaints which may be made to them by "the prisoners, and if asked, privately. They shall "report on any abuses within the prison, and also on

" any repairs which may be urgently required in the " prison, and shall further take cognizance of any " matters of pressing necessity and within the powers " of their commission as justices, and do such acts " and perform such duties in relation to a prison as " they may be required to do or perform by the " Secretary of State."

6410. Yes, but then evidence has been given to us to show that the visiting justices, although they have themselves general power, have found that they have so little actual power, and that so few practical duties are cast upon them that they have lost interest, and there is a great difficulty in getting visiting justices to take any interest in the prisons. Is that your opinion?—I believe that to be the fact.

6411. Then supposing more direct responsibilities than are contained in this section 14 were put upon the visiting justices, do you think that it would lead them to revive the old interest which they had before the transfer and to effectally carry out any duties that might be put upon them?—Yes, I am very strongly of that opinion; but in the interest of the prison service I think the appointment of prison officials should be made by the central authority.

6412. Would you go so far as to say that they should have no power to recommend?—No, I think it would be a very good thing to get them to take an interest in recommending. I think where you have candidates for prison appointments if you can get good local people it is better; and if you can get magistrates to take an interest in it and to say what they know of the people (and they know better of them than we possibly can up here), I think if you could get that interest taken it would be an enormous benefit to the prison service, and would doubly insure our not appointing, at any rate, unsuitable people as prison officers. I mean, I think the final appointment should rest with the Commissioners.

6413. Probably the visiting justices would not care to have considerable responsibility thrown upon them unless they had a certain amount of actual control. Would that be your opinion?—I think visiting justices do. I know in visiting prisons frequently I find the justices there. At Wormwood Scrubs I found a magistrate came once a week and took a great interest in the prison. They see the prisoners and they go round. We frequently get letters calling attention to some structural defect, or something of that sort, or telling us where they think improvements should take place. I think they take great interest to that extent now, and I think if we give certain powers that now without legal authority the prison inspectors use, such as that of giving extra letters and visits and indulgences to prisoners where they think it advisable, that no doubt would increase their interests.

6414. Is there any rule as to periodical visits of the medical inspector?—No, there is no definite rule.

6415. Then what governs his visits to the prisons?—He goes to the prisons if he is asked to do so. I must tell you first that from each prison there is a quarterly sanitary report. If anything comes out in those reports showing any defect, or any increase of sickness in a prison, the Commissioners would at once call on the inspector, if they thought fit, to go down and report on what is going on at the prison. He does on his own initiative go round and visit many prisons, but I cannot say that there is a distinct rule as to a periodical visit to inspect the prison as to its sanitary condition.

6416. Of course, if the visiting justices, for instance, made a communication to him and asked him to go down, he would go down?—Yes, he would if the Commissioners suggested it, but what I say is as to the desirability of his going periodically to the prison.

6417. Yes. Do you think it is desirable that he should make regular inspections of all the prisons?—I think it would strengthen the hands of the Prison Commissioners if they knew that the sanitary conditions of these prisons were regularly and periodically looked at by the central authority through the inspector. I do not at all mean to imply that he does not thoroughly fulfil his duties, but it is on the general question I am speaking.

6418. Have you anything to lay before the Committee with regard to the prisoners' complaints?—I would say about the prisoners' complaints that they have great facilities for making them, and if you will permit me I will tell you what those facilities are both in convict and in local prisons. We have by Standing Order these regulations in convict prisons—I will deal with convict prisons first. The governor and deputy-governor of each convict prison is bound, at least, once a week, each to afford every prisoner the opportunity of seeing him and making any complaint as regards his treatment. The prisoner, moreover, is told when he comes into the prison, and frequently told, that if he wishes to have an interview with the governor or deputy-governor he may give in his name and that it is recorded in a book which is put before the governor every morning. He comes before the governor and makes his complaint and the governor investigates it. If the governor does not satisfy the prisoner he has a right to put his name down to see the director at his monthly visit. Then he comes before the director, and if he is not satisfied with his decision he asks to be allowed, or probably he asks before, that he be allowed to memorialise the Board of Directors. He writes on a regular form which we have, a memorial setting forth his complaint. That comes up to the office, and the governor has no choice but to forward it. The director of the prison writes his statement, and submits it to his colleagues, and they decide on this memorial on the evidence before them as to whether the decision of the director was right, and whether it can be upheld or not. If their answer is against it the prisoner then has the right on his application to petition the Secretary of State, and he there sets forth his grievances. It comes before the Secretary of State. He has, moreover, the right to see the visitors to the prison, and in my experience they used to take great interest at Wormwood Scrubs, I mean such men as the Duke of Fife, Lord Henniker, Sir Francis Morley, and others. They always saw the prisoner alone, with a clerk to take down all that he said, and they investigated thoroughly his complaint, which they reported direct to the Secretary of State if they thought there was any ground for it. Those are all means in the convict prisons which a prisoner has for getting redress. I will come now to the local prisons. In like manner the governor there has to see every prisoner every day, and the prisoner has the right to put his name down to see the governor to have a private interview. If he is not satisfied with the governor's decision, in many prisons one of the visiting committee goes round once a week, and as often as they go the prisoner may see a member of the visiting committee. If he is not satisfied with his decision he appeals at the monthly meeting of the board or visiting committee when he goes before the committee and makes his statement, and they investigate it. Then he has the right of petitioning the Secretary of State, and no governor has a power to limit a prisoner as to a petition. He has also got the prison inspector who goes round once a month, and goes round to every prisoner's cell and asks him individually whether he has got any complaint to make. He reports to the Commissioners the result of his investigation. Those are all the rules. I do not know how we possibly could give them any better facilities for being treated fairly, and for having their complaints looked into.

6419. With regard to prison labour are you satisfied with the present arrangements?—Well, I hold very strong views on the advantages of prison labour. My experience was at Wormwood Scrubs, which is a record of prison labour, because I went there when it was only fields, 17 years ago, with a hoarding round it and there I saw it rise. We dug up the foundations and made the bricks. We had simply a hoarding round it. The population rose from 9 prisoners in 1874 to 1,100 that I had in charge, and we built the whole of that enormous place. We built the chapel. Blocks of stone were brought there, and men were trained to dress the stone and build that chapel and we had almost every industry there. The result of my experience is that it was an enormous power in my hand for good. The more interesting and industrial work the prisoners have the better they behave, and the greatest punishment I could inflict on a prisoner for scamping his work was to take him from industrial employment and put him to navvy work. Work is an enormous power in the hands of the governor, and the greater the employment there is for the prisoner the less punishment we have. There was an ill-conducted almost incorrigible prisoner there. When I went there first I spoke to him. He was a young man. I said, "Now, you are "young man. You will be going out of prison and "you will have no training. Would not you like to go "out and have some hope to be as good as other "men?" I spoke to him and tried to touch his heart. The man cried very hard and he said, "Punish me "this time, sir, and I will turn over a new leaf." I said, "I am not going to punish you. I am going to make "you turn over a new leaf to-day. I am going to ad-"monish you and teach you a trade." I asked him what trade he would like to be and he said he would be a bricklayer. I had him taught the bricklaying, and he became one of the best behaved men in the prison. He had forfeited all his privileges through misconduct, and I recommended him to be allowed to write to his friends and for them to see him. I took really a great interest in him and watched over him. I had special officers who had capital tact and judgment who watched him, and this man having recovered himself and learnt his trade, I do not believe came back to prison again. That is my experience of prison industry, and I will say this much. that during my years of service in the prison department, I have found no stronger advocate to enforce the necessity of industrial employment than Sir Edmund Du Cane. He used to go to the convict prison at Wormwood Scrubs, and if he found out by any chance that a prisoner was not on industrial employment on the works he would call the governor to account, so that eventually we had to send in a return if a man, after his reception, was not within a few days of his reception employed on industrial work. If he was not we had to explain it.

6420. The whole of the prison was built by convicts?—Entirely. The clay was dug out. When I was there in charge, we built the wall round it. We pulled down hoardings, and what is more, there is a large culvert running from the prison for a distance of nearly a mile down to the lane, in connexion with the drainage, and we made that culvert in the road. It was an open field when I went there. It was done entirely by convicts. I employed from 60 to 80 convicts, with very few officers. I had not an attempted escape, so interested were these convicts with the work they were employed on, under the supervision of a representative of the Board of Works, that they did that work, and I never had the smallest trouble with them.

6421. We have heard a great deal about the dangers of contamination from associated work, but the building of this prison by convict labour of course involved associated labour?—Exactly.

6422. It is not found then to work badly in convict prisons, but rather the reverse?—In convict prisons you see we have classification. We have the first offenders separated entirely from the habitual criminal. We do not suppose that an habitual criminal can corrupt another habitual criminal.

6423. Assuming the classification is made you see no danger in associated labour if it is properly supervised?— None whatever.

6424. With regard to training these men in the work of building the prisons, how is it managed?—Well we had instructors. We had one instructing bricklayer; we had one instructing stonemason; one instructing carpenter, paid people, and a professional foreman of works.

6425. They were not warders?—These were not warders. Then the officers in charge of parties got to know, as time went on, how bricks should be made. There was a brick instructor too, because one instructor went round, and there were eight or ten parties making bricks. He went round and supervised the whole material and took the general supervision while the officer in charge took charge of the prisoners, as regards their security, their custody and their discipline, and he carried out the orders and took an interest in their work, which helped me a good deal under the supervision of the one instructor. That was our system.

6426. Of course it is easier to do work of that kind with convicts than with local prisoners, but do you think, with regard to local prisoners, that a good deal more might be done in the way of giving them associated work than is done at present?—Yes, I think so.

6427. Who is the responsible official, who supervises the general labour, which is done in the prisons?—Do you mean the official at the Home Office, or the Official at the prison?

6428. At the Home Office. I mean the official who would take a bird's-eye view of the work done by each particular prison, so that he might control the industries?—Nominally the Commissioner of the district does that, but it is revised by the store accountant. The store accountant here is the man who has to do the work as to the productive labour of prisons.

6429. Practically the store accountant is the responsible official?—Yes. The Chairman of the Board of course takes an interest and watches over the whole thing.

6430. Is he officially in a position to take an accurate and satisfactory view of the whole question of prison labour, and to exercise proper supervision, he having the necessary authority to give effect to that supervision?—Yes, I think so decidedly. He is not at all trammelled by the Commissioners.

6431. But still he is also responsible for the accounts?—No, there is an accountant besides that.

6432. The store accounts?—He is responsible for the store accounts, but he has a large staff under him.

6433. Do you think that the adaptation of special industries in prison is satisfactory?—From my observation in visiting the prisons I think they are not so satisfactory as they might be.

6434. For instance, it was suggested to us the other day that work was now being done in convict prisons by the long sentence men which was just the work that might be done by men under short sentences?—What is the work?

6435. I think it was coal-sack making?—Yes, I think that is specially suitable for short sentence prisoners, because it is quickly learned and there is no difficulty in learning it, but I do not think it is being done to any extent by convicts. Of course I cannot speak positively.

6436. Evidence was given to us the other day to the effect that this particular industry was suddenly taken away from Lewes, where it was done with great advantage to the prisoners, and given to convict prisoners?—That might have been a very temporary thing. I can assure you that for some little time owing to the reduction of the number of convicts at Wormwood Scrubs doing their separate confinement we may have transferred that industry; and these convicts were transferred temporarily to convict prisons. I do not say that it was the cause, but just casually I should say it was the cause that that industry went with them to the convict prison, but that class of prisoners will no longer go to convict prisons, for instance they will go to Lewes and other prisons; and there they would be employed at the industry which temporarily was given to the convict prisoners. The whole of the convicts in convict prisons are employed at outdoor labour excepting a few weakly, sickly men.

6437. Still you think it ought to be the object of the prison authorities to give to the convict prisons work suitable for the long sentence men and such work as in general could not be performed in the local prisons?—Exactly.

6438. Then do you think that more might be done by a more systematic grouping of prisoners in the local prisons. I mean generally by concentrating the men under longer sentences on the one side and short sentences on the other?—Of course there is a provision in the Act of 1877 which permits that, and reading that Act, and applying it to local prisons, I should say it would facilitate the employment of local prisoners if that was done.

6439. Evidence has been given to the effect that the execution of orders given by Government Departments could not altogether be relied upon as the delivery was unpunctual. Do yo think that would be the case?—I think you would always have that difficulty in employing prison labour, because it is not very reliable. You cannot task the men. If you want good work of that kind done, you cannot task a prisoner. The moment you task the work and say he must turn out so much a day you get bad work, so that all you have to do is to encourage him to do as much as he can and get good work; but if you cannot task him you cannot take a contract.

6440. Would that be met by having a store depôt in London or elsewhere on which you could draw?—Yes; if you were certain of getting rid of your work that would distinctly get rid of your difficulty.

6441. Then if the Government Departments undertook to give you orders and they could not exactly foretell the amount which would be wanted at different times, if you had such a depôt as that you could make your deliveries with more punctuality?—Yes; I also know we had great difficulties. We used to make the boots for the Metropolitan Police at one time, but we used to have such an enormous amount of rejections owing to the inferiority of the work that it became a question whether it paid. It was carried on at a great loss I think and had to be given up.

6442. But boots are still made in prison?—Yes, but only to a limited extent.

6443. Have you anything to say in regard to the system of punishments in local and convict prisons?—I think that the power of punishment the Governor possesses is quite sufficient. Speaking from my own experience, I will say broadly that what you ought to do in dealing with prisoners is to give them the minimum punishment, not with regard to the crime committed, but to deter other prisoners from doing the same thing. I have always found that a great advantage in prisons. I have served under men who always tried to see how little they could give a prisoner for what he had done, and the result of that was that it encouraged the other prisoners, and they said the price, the penalty was so small that they did not mind. They will say, "I know if I go "and hit him on the head and knock him down, I "may get a day's bread-and-water." But what one has to think of in dealing with prisoners and large bodies of prisoners in particular, is how to deter them without being cruel. I also look upon it that a first offence until a man thoroughly knows the rules he is breaking is sufficiently met by an admonition. I think it is best to admonish him, and put before him what he is doing, and having done that then if he still breaks the rules I began with small punishments, and I made it cumulative. I cannot from my experience, both in the army and in the prison department, think that any other system is good.

6444. You have read the evidence of Captain Schuyler?—Yes.

6455. There was an outbreak at Wormwood Scrubs?—Yes.

6446. Have you any remarks to make upon that?—I noticed in Captain Schuyler's evidence that he stated that before he went to Wormwood Scrubs there was an outbreak, and that after he left Wormwood Scrubs—ten days after he left—there was another outbreak, and I read Mr. Morrison, the chaplain's evidence, who says he got his information from Captain Schuyler that the cause of these outbreaks was the severity and cruel treatment of the prisoners. I would like to say a few words, if the Committee will permit me, on these subjects. I have told the Committee my connexion with Wormwood Scrubs prison, and first of all I would say that during the 14 years I was there there never was anything that could possibly be construed into an outbreak until what occurred on the 19th of December 1891. There never was on any occasion anything which could possibly be called an outbreak. The prison was always orderly. Of course you have in prisons amongst a mass of prisoners of all classes periods in which there is a little more in the shape of prison offences than at other times; but anything approaching what can be called an outbreak, never occurred in my connexion with the prison, either as a convict or as a local prison, until the 19th of December 1891. On that occasion the so-called outbreak was limited to what I will describe. I will first say that I went away on leave. I had to go away on leave in the month of September. The Governor had been for a long time ill. The Commissioners were put to their wits' end to know how to take my place there, as the chief warder was not quite the man, and he himself asked the Commissioners not to give him such a large charge. They were in difficulties to know who to send there. They had nobody, and could only fall back on the newly-appointed Deputy Governor at Wandsworth, Captain Schuyler, who had been three months, I think, in the prison service, and who had no experience, but who came straight from the army. He came on the 18th of September, and I assert that everything was in perfect order then, the prisoners being under control. The officers were many of them young, but all was going on well. I told Captain Schuyler that he had no experience. I showed him how I carried on the prison, and I advised him to be guided very much by the chief warder, and to go on the same lines and not to relax the discipline. I said, as to chapel, arrangements have not yet been completed for a number of prisoners. I am very overcrowded, and I said a prisoner who abuses the great privilege of going into that building to worship, and who laughs and jeers should be kept out of it, until he promised to behave better. The result is I said we keep out the bad sort and let those who wish to be good go in there and have the benefit of it. I returned to the prison on the 12th of December, and on going there the chief warder told me that Captain Schuyler had reversed everything that I had done*; that he had let all the prisoners into the chapel irrespective of their conduct; that he had stirred up the worst feeling between the prisoners and the prison officers, that whenever a prisoner was reported for anything, he took the part of the prisoner against the officer, and the result was that the officers were in an utter state of discontent, and were on the point of petitioning the Commissioners as to their position there. They had lost control of the prisoners. This last was told to me by the chief warder and by the chaplain, Mr. Merrick, who said I am very glad you have come back, because there is a very bad feeling between the prisoners and the officers. I noticed on the very first day that I had to deal with a prisoner, that there was a very bad spirit. The convicts whom I had to deal with, and who did well in a local prison to the number of 300 showed a very insubordinate spirit, and in looking over the punishment book, (which I will put before the Committee presently) I was struck with the way in which they had been dealt with, the way in which they had been allowed to get out of hand, and the laxity of punishment that there had been. So that though they are a particular class in themselves requiring a firm hand, I really could not punish them as I thought I ought to do. My experience and knowledge told me that if I pulled the strings a bit tighter, it would have the worst effect; so that I had to temporize with them, and within four days I got information from a prisoner, that some time before, an outbreak had been planned by the convicts, (not the local prisoners) to break out in chapel. On Sundays, as you know, half the officials only are on duty, and the number of officers is very much reduced. I understood from this prisoner that there would be an outbreak in the chapel, and the officers, would be smashed. I came to the Home Office and represented this to the Commissioners and got permission to allow only half the number of prisoners to be in chapel at a time, until they could get them into better order and until we obtained more seat accommodation. I obtained that permission on the 16th of December, and on the 19th, not ten days after my going there, the things that had been told me broke out. What occurred was this: the prisoners were all in chapel; an ill-conditioned man began to jeer, and one of the prison officers held up his finger to check him; on which this young prisoner, a convict got up and rushed to the door, calling on the other prisoners to follow him. At this time I was not in the chapel, because I was attending on the Visiting Committee, who were in the prison. Two members of the committee had come there at my request to hear a report against a prisoner, J. E., whom I shall deal with presently. In my report I stated to the Commissioners what took place. The officers pointed out to the prisoners that they were not to follow this man to the door but to return to their seats. They did return to their seats and they were got to go to their cells. So little noise and commotion had it caused that the two members of the Visiting Committee and myself, who were close to the chapel outside and in the yard, did not even know what had occurred. It was only on the chief warder coming after the prisoners on the way to their cells that we got any information about it at all. I then had a telegram from the Home Office about some business, and thinking everything was quiet, I told the chief warder not to stop the exercise, but in my absence to go on with the exercise. It appears that there was a very bad spirit amongst the convicts, as I said before. Certain old convicts were very discontented at their treatment in the local prison, not being the same as they had been accustomed to in the convict prison. For instance, I elicited that a convict only got a letter after six months, whereas the local prisoner got it after three months. They were discontented about that, and another complaint was that they were not allowed out of their cells as cleaners, cooks, &c. All these were orders from the Home Office, and very proper orders, so as not to mix the convicts with the local prisoners. I was away from half-past one to five and when I got back the chief warder said that the prisoners who had been let out were a bit riotous and men had been at their windows shouting and altogether there was a bad spirit shown. I gave orders for one or two of the ringleaders to be removed to other parts of the prison where they should not excite the others and things quieted down. The next day, Sunday, I took it on myself to stop these riotous prisoners from going to chapel. I exercised all these prisoners in small batches. Everything was as quiet and orderly as possible; you could hear a pin drop. The public did not hear of this until ten days after it occurred. What I contend is that it was a disturbance by reconvicted convicts, that it was not an outbreak, that it was brought about not by my severity but by the laxity of the man who was there for three months in charge and that of the eight prisoners who were charged with having been concerned in this outbreak and who were punished at the convict prisons for it, not one of these prisoners received punishment from me during the seven days I was there or at any other time. In one case I admonished him. In two cases I dismissed the charge as unproved, and in one case, the man being a very bad man, I said he should not go to chapel for seven days. If that is excessive punishment, or could possibly lead to an outbreak, then I am not fit for anything.

6447. Will you hand in to the Committee an abstract of the punishments which were given before this outbreak occurred?—During the seven days I was in charge?

6448. Yes?—I have just casually looked at the punishments by Captain Schuyler, and I find "J. P. wilfully throwing a basin of slops over an officer;" this is personal violence. In the particulars of investigations he says "Proved." The punishment for that was three days stir-about diet. If a convict knows that for three days stirabout diet he can throw his slops over a prison officer and assault him—an offence which by Statute no governor has power to deal with, but which must go before the visiting justices—I say that prisoners will do it with impunity. I only take that as an illustration; but I will hand in to the Committee first of all an abstract showing the lists of all convicts at Wormwood Scrubs prison who were brought before me during the seven days previous to the outbreak.* This is a statement of it. On the 12th of December there were six; on the 14th of December 12; on the 15th of December five; on the 16th of December seven; on the 17th of December seven; on the 18th of December none. The punishments awarded were these; 28 were punished, seven were admonished and two were dismissed. I also have a list of all convicts concerned in the disturbances on the 19th of December 1891, showing which of them were brought before me during that period and how I dealt with them.* I would now say that it has been suggested, as I said before, that a prisoner J. E. had been so brutally treated at Wormwood Scrubs prison that he was removed to Wandsworth in consequence of that outbreak. I will say about that, first of all, that the prisoner J. E. had nothing whatever to do with the outbreak at Wormwood Scrubs; he might as well have been at Wandsworth; he was in another part of the prison; and on the very day that the outbreak occurred he was standing before the Visiting Committee having been reported by me for another offence which he had committed before I resumed charge; that is a charge of trying to break prison by pulling the windows out. The prisoner J. E. was an incorrigible; he was an ex-convict and he had done a sentence of penal servitude, he had been frequently punished, but on my going there in July he said, "I am an old convict, and I like to see convict officers here." I talked to him and tried to lead him to good, and I said, "You are behaving very badly." If you look at the record you will find that in July I admonished him to give him a start, and in July or August you will see that he was admonished as for a first offence.

6449. Yes, that was in July?—That was for picking the mortar out of the brickwork in his cell. He was reported for attempting to break from prison by picking the mortar out of the bricks. I did not want to make a serious thing of it. I said, "You have not had any punishments from me, and therefore I will give you a chance," therefore I admonished him; he was shortly afterwards, I believe, brought before me for making a determined attempt to breaking prison. I ought properly speaking to have made the charge much more severe than it was; then I punished him with three days' bread and water, and 14 days stirabout diet. Had he come before the Visiting Committee he would probably have been flogged for it. The next offence was that when at exercise shortly afterwards with one or two other prisoners, he persuaded some young prisoner to steal behind the officer, when at exercise, and pinion the officer behind, and having got this young man to work behind he pummelled this officer with his fists. It was a most outrageous attack. For that he was brought before the Visiting Committee, and received 18 strokes with the birch-rod. I may say that the Visiting Committee at Wormwood Scrubs, are about the most humane body of gentlemen I have ever met, and it was to them a severe punishment to inflict even one stroke of corporal punishment. They debated for an hour how they could avoid doing it, and one member of the committee was shocked that they had sentenced the prisoner to corporal punishment; but when it was over the prisoner said, "It was not so "hard as my mother used to beat me with her apron "strings." This member of the committee actually went round to the prisoners and told them how deeply sorry he was that they had to sentence them to corporal punishment, but the only cause for it was that he struck an officer. He tried to talk to the prisoners, and I want to say that this was only forced on the committee by the incorrigible conduct of the prisoner. I left the prison, and I see the next reports were during Captain Schuyler's time, when he was reported for incorrigible conduct by barricading his cell door, and refusing to pick his oakum. The first time was on the 24th November, when I was not there; that was for throwing his oakum through his cell window, for which he was sentenced to earn 80 marks in the first stage. The next thing was on the 11th of December which was insubordinate conduct by barricading-in his cell. For that he was brought before the Committee on the 11th of December, the day before I got charge again, and for that he was ordered to be put for 14 days in a punishment cell on No. 1 diet; but on that he would only really get six days on bread-and-water. Then on the 19th of December, which is not the day on which he committed the offence, because he committed the offence on the very day after he was dealt with by the Visiting Committee "When under punishment attempting to escape by "removing bricks from his cell wall, forcing open the "iron window, and breaking three panes of glass;" then repeating the attempt to break prison when placed in another cell. It was for removing the iron from the cell-wall. Then he was brought before the Visiting Committee and Mr. Martineau said, "What do you "think? shall we have to flog him again," I said "Well my experience is that after a man has been once "flogged, flogging has no effect upon him." I said you have very small powers, but if you will give him some other punishment, I will promise to write to the Commissioners pointing out the necessity of sending this man to some other prison. When a prisoner gets into the position, that he thinks he can beat the officers in the prison, he is a marked man; every officer knows him, and perhaps he does not get so good a chance of escaping punishment as by going to a new place. I promised to recommend the Commissioners to order his removal, and the Commissioners ordered him to be sent to Wandsworth prison. He went there to give him a new start; not because we could not manage him at Wormwood Scrubs, but because I thought it might be the means of turning the man to better things. Therefore I suggested it to the Committee.

6450. What Committee was that?—This was the Visiting Committee. Now with regard to the management of the man, his treatment, and the condition of his health.

6451. (Sir Algernon West.) We had evidence, I think, about this on Friday last, when Dr. Patmore was here. He said he was perfectly healthy, bodily and mentally?—That was only as to Wormwood Scrubs.

6452. He said he was personally interviewed, and he sent him to Wandsworth, and he said he was in perfect health, mentally and bodily?—I will hand you this to show the condition in which he was when he left Wormwood Scrubs (document handed in, see Appendix IX.). I wrote to the governor of Wandsworth, and in reply to that he wrote me this (for letter handed in, see Appendix IX.). Not satisfied with that I wrote to the governor of the prison, and the answer was as follows (for letter handed in, see Appendix IX.). I will also hand in this minute (document handed in, see Appendix IX.).

6453. (Chairman.) Mr. Morrison, I think, said that part of the disturbance was due to the fact that there were too many young officers in the prison?—On that point I will say this much, that I personally made a selection. The so-called outbreak was limited entirely to the penal servitude prisoners in the C. hall. The local prisoners are in A. and B. halls, and had no more to do with it than any gentleman in this room to-day. They did not even know it, and they had not the means of taking part in it. It was perfectly isolated, and I say the officers in charge of the convicts were all selected officers of some years' service. There was not, to the best of my belief, a single young officer in charge.

6454. Upon the question of putting convicts into local prisons for nine months, do you think that difficulties arise from it? Do you think it is a good system?—I did not like it at first, and I admit it. But I think that if you have a governor of intelligence who knows how to manage them, and who keeps them apart from the local prisoners that no harm is done.

6455. What is the object?—That is a matter which was decided upon before I came to the head office.

6456. You do not know of any particular advantage?—No, I do not know of any advantage at all.

6457. It would be true probably to say that the convict element in a local prison would give more difficulty than the local prisoners?—I think if convicts are well managed by the governors that they give less trouble. You have to be firm with them, and you have to be consistent with them, but if they are well managed they have such an incentive to good behaviour by earning marks that they are better behaved than short sentence prisoners who come for a few weeks and have nothing to lose but go out when their sentence expires.

6458. Would not you say there are much better facilities for dealing with convict prisoners at convict prisons?—Much better.

6459. And, therefore, it is a little difficult to see the advantage of putting them in the local prisons?—I see no disadvantage in it. I will go further, and I will say that the discipline of the convict prisons is such, that putting a convict prisoner into a local prison does not specially prepare him for the discipline of a convict prison.

6460. With regard to the training of officers, do you think the system is satisfactory?—The training of convict officers is quite satisfactory, but I cannot say the same of local prison officers. In a convict prison for three months after an officer joins he is under instruction by specially selected officers, and until he has passed three months' probation and is certified by the governor and the other officers who have had to do with his training he is not allowed to take charge of prisoners. This system is also applicable to local prisons, but in the first case there is no difficulty in carrying it out because the prisoners are in associated labour, and to each party there are probably three officers, so the probationary officer may be under instruction and yet be of use, without being put in a position of responsibility for which he is not qualified. In local prisons, except the very largest, the newly-appointed officer is wanted for duty from the day he joins, and he may have to take charge of prisoners without any training whatever. The best is done to teach him, but in the small prisons his instructors may not themselves be qualified to instruct, and I therefore favour a better system for the training of local officers. I think no person should be appointed to fill a vacancy on the staff of a prison until he has gone through a course of instruction at a selected prison and has satisfactorily passed his first probation of three months. There should be a few prisons with selected officers where there should be a number of candidates for prison appointments under instruction, and from these candidates appointments could be made to fill vacancies. The newly appointed officer would then join as a trained officer ready to take duty at once. The candidates under instruction should be supernumerary to the regular staff of our prisons, and the governors and other officers of the selected prisons, which would be schools of instruction, should be specially chosen for the work. In short, I am of opinion that no officer should be put in charge of prisoners until certified as competent by his knowledge of the duties, his tact, temper, moral influence, and fitness, but to secure this there would have to be a reserve of officers trained and in training, and this would cost money.

6461. What sized prisons would you select for that?—The larger prisons like Pentonville, Wandsworth, Liverpool, and Durham. If an officer under instruction showed no aptitude he could be got rid of without inconveniencing the prison, as he would be, by my proposal, supernumerary to the regular staff.

6462. Then you would make two or three prisons, in fact, training schools for warders?—Yes, I would.

Col. Garsia.
22 Nov. 1894.

6463. Do you think the same plan would result well in the case of the deputy-governors?—We did have that plan for the deputy-governors. I think it is a very excellent plan. When I joined the prison service all deputy-governors had to go to Millbank to be trained before being definitely appointed.

6464. Was that system given up?—It was done for a long time.

6465. But when was it given up?—I should think it was eight or ten years ago.

6466. Do you know why it was given up?—Well, Millbank was closed, and the appointments became very few.

6467. Do you approve of the practice of sending in temporary officers?—The practice is virtually at an end, temporary officers as regards male prisons being employed only in cases where it would be impossible to employ permanent ones except at a ruinous cost. I have given much consideration to this subject, and made a report and recommendations after visiting all the prisons last year, and a change was made by the Commissioners, which took effect on the 1st January 1894. In convict prisons temporary officers are never employed, the staff being provided to meet all ordinary casualties. The local prisons are now officered on the following basis, excluding the special staff, such as chief warder, night watchman, infirmary warders, gate-keepers, artizans, schoolmasters, messengers, porters, and the like, the prisons with a greatest population of over 100 are given a discipline staff of principal warders, warders, and assistant warders at the rate of five per cent. on the accommodation, or on the greatest number in custody on any day the preceding year, and in prisons under 100 on a specially liberal scale, to enable the duty to be efficiently performed on Sundays with half the officers away on leave. Each prison is further considered as to its local circumstances, i.e., construction, the classes of prisoners received, and whether the margin between the daily average and the greatest number is high or low, also as to the number of officers required for Sunday duty, and based on these circumstances additional officers are allowed, whilst temporary officers are only called in for the following purposes—to take the place of the night watchman when absent on leave through sickness or any other cause, to assist pending the filling of a vacancy in the authorised staff, at certain places for escorts, in connexion with assizes and sessions, or for extra duty on such occasions, to assist in watching prisoners who are dangerous or under sentence of death. To have permanent officers to meet such emergencies would be absurdly expensive, as in some prisons they might go for years without requiring officers for such purposes.

6468. Do you think the staff on the male side is adequate?—From my observation, I think it is distinctly adequate.

6469. And on the female side?—Well, I think that has got to be looked into. There are not many complaints; but the Commissioners have got it under consideration now. It was a trial on the male side to see how it worked, and it worked well. No doubt they will have to do the same thing on the female side. There are difficulties in some prisons where, perhaps, there are only one or two female prisoners. Sometimes they have a matron and one officer, and they go for weeks without a female prisoner, and then they may have five or six; but in the big prisons, where there is a large number of women, I have no doubt that they will, next year, appoint a fixed staff to do away with temporaries.

6470. Can you tell me why the number of warders shown in the estimates does not correspond with the actual number?—The number of officers for the prison is in the estimates based on the accommodation, or very nearly, the accommodation of the prison. It is in the power of the Commissioners, should the population of the prison rise with a sign of permanence during the period, to engage the officers, but if it does not rise they officer them on the basis I have told the Committee, and there is no necessity for putting the country to the expense of an extra officer.

6471. Are there enough officers?—In a great many prisons there are enough. Holloway has a large fixed staff; so have the London prisons generally. But there are smaller prisons where it would add so many officers who would only be required for a few days, e.g., assizes, and if the governor cannot manage without them he is authorised, without any requisition, to get in temporary officials. I ought to have mentioned that before; but there are a good many of the larger prisons, like Liverpool, to which the general rule is applicable.

6472. Have there been many cases reported of trafficking between the warders and the prisoners' friends?—In my experience we have occasionally found officers trafficking with prisoners' friends. We very seldom hear of it by temporary officers, because we cannot find it out, but I will give you one instance, the case of a man who had been in the service over 20 years at Wormwood Scrubs. He had been a principal warder, and it happened that a prisoner was brought there. He was a man who had been convicted of fraud, and making away with 28,000*l*. The officer knew his man, and I had a hint that he was too attentive to his prisoner. I could not believe it. I thought that with a man entitled to a pension, and who could retire, it was impossible; but I took steps to try and ferret it out. I saw the prisoner, and I told him we knew he was getting advantages, and I showed him what a danger he was running. He said, "He brings "me in letters from my wife, and newspapers, and is "a friend to me, but she has got to pay very dearly "for it." I could not believe it. I said, "You must "write a letter to your wife and tell her to trust the "governor, and she will not be brought into court; "but tell her to trust him and tell him who the "officer is." I sent a confidential clerk of mine to this woman, and she was very alarmed at first, but she told him about it. She said, "He charges me 5*l*. "for every three letters I send to him." It seemed incredible to me. I had arranged what she was to do to trap him. She was to write a letter to her husband; he was to put a private mark on that letter; she was to enclose that letter to her husband in a private note to the warder, saying, "I send you accord-"ing to arrangement, the letter to my husband." The clerk accompanied her to the pillar-box and saw that letter put in the box. The next thing that occurred was that I had the chief warder and another warder on watch, and afterwards this old officer of 20 years' service had, in the course of his duty, to go into that prisoner's cell. The moment he came out my two men, who were watching from the next cell, came out at once, searched the prisoner, and took from him the letter on which the private mark had been put. They brought the prisoner at once to me, and I said, "How "did you get that letter?" He said, "My warder "brought it in to me, sir." I sent for the warder, and I said, "You have been betraying your trust." The man looked perfectly dazed. I said, "That letter "was written by the man's wife, and the two marks "were put on it. The letter was seen to be posted "to you, and everything was known." He said, "Have mercy on me!" I suspended him and reported him, and I asked for authority to prosecute him. Before a day was over he disappeared, and never has been heard of since. I say this to show that you will have black sheep in every service.

6473. What per-centage of trafficking do you think there is amongst the warders and the prisoners' friends?—It is very little. Any man without experience who would say there is no trafficking cannot possibly know about it. There is trafficking, and there always will be trafficking.

6474. Are you satisfied with the class of men you get as warders?—I gave evidence on this subject on the Committee of which Lord Rosebery was Chairman, and I made my own suggestions for getting the best class of men possible, and Lord Rosebery, after listening to a great deal of my evidence, said, "Have "you any difficulty in getting candidates. Is there "any lack of candidates?" I said, "No, my Lord, "we get a good many candidates. We get military "men—soldiers." He said, "Then how do you "reconcile your recommendation with the fact that "you get any quantity of candidates?" I say now to this Committee what I said to Lord Rosebery, that a man when he is starving and very hard up will take an appointment, but that after he gets one he becomes discontented. He is not the right man for it, but he sticks on to it, because he cannot get anything better. Taking it all round we get very fair men.

6475. Do you think their hours are not too long?—I do not.

6476. They are fair?—They are fair.

6477. Do you think there is any undue strain on them?—I read the evidence of one witness in which it was said that a prison officer did 25 hours' duty; but I can only say that if he does it is contrary to the rule. The standing orders are distinct, that no officer is to do more than 10½ hours' duty a day, and that if he is called upon to do other duty he is to be compensated by additional leave. Many of the officers in the local service say they are called upon to sleep in the prisons. That matter was threshed out completely by Lord Ramsey's Committee, and they came to the conclusion that the mere sleeping in was not enough to complain of. At Millbank and Wormwood Scrubs I lived a mile and a half away, but I had to sleep there at night. They held there was no hardship from the mere fact of sleeping in the prison. In many cases the officer benefited by it, as he got away from some squalid lodging and screaming child, so that his rest was not disturbed. But in that case, of the 25 hours' duty, I can only say if the governor employed an officer for that time it is absolutely contrary to the orders of the Commissioners. They lay down that if an officer is going on active night duty he is to be let off from half-past eleven a.m., and he comes on at 7 in the evening; so that he is off duty for a number of hours. He then does his night duty, and he is released from duty from six the next morning until one o'clock that day.

6478. Now, with regard to classification, should you approve of the extension of the star class system in convict prisons to local prisons?—I see no difficulty at all in it; you could have first offenders separated from habitual criminals. Of course, they are on the separate system, but I know myself from personal experience that prisoners, though under the separate system, do communicate with each other. They do talk in chapel. They do not talk to a great extent, but they do get an opportunity of talking at exercise. I think it would be a good thing if you could have a separation of the first offenders from the habituals; and I think that could be done. It is not only the corruption which takes place in the prison, because that may be very little, but I speak of it on the ground that a person who comes into prison for the first time for some small offence gets known to the other men. When he gets out they are brothers in affliction, and the old criminal approaches them. It is better for them not to be known to each other; and on this ground I advocate it.

6479. Do you think that the present system of giving short sentences to habitual criminals works badly?—I do, and very badly. I do not think in short sentences you can have a reformatory effect.

6480. Do you approve of cumulative penalties?—I do.

6481. Would you approve of raising the age for admission to reformatory schools from 16 to 18?—Of course at 18 that class of youth is as vicious and bad as anything can be, and it would be bearing on the right side if they could be kept apart from the younger ones.

6482. A man practically goes on in a reformatory up to the age of 21?—Yes. I think you must keep them apart from the much younger reformatory boy then. If you were to throw into the reformatory a rough and criminal boy up to the age of 18 with a boy of 14 the boy of 14 would be utterly demoralised and ruined.

6483. Then it would be necessary to have classification?—Yes.

6484. Do you think any separate treatment should be administered to the drunkards?—It is very difficult to draw the line where criminality begins with the habitual drunkard.

6485. You have read the report of the Inebriates Committee?—I read it to a certain extent. I cannot say I have digested it, but I have looked at it.

6486. Would you agree with the general conclusion of it, that habitual drunkards should be punished for that particular offence?—I do certainly, because he is a free agent.

6487. With regard to weak-minded prisoners, do you find that there is considerable difference in their numbers in different parts of the country, I mean, for instance, would you find a great proportion of weak-minded prisoners who come from London, or from great towns?—I should say they come from the great towns mostly. I should say that from London, Manchester, and Liverpool the per-centage of weak-minded prisoners is greater than in the rural districts.

6488. Would it be possible to give the Committee any return of that?—Well, the only kind of return you could possibly get would be one from medical statistics, but there are a great number of prisoners in prison with weak minds who are not treated as weak-minded persons. It is virtually that the warder says of such a prisoner, "He is not all there," and you must make allowances for that, but there is nothing that calls for the interference of the doctor.

6489. With regard to the prisoners who are especially treated for being epileptic and weak-minded, could you give us information showing how the proportion stands?—I will endeavour to get such a return.

6490. Speaking generally, do you think that the prison system as it at present exists requires greater elasticity?—I cannot see in what way, if facilities are given to the Commissioners for greater industrial employment, and also on the lines of the visiting committees taking a greater interest in the prisons, and helping in the administration of them; otherwise, I do not know in what way.

6491. You do not think greater power should be given to the governors with regard to letters and communications?—They have enormous power. There is a Standing Order to which I would like to call attention.

6492. I think we have had evidence on the Standing Order. That has been put in?—It is Standing Order 213.

6493. Then, though that Standing Order may give a certain amount of discretion, yet at the same time, under the prison rules, the number of visits and letters is strictly limited according to different classes of prisoners?—Yes.

6494. What I mean is this. Would you approve of greater discretionary power being given to the governor?—I see no necessity for it, if you gave your Visiting Committee greater power to deal with that question. I am greatly in favour of having rules, and of having those rules except in certain circumstances complied with. The prisoner knows what privileges he has got, and he is satisfied if he knows that he gets them. But you have to think of what is the average capacity of governors and of chief warders in charge, and that they have not had to act with this extension of powers. Of course, if the magistrates had them, they would probably administer them well and efficiently; but I think a governor has quite enough power now. It may seem a little hard, but I think a local prisoner who is allowed every three months from the date of conviction to get a letter, and who goes through the whole of his sentence in prison with power to get letters at the same rate, is satisfied. You might do as you do with the convicts; and, as he goes on, in time you might give him more frequent opportunities of receiving letters. You have it so in the convict prisons. A man for the first year has a letter every six months; in the second year he has it a little oftener, in the third year a little oftener, and in the fourth year a little oftener still, if his conduct is good. In the local prisons he has it every three months, and I think you might extend that and say that if a prisoner was in for one year or over you would give him greater facilities for communicating with his friends after he had been in for a certain time; but I would have it a rule; I would not leave it to the discretion of the governor. I think the governor has quite enough power, and any governor who is worth his salt with the powers he has got if there was any emergency for a prisoner to get a letter, would know when to give it to him.

Col. Garsia.

22 Nov. 1894.

6495. Would you give the larger discretion, if at all, to the justices?—Yes, I would.

6496. (Sir Algernon West.) You said that besides your appointment as secretary you are inspector of prisons?—Yes.

6497. We have had evidence before us of some prisons where the accommodation apparently is very much too small for the necessities of the place. Would it be the duty of the inspector to bring that before the Commissioners?—No, I should think it would be rather the duty of the governor to represent it.

6498. Supposing the recommendation of the Committee in favour of inebriates was carried out, would you merely send people who have been convicted of being drunk and disorderly to these Homes or how would you separate the drunkards from the others?—I have not given that matter attention.

6499. A large proportion of people who fall from drink are brought up for crime, and not for being drunkards?—Yes.

6500. In talking about classification you talk of one classification for first offenders, would that be an adequate classification, because on the first time of conviction they may have been criminals for a long time?—Yes, even in our classification of convicts we make inquiries primâ facie if the man has ever been convicted before, or if he has been convicted only of some offence like assault or being drunk; but we go beyond that and we inquire into his whole conduct and antecedents, and the directors decide as to his classification according to his whole life and his associates. I would carry that principle out in local prisons.

6501. Who would you leave the discretion with?—With the Visiting Committee who would take an interest in it.

6502. You speak so strongly in favour of useful labour that I suppose that would carry with it your condemnation of the crank and the treadwheel?—I object to the treadwheel, and I will tell you why. First I do not think it is a deterrent punishment and it carries with it the association of short sentence prisoners during their first month. I do not think it is a deterrent punishment at all, and I am supported in that by replies to many inquiries, I have made. It is in the Act, but I do not believe in the treadwheel at all. I do not think it elevates the prisoners morally. It does no good physically. I think it brings into association the first offender with the older offender. It leads to association and talking, and I object to it. On the other hand, it is said if the crank were made useful and productive as it is in many prisons it would be better. For a short sentence prisoner you have to find some kind of work, and I think it is as good work as you could give them.

6503. Are you in favour of plank beds?—I see no harm in them at all. It is better than a man lying on the ground, and you surely would not give him an iron bedstead that he might pull about and strike the officer with. It is a means of taking the bed off the ground.

6504. I mean the plank bed without the mattrass?—He has his bedclothes.

6505. But he has no mattrass?—Well, if you go to prison you must pay the penalty of your offence.

6506. I have seen in many goals I have been to, a very loafing set of contemptible people who are in for what is called debt; but who really are people who can pay and who will not pay. Is there any reason why these people should have the privilege of disturbing the discipline of the prison by wearing their own clothes and having other advantages. Is there any reason why they should not be treated as other prisoners are?—I would treat them as other prisoners are.

6507. They can purge themselves by paying?—I have always thought it was an abuse.

6508. I have one question to ask you as to the system of chaplains. It has occurred to me that the present system is a dreadful dreary monotony both for the chaplain and the prisoners, and that a great deal of good would be done by having occasionally other preachers and some variety of service for them?—Yes, I am a great deal in favour of getting judicious men to come at different times. I have watched this. It is a great advantage to the prisoners to take them out of themselves. When a man has a change it is much better for him.

6509. You would be in favour of trying that?—Yes, I think it would be a very great advantage.

6510. (Mr. De Rutzen.) You are not much in favour of keeping convicts in the local prisons?—I do not see any advantage in it.

6511. Is there any reason or ground for keeping them there except from the point of economy?—What originally started it was the closing of certain prisons in London so as to make the sites available, and the conversion of the close convict prisons into local prisons, such as Pentonville and Wormwood Scrubs. Before that we always had Pentonville and Wormwood Scrubs as close convict prisons, and every person wherever he was convicted was brought to London and taken to that prison and there passed through his probationary period of nine months. It was an excellent system which worked well. But when of course that was broken up, there were two considerations, one being to save bringing the prisoners all the way to London so certain prisons were made receiving prisons where he went through the probationary period of nine months. That expense was saved, and it saved the expense of starting another central convict prison for collecting these prisoners. Having seen the working of that good old system in the convict prisons I admit my preference for it.

6512. Instead of sending them off one by one they collect them together for the purpose of sending them off in larger detachments?—No, the system is this, that wherever a prisoner is convicted and sentenced to penal servitude he goes to the prison at the place where he was tried, and as soon as possible after his conviction; the Governor there sends in a return to say there are certain convicts, whose names are so and so, waiting removal to a collecting prison. Then we have certain districts (I think there are 12 districts) which are called "collecting districts" where the convicts are collected and spend their nine months. There are 12 out of the 56 local prisons where this is done; but it may be there is only one convict there. We do not detain them in the prison where they were convicted for any length of time at all. The term "collecting prison" means that they go there to be collected in that district.

6513. And only are sent away when they get to a certain number?—No, they are not kept to wait for any number at all.

6514. In some of the smaller prisons where there is a chief warder in charge, do you consider that there ought to be any improvement in the position of the chief warder in charge?—No, for that class of man I think he has got an excellent position.

6515. But he is an uniformed officer?—I see nothing derogatory in that. I think it is necessary with that class of men to make him an uniformed officer.

6516. You would not suggest any improvement in that?—They are very worthy men in their way; they have been accustomed to uniform all their lives, and if you let them go out in plain clothes they would get into a slovenly way; while if they still keep as uniformed officers, they realise their position and feel they are on duty. I am in favour of the uniform.

6517. I have one question to ask you with reference to the visiting justices, I see that in the rules it is laid down that they shall co-operate with the Commissioners in promoting the efficiency of the service. Do you know whether the visiting justices are made acquainted with the visits of the inspectors and Commissioners?—The visiting justices have the right I believe to see every book in the prison.

6518. But have they notice of the time when the inspectors and commissioners are coming round?—They could not possibly know it, because the governors do not know it.

6519. But do the commissioners take any steps to inform the Visiting Committee?—No, not unless the inspector wishes to see them.

6520. (Miss Orme.) You spoke of the inspector's duties becoming perfunctory if they went on visiting the same prison for a long time. Is that system, to some extent, mitigated by changing their districts?—Well, it could be; but, as a matter of fact, we do not change their districts.

6521. I think, for instance, Captain Wilson was inspecting Strangeways some time ago, but he has been removed?—Yes, that is the only case in 17 years.

6522. That is not the beginning of a new system, I suppose. That is an accident?—I think so.

6523. Do you think from your own experience that it would be a way of improving the performance of their duties to give them different districts, so that they can compare one with the other?—I do not know that. Unless the inspectors take a different district each month, I do not see how it would effect it.

6524. You do not think, if they worked two or three months in the north of England and then went to the south, it would have that effect?—There is no reflection on the inspectors in what I have said, I have only said, speaking generally, that if one does a thing every month, and goes the same round constantly, it is liable to become perfunctory.

6525. You do not think the variation of that round would meet that difficulty?—I think if it were varied every month it might.

6526. When you have visited prisons, do you recall any cases where the accommodation in the reception ward for the women prisoners is very inadequate?—Yes, I recall one where there is no fitness at all.

6527. We have evidence that at Strangeways there were very few cells and very few boxes. Did you see that?—My attention was not called to that; but, of course, if these things are represented, I have no reason to say that they are not right.

6528. Should you say it is a matter of very great importance when women are brought into prison in large numbers from the police court that there should be such complete accommodation in the reception ward that there is no chance of two or three being put into one cell; I should like to know if you would think that a very dangerous way of bringing them into association, if the older and the younger women were put together?—I should look upon it in two ways. Not only is there the danger of contamination, but there may be the danger of spreading disease; for instance, one prisoner might have incipient measles, or scarlet-fever, or something of that kind. I should always keep prisoners apart. I do not like association.

6529. On their reception, you think, it is a matter of great importance to put them into separate cells?—Yes.

6530. With regard to the chapel services. In some cases, as at Wormwood Scrubs, the women have only just room to sit close to each other. Is that a bad thing?—Yes; I do not like prisoners to be huddled together.

6531. Can you suggest any means of meeting that difficulty?—There are only two ways; either to provide increased accommodation, or to let them attend half of them at a time.

6532. To have two services a day?—Yes.

6533. Do you think that would interfere much with the prison discipline and the hours of work?—You understand what I mean. There are two services every Sunday.

6534. Then you would have to have four?—I would cut off half their services. That is the only way to do it, unless you provide increased accommodation. I am in favour of providing increased accommodation.

6535. Have you seen the arrangements for washing for the public at Strangeways?—Yes.

6536. Do you approve of it?—You mean the fact that they do wash for the public?

6537. Yes. It is particularly successful, is it not?—Yes. It is not limited to that prison. At Fulham when it existed as a female convict prison it was done very largely. Nearly the whole of the women were employed in the laundry, and I myself having no connexion with Fulham, got all my washing done there. I was very glad on my visit to Strangeways to see it carried on there. I think it is an excellent thing.

6538. Can you give us any reason why it is not carried on at Holloway and Liverpool. I only mention these prisons as examples of a large number of women's prisons?—I do not know why.

6539. The matron at Strangeways told us she was able to teach the women the sort of ironing that was wanted in a week?—Yes.

6540. Would not it be possible in the same way at Holloway and at Liverpool?—I see no reason why it should not. In fact, you find now at Holloway there are plenty of women put in the laundry who are doing good work on sentences of a month.

6541. They are doing prison work; they are not doing the fine kind of washing?—No.

6542. Can you give me an explanation of what is the principal consideration in the choice of industry to which you put female prisoners?—I should say primarily it is what the female prisoner likes to do herself.

6543. Not what pays in the prison; but you think first of what the prisoner would like to do herself?—We are talking of the selection by the prisoner.

6544. Yes. I mean when the matron or governor states what the women are to do, what is it that influences them?—There are certain industries in each prison. Take, for instance, Strangeways, where they have laundry work. The only other thing, I think, that they do is some little oakum-picking in their cells, and also the prison work, such as cleaning, and that sort of thing. Well, if a prisoner who goes there is anxious to get into the laundry, she applies to the matron to be allowed to go into the laundry, and if the matron thinks right she puts her there. The governor does not interfere, but the matron puts her into the laundry. Some do not want to go there. No prisoner is compelled to go into the laundry. The only occasion on which we compel them to go into the laundry is when for the prison work we require a certain number there. Then they are obliged to go.

6545. Supposing you were building a large workshop or a large laundry in a large female prison what considerations would affect the Commissioners in deciding whether to do it. Is it that the industry will pay, or is it that the women will be able to earn money after they go out in that industry, or is it that it would have a good moral effect on them?—I would prefer you should put that question to the Chairman.

6546. It has been suggested that it would be a good thing to have lady visitors in prison. Should you approve of lady visitors, appointed in some way, going to the cells and seeing the prisoners without the presence of the matron or the warder?—I do not see what harm ladies would do if they were well selected. Of course you have to think of protecting the ladies too.

6547. But if a lady were willing to undertake that sort of work would you see any objection to it?—

Col. Garsia.

22 Nov. 1894.

No, not during the last part of imprisonment. Of course you have always got to think what the object of the lady is. If she comes to visit a prisoner during the last part of the sentence and is trying to get employment for her, I think that cannot be too much encouraged. But in some cases the lady goes there to vie with the chaplain and speak morally to the prisoner. Then you have got a little jealousy and fuss, which very often makes it difficult.

6548. Now, the mark system has a very good effect, has it yot?—Excellent.

6549. Would not it rather weaken the system of rewards by privileges, and letters, and so on if lady visitors were able to carry in messages?—Yes, if they abuse their appointment by doing so. I am supposing that the ladies who would be appointed would strictly confine themselves to talking to the prisoners and not be the channel of communication between the prisoners and their friends. If they did that you would destroy all the effect of prison discipline.

6550. I do not mean that they would actually carry in a letter in the way you described, but by way of conversation there would be communications made?—Yes, I think you would lessen the benefit of imprisonment very much.

6551. And that would lessen the benefit of the mark system?—Yes.

6552. You spoke of the benefit of removing a prisoner from one prison to another sometimes?—Yes.

6553. Is not it an important thing to have more than one convict prison for women, so that there may be some opportunity for removal, and for comparing the two systems?—We used to have three.

6554. You now only have one?—Yes. To make two convict prisons to hold 200 women with a staff is again a question of money. We used to have Fulham. At Millbank, over which I was governor, we had to do with women. Then there is Woking. There were those three, and it has now been reduced to one. They are going to remove Woking to Aylesbury shortly and they are only a couple of hundred of prisoners there.

6555. Do you think it would be better to have more than one prison?—I do not think it matters with a convict prison, because the discipline is so uniform.

6556. For instance, you have only one sort of needlework going on?—There is no reason why you should not try a new experiment. I do not see why we should not.

6557. But if they have their workshops arranged can changes be made?—Yes, I think that might be managed.

6558. (Mr. Haldane.) You told the Chairman that as regards the visiting justices you thought that their functions were ample as regards complaints. Do the visiting justices practically do more under the present system than listen to the complaints of the prisoners?—Yes, I think they do.

6559. I mean practically, not theoretically?—Yes, I will tell you what practically they do. Of course now in my present office everything passes through me and I see it. If a prisoner writes a petition complaining of his treatment, in 99 cases out of 100 the Prison Commissioners send this complaint back to the prison, with instructions to the governor to lay it before the Visiting Committee and to ask them to be good enough to investigate it and to give the Secretary of State the benefit of their information as to it.

6560. On a petition?—Yes; or they do so if a report of the governor comes in. If any special report comes in they put it before them, and we have had several cases in which Visiting Committees do investigate complaints and record with great care in their minutes the results of their investigations.

6561. On these functions the visiting committee are practically only a judicial body. They do nothing as regards the administration of the prison?—No; if a prisoner comes up before the committee and complains of some specific act of alleged cruelty and makes a complaint, the members of the visiting committee see the people concerned, go into the whole case, and they record in their minutes their decision; if they see no ground for it, or that they consider that the officer in question was guilty of so-and-so; and if they think he was guilty the governor of course at once suspends the officer.

6562. That is again administration of justice; but I mean as regards the administration of the prison generally. For instance, it is a condition; and on the question whether there should be a more efficient supply of labour for the prisoners, the visiting justices have no functions whatever?—No, they simply represent to the Secretary of State whatever they think fit.

6563. I suppose that does not happen very often?—It does, very often indeed.

6564. On points?—I can recall several cases within the last few years of visiting justices writing and complaining about the labour of the prison. I can recall at Bristol a complaint about employing prisoners at unproductive labour. I have known several other cases.

6465. The inspectors would have, as part of their business, to see that the supply of labour was as far as could be efficient?—Whenever I go round I make it my duty to see to that; I cannot speak for the other inspectors, but they are zealous and able men, I am sure; but if I notice that there is no industrial work at a prison I make it my duty to put it before the Commissioners and say what I think of it.

6566. Does not it amount to this: if there is a zealous inspector or if there is a zealous visiting committee of justices, the administration of the prison, so far as it supplied prison labour, and its general condition will be reported on; but there is no certainty that it will be, and matters are very much left to the governor and the Prison Board?—Of course the Prison Board have certain information before them, as each prison sends in a return monthly of the labour done in the prisons. That comes before the Prison Board, and the Prisons Commissioners take it up and call on the store accountant to account for any failure and say what was the cause of it. The governor is queried why the work is not done. He says, "I have not the work to give them." Then the store accountant has to give an account of it. I know it has been very seriously considered within the last two or three years, and that they have been aiming at a decrease of oakum picking and an increase of other employment.

6567. But the supervision of the prison board is on the paper materials that come before them?—And the verbal reports of the inspectors.

6568. Which may or may not be detailed reports. I gather from you that some of the inspectors are more particular than others?—That would be so in every walk of life. It is the duty of the inspectors to bring everything of that kind forward; it is part of their instruction. They are the eyes and ears of the Commissioners, and when they go to a prison and see anything that requires attention it is their bounden duty to report it.

6569. But should you say the majority of the justices in the country did it themselves, or that they left it to the inspection of the central authority?—I should say they left it to the central authority.

The proceedings were adjourned for a short time.

6570. I had asked you when we adjourned about the functions of the justices as they are now. Under the old prison system there was a great deal of what we may call prison employment, which was devised and supervised by the justices, was there not?—I believe so.

6571. And in those days the average supply of prison labour and of occupation for the prisoners in the better managed local prisons was considerably larger than it is to-day?—I have reason to believe so.

6572. Was the effect of the change which took place under the Prisons' Act of 1877 to introduce a considerable alteration into the system of prison occupation?—I do not think the change introduced the alteration in the system; I think what has occurred since in the opposition to prison employment has been a potent thing.

6573. Yes, but the regulations of prison labour, like everything else, became very much under rules from headquarters, and the directions which were given to the administration as to the occupation of the prisoners became transferred to the Prison Board?—Yes.

6574. And the result has been from whatever cause that there is less occupation for prisoners now?—If you take what some old governors say, as I have been told that some governors do say, under the old system they made prison labour pay, and they paid the cost of the prison out of the labour, and that under the prsent system they do not do so, and they would lead you to suppose that it has been because of the routine that has to be gone through. I do not believe from what I have seen in convict prisons and comparing it with local prisons that it is so. I believe that it is mostly and almost entirely due to the opposition to the employment of prisoners, and not so any fault on the part of the Commissioners. Their difficulty has been to get work. The Commissioners are most anxious to get work. Another thing is that the sentences have been very much reduced during the last 17 years while it has been under the control of the Prison Commissioners. There are a greater number of prisoners who go in on much shorter sentences, and the difficulty is how to employ those who cannot in the short sentences learn a trade.

6575. Putting apart from consideration the question of short sentences, should you say that the supply of occupations for the prisoners is less to day than it was say 10 years ago?—To the extent of the mat making, but I know of no other industry.

6576. That is the only one?—At this moment I can recall no others.

6577. What steps have the Prison Board taken within the last 10 years to increase the supply of labour?—Well, they have done their best to get work for the Government Departments.

6578. Have they sent out circulars or taken any active steps?—I cannot tell you the actual steps they have taken. You have had the store accountant before you, but I can say they have all been most anxious and most concerned about getting industrial employment for the prisoners from the Chairman downwards.

6579. We had a question put about the way in which some industries have been taken away. For instance, I think mat-making was taken away from Lewes?—Mat-making was taken away from all the prisons except for the Government work.

6580. I mean sack-making; that was taken away from Lewes, was it not?—I have no reason to say it was taken away; but if it was taken away it was a temporary thing, and it was taken away because the convicts were going to a convict prison in for separate confinement. As a rule convicts are at once put to industrial employment, and our supply of that kind of work might have been limited; and on that account it may have been transferred from the local prisons where oakum picking is more generally done.

6581. Have you applied your mind to the question whether the sphere of work for the convicts could be considerably or at all enlarged by increasing the facilities for transporting them to different places. Peterhead Harbour has been, as you know, built entirely in this way. It is in course of building now, but it has been built entirely by convict labour. Assuming there were public works it was desirable to do, do you think it would apply to transporting convicts and supervising them temporarily, so that they could undertake public works of that kind?—None whatever. To prove that to you I will say that some years ago a Commission was appointed on that very point to find occupation of that kind for convicts; and this Committee recommended two great public works, a harbour of refuge at Filey Bar, or a harbour of refuge at Dover. The Government of the day at once selected Dover for the public work corresponding to the Scotch one. They proceeded to get barracks and to put up a convict prison, and they obtained land for housing convicts as a first measure. When they had got that, they moved in a certain number of convicts, and everything was ready for going on with that work, but the succeeding Government stopped the work. There are the barracks, a sum of 65,000*l.* has been spent in getting the land, and putting up a building on it; but it did not suit the next Government to carry on the work. At present there are 23 convicts in the prison, and there is no occupation for them. They will be withdrawn.

6582. So that in your case there is no difficulty in finding barracks and employing convict labour?—No.

6583. Might not it be a good thing to use convict labour mainly for the purpose of these public works, leaving the lighter forms of occupation for the short sentence prisoners?—Yes, but you must bear in mind that there are a large per-centage of convicts who are totally unfitted for that class of work, and who are only fitted for a light class of work, and occupations have to be provided for them.

6584. Would not it be a good thing to use the convict establishments to do a certain amount of Government printing?—We have it at Parkhurst. It is an industry which I take great interest in. They can do it quite well. We do all the printing of forms and documents for the Prisons Department; and there is no reason why that might not be extended.

6585. And there would be abundance of Government printing which could be done?—Yes.

6586. That is a sort of labour which might be utilized?—Yes, for the better educated convict.

6587. As to the question of the boots for the police, were those made in convict prisons or in the short sentence prisons?—In the convict prisons.

6588. Do you think the system could be so improved as to have those boots made sufficiently for the army and the police?—We used to make them for the police. We had a convict population of from 12,000 to 14,000, but that has fallen to something like 4,000, and in that reduced number the number of bootmakers by trade fell very considerably too. That is why we could not carry it on. I should say if you collected from all the local prisons the fairly long sentence bootmakers by trade and concentrated them in one prison, they could probably carry it on.

6589. In other words, you think it might be useful to classify them, differentiating your prisoners according to the mode of labour most suitable for them, and to draft only the convicts most suitable for that class of works to that particular prison. I am speaking only of convict prisons?—Convicts and long sentence local prisoners I understood.

6590. In that way you could get a large amount of occupation, such as printing, bootmaking, and so on for convicts?—Yes.

6591. And some of the things that require less instruction for the short sentence prisoners?—I do not know that there is any margin in convict labour for that, seeing that the mass of our convicts are at out door labour.

6592. You think that there is really plenty of work for convicts at the present time?—At the moment there is no lack of it.

6593. It is only in the short sentences?—It is only in the short sentences. We want industrial labour for indoor work.

6594. I want to ask you one or two questions about the Wormwood Scrubs outbreak. J. P. was the first man whose name came up, and he threw slops over the warder. Was an inquiry made at that time about it?—That was not in connexion with the outbreak at all.

6595. That was before it?—I only brought that forward for this reason: not to reflect on a very young and inexperienced prison official, but to show you that his deduction which he had communicated to the chaplain, Mr. Morrison, that the so-called outbreak at Wormwood Scrubs was the result of excessive cruel punishments was not so; but that, in my opinion, after an experience of 17 years it was the result of the other thing; that is, of not properly dealing with prisoners, and of allowing them to get out of hand by not meting out that proper punishment for serious offences which is provided for by statute, and I brought forward this case to show an example which casually had attracted my notice.

Col. Garsia
22 Nov. 1894.

6596. When did J. P.'s case happen?—In November 1891.

6597. That was just before the outbreak; who was the officer who was in charge of J. P., and who had the slops thrown over him? Was he a young man?—I cannot tell you his service.

6598. You cannot tell me anything about it?—No; I have merely taken up the punishment book and come across it.

6599. I should like to ask you this: J. E. was connected with the outbreak?—He was not connected with the outbreak in any way whatever.

6600. What was the date of J. E.'s case?—J. E.'s last offence was this: he was standing before the visiting committee at the time, or shortly afterwards, when the so-called outbreak took place. He was located in a part of the prison many hundred yards away from where this took place. He had no means of communication with the people who took part in it. That took place with the convicts who were located in the hall called C., and J. E. was in the hall called B. He had no means of communication with them.

6601. Is there any record of complaints made by the convicts at that time?—They had made no complaints at all previous to this; but after the so-called disturbance in the chapel took place I went to the cell of the man who called upon the others to come out. I went into him and said, "Why have you "behaved like this?" He said, "Well, sir, we do "not get our rights; we are convicts here." This was a man under a first sentence of penal servitude, but a man who had been sentenced to a dozen local sentences. He said, "We do not get our rights here. "We are not properly treated like convicts. We "only get a letter every six months instead of every "three months. We are not allowed to be out as "cleaners," and he said, "We did not go to chapel "yesterday, and we do not get a full hour's exercise." Of course, this matter of not getting a full hour's exercise I had nothing to do with as I had just come back. I said, "If these are your grievances why did "not you complain to me, I would have seen to it, "and put things right." He said, "Oh, the convicts "are going to have their rights, and they are going "to show it on Sunday."

6602. Ought he to have had a full hour's exercise?—Yes, he did have the full hour's exercise. What happened was this. Previous to my going on leave, the days being long, the hour counted from the time the prisoner arrived on the ground until the time he left the ground; but in consequence of the shortening of the days in September or October, in my absence they found they could not carry that out, and they made it count from the time of the prisoner leaving his cell door to go out to the exercise ground to the time he got back to the cell door, a difference of two or three minutes.

6603. But what class of officers was it who was in charge of the convicts who so complained. Were they young men?—No, they were all old officers of years of service, specially picked out by me and put in charge of the convicts.

6604. Was there any investigation made?—Yes, immediately afterwards, and statements of evidence taken. It is in the records of the office that the prisoners were allowed to get out of hand, and that as regards that particular convict wing, there was no ground for saying it was because of young officers being there. There were a good many young officers in the prison, but they were not employed in charge of convicts; I felt it was dangerous to put convicts in charge of young, inexperienced men, and I picked out the oldest and best officers in the prison for that.

6605. I am only putting this question to understand the whole thing, because there has been a good deal of talk about it. Are the reports extant so that we could see them if we wanted to?—I do not know. The Secretary of State has got a copy of my report, and the report of the Commissioners.

6606. With the evidence that was taken?—I do not know that they furnished that, but they could furnish it.

6607. Now about the question of the officers' hours. Has there been any inquiry into that recently?—In 1891, and that book was the result.

6608. That book contains minutes of evidence taken?—Yes, and the report of the Committee of which I was secretary. I will furnish the secretary with a copy of that.

6609. I will not trouble you about that. As regards elasticity your expression was that you were greatly in favour of rules, and you gave your reasons for it, because they prevented governors from feeling that things were cast upon them which they should not have to decide, and which relieved them from a great deal of difficulty; but is not it the case that since 1877 there has been a good deal less of what I may call differential treatment amongst prisoners than there was under the old system before that?—I think there has been rather uniformity of treatment.

6610. And less of differential treatment?—Yes.

6611. Supposing a man comes into prison, he is mere number so-and-so, is he not?—That is a popular idea outside, but, as a matter of fact, we always address a prisoner by his name. I never did address a prisoner as, say, number 420, but I have always known him as prisoner Jones, or prisoner Smith, or whatever his name may be.

6612. I meant it rather metaphorically when I suggested that a prisoner was called by the warder by his number, but supposing an educated man comes into prison, and he is subjected to the same rules of discipline in every way as a man who is perfectly illiterate, and who is of different habits of mind, is not it the fact that there is less tendency to make allowance for the difference in his condition and his association, and what I may call generally less elasticity in dealing with him than was the case under the old system?—I do not know much about the old system, but I may tell you that there is nothing so unequal as the punishment of imprisonment, and nothing can be so unequal. An educated gentleman commits some offence against the law, and he is sent to prison as a convicted criminal. The treatment which that man receives, and which the law lays down shall be the same for all convicted prisoners, is to him a million times more punishment than it is to a habitual criminal or a navvy. In the one case the man is brought to order and perhaps is better fed and clothed than he was outside, whilst in the other case the man is not only degraded socially and morally, but he has to go through that punishment. It is too dreadful to contemplate, but I fail to see how you can alter it.

6613. Do you think that in cases of that kind, some communication with properly selected visitors, and some means of occupying his mind might be added to the prisons conditions under which he serves his sentence?—I think the moment you begin that it will be at once felt by the public and by the other prisoners that are there two laws, one for an educated man and one for a poor man; and I think any feeling of that kind would be worse than anything that can arise under the present system.

6614. But you point to the fact of its being much severer?—That is the fault of the legislature and the fault of the sentence. It is not the fault of the administration of the prison.

6615. The prison rules cannot be different. You have to carry out the law?—Yes.

6616. (Mr. O'Connor.) You told us that some times in the absence of the Commissioners you act as a Commissioner?—I do certain routine work that would be performed by the Commissioners; nothing beyond that.

6617. What kind of work? Is it work for the Commissioners under the Act of Parliament, or is it merely routine work?—No, it is merely routine work; it is merely clerical work, but I exercise the functions of a Commissioner.

6618. You do nothing that would require legislative authorisation?—Nothing whatever.

6619. Then you told us you were in charge of the general registry of convicts?—Yes.

6620. Who keeps that register?—It is kept by a clerk.

6621. It is very important work?—Yes, it is very important work and very useful work, but I supervise it and am the responsible person for it.

6622. Is there any special allowance given for that special work?—To me?

6623. No, in the Estimates?—No, it is part of our routine work.

6624. Because I see an item of 100*l.* in the Estimates in connexion with it?—That is the Habitual Criminals Register; that is another thing altogether.

6625. Has it anything to do with you?—It is kept by the same clerk.

6626. What is his name?—The Registrar of Habitual Criminals is Sir Edmund Du Cane.

6627. Who is the clerk who looks after it?—Mr. Grace, assisted by two clerks.

6628. There is a special allowance made for that?—Yes, of 100*l.* a year.

6629. Who gets that 100*l.* a year?—Sir Edmund Du Cane.

6630. Not the clerk?—No, he gets his special pay as clerk of the registry.

6631. With regard to the distribution of prisoners as between the convict prisons and the local prisons, convicts are sent to some of the local prisons for nine months?—Yes.

6632. Can you suggest any advantages in continuing the system?—Well, I do not know really of any advantages; I do not know of any other prison to put them in.

6633. Take the case of women. You have enough accommodation in Woking, and I presume you will have in Aylesbury for all the female convicts?—I should say that with regard to the women with only two exceptions they all do go to Woking. The exceptions are Knutsford and Leeds. The women sentenced in those districts go to Knutsford and Leeds; all the prisoners go direct from the other local prisons immediately to the Woking prison to do both their separate confinement and their whole sentence.

6634. Is there any reason why they should not all go to Woking or to Aylesbury?—The accommodation at Woking is for about 800 at present, but the accommodation at the Aylesbury prison will be under 300, I think.

6635. Will that be sufficient for all the prisoners?—At this moment it may be.

6636. Assuming that Aylesbury will be sufficient for the female convict population, will they all be sent there?—I have no reason to say they will all be sent there, but I have no reason to say why they should not.

6637. Is there any reason why a portion of the female convicts should be sent to Knutsford rather than Woking or Aylesbury?—No; only for the sake of convenience it was thought the same system which prevailed as to men should apply to women. Now it has been reduced only to Leeds and Knutsford prisons.

6638. But the male convicts are sent to the local prisons?—They are all kept at the local prisons for nine months.

6639. I think you told us that with regard to one man who had committed some offence, your sentence on him was that he should not go to chapel for a week?—It was.

6640. You regarded that, and I suppose he regarded it as punishment?—He may have done so.

6641. You intended it to be such?—I intended it as a preventive measure, not as a punishment.

6642. These convicts who are in local prisons are some of them prisoners who go to chapel every day?—All prisoners go to chapel every day.

6643. Except the Catholics?—In convict prisons all Catholics go to chapel every day.

6644. Do the convicts who are in local prisons?—At Wormwood Scrubs they have a service every morning, and two on Sundays.

6645. Is that the only prison in which there are Catholic prisoners?—There are six prisons in which there are such convicts, and in some of them they do not have a daily service. That is attracting the attention of the Commissioners very much.

6646. The fact of these people not being able to go to chapel, is to them either a grievance or disadvantage, or loss of some kind?—They might try to make it so. Of course, anything is punishment which causes prisoners in separate confinement to lose the opportunity of being brought together.

6647. Have you ever heard that Catholics, in order to go to chapel, represent themselves as belonging to the Church of England?—No, that would not occur in convict prisons (and it is convict prisons I have been connected with), because at Wormwood Scrubs we had a daily service, and there was no reason for it.

6648. You have never heard that suggested?—Well, I know it has been suggested. When we had a number at Wormwood Scrubs, and when we kept at Pentonville only Protestants, and the Roman Catholics went to Millbank, many convicts used to declare themselves Roman Catholics, who were really Protestants, in order to go to Millbank to be under the governor there, who was supposed to be less strict than the governor at Pentonville. That I have often heard.

6649. When the prison rules are not complied with, whose duty is it to enforce them? For instance, with regard to accommodation, when reports come in from the governors of prisons that they have not the accommodation which the Act requires, when the weekly reports show that a large number of prisoners are in hand beyond what the prison can receive under the Act, whose duty is it at head-quarters to take steps to present that?—No governor represents that the accommodation is not up to that requirement, I have never known such a thing; but a governor does represent, when the prison becomes overcrowded, that he has not sufficient accommodation for the number of prisoners he is likely to have, and he asks for authority to remove some of those prisoners. That comes to me. I at once submit it to the Commissioners of Prisons, and recommend that authority be given to the governor to remove the prisoners, and that he be authorised to remove the prisoners if necessary. It comes from the Home Office, as a rule, but there is no case of a governor representing that he has not got the accommodation required by the Act.

6650. When the weekly returns of prisoners and accommodation comes in showing that the prisoners are in excess of the capacity of the prison, how is the paper dealt with?—If such a thing did occur, that paper goes to the Commissioners, and the governor would be at once called to account for not having represented it before, and told that he should have kept a margin of cells likely to meet all requirements. He would be called to account for not doing so.

6651. Have you seen the evidence of the Governor of Wandsworth?—I read it.

6652. With reference to Wandsworth weekly reports and the accommodation for the number of prisoners?—I have read that he said it occurred on six or five days.

6653. In successive years some times for several days?—Yes, the Governor at Wandsworth is an excellent man, but I attribute the fault to any governor who allows his prison population to be in excess of the number of cells.

Col. Garsia.

22 Nov. 1894.

6654. How is it dealt with when it is received?—Action is taken at once either by telegram or by letter if there is no pressure. Governors are told not to wait for a weekly return in many cases. We say: "You have come within 40, or such and such a "number, of your accommodation, and then you "should send in a list of prisoners for removal, and "you will be given a warrant, not to be acted on "unless you think it necessary, to remove prisoners "to an adjacent prison so as to be ready to have "accommodation for receiving prisoners."

6655. Would the records of your office enable you to put your hands upon the message or copy of a message which was sent to Wandsworth on the receipt of the returns referred to?—Will you tell me what year you refer to?

6656. In 1893 there was an excess for five days?—In what month?

6657. I am only asking for a record which is in the office, and the steps taken by the Governor?—I am only saying what took place when I was there; I cannot tell you of any occurrence which took place in 1893 when I was on leave. I can only tell you what my actual orders were.

6658. Of course under the best possible system there will be blots?—Yes.

6659. And as you say even with a man of 20 years' service whom you trusted well, you find that prison officials are not always free from blame. You have told us already that when a prisoner has got into trouble for assaulting or attempting to assault an officer he may become a marked man in prison and it is desirable to remove him. Supposing he does become a marked man, do not the regulations of the Governor protect him perfectly?—Yes, they do; I mean he would not be unfairly treated, but he would be always under a feeling that he did not get a chance. He would be more strictly looked after, no doubt, and he would be more liable to being reported for smaller offences. I do not say he would get more punishment, but I think probably that man's hand having been raised to strike an officer and he being incorrigible, that in that prison the officers would have every eye on him, and he would not be dealt with so leniently as a man who had not been so violent.

6660. It is quite possible that a man may consider himself to be a marked man in the prison?—Yes.

6661. In that event he might get into trouble in your prison, when perhaps he would not get into trouble at all in another prison?—Yes.

6662. That was the case with J. E., was not it, namely, he was at one prison constantly getting into trouble, and when he went to another prison he did not get into trouble at all?—I have no record of him after he left my charge. I have stated what my object was in getting him there. I understand it has been reported to the Committee that he was sent there because he was one of those who caused this riot. I say that is false, and that he was sent there on my recommendation.

6663. It is not stated on his record that he had any part in that outbreak?—No.

6664. You say this record is wrong in the matter of date?—That is not the date he committed the offence. That is the date he was tried for it.

6665. Then this record is wrong?—As regards the date being there; that date ought to be somewhere else.

6666. It is an important date; it is the 19th of December which was the day of the outbreak?—Yes, and as a matter of fact that is the day he was tried. That can be proved to you by the punishment book of the prison. I have it here, and I will turn to the 19th of December. Here it is: "J. E., December 19th."

6667. What is that date?—That is the date on which the offence was tried.

6668. Then this is right?—I want to show you this: that this is under the date the offence was committed, but it is really the date on which the visiting committee tried him. The punishment given was 10 days No. 2 punishment diet. It shows that the offence was reported on that day, the 19th, and it was dealt with by the visiting committee on that day.

6669. What is the date of the offence?—You will see that on the 12th December he committed that offence, which was breaking a piece of iron from an inspection plate and removing bricks from the cell. He meant to get out of the prison, and he was remanded for the visiting committee. Then on the 19th of December he was brought before the visiting committee.

6670. His offence is re-entered against him and dealt with on that day, but you will excuse me for saying that it is a totally different offence. It is: "When under punishment attempting to remove "bricks from his cell wall, forcing open the iron "shutters, and breaking three panes of glass?"—They were all the same offence on the same day.

6671. You seem to have many offences in the second which are not in the first. It is an extension of the original charge?—This is the charge written by an ignorant warder.

6672. Do you mean to give us to understand that a man is charged before the governor with a certain offence, that he is remanded for the visiting committee, and that then that offence is brought up with all sorts of additions?—That recorded charge is brought up before the committee.

6673. Which does not appear in the charge before the governor?—That is the gist of the charge which the governor of the prison proved before the visiting committee as the result of his inquiry.

6674. That is the same writing as this?—Yes.

6675. Was it the same ignorant warder?—The same warder copied it into the book. The governor elaborates the warder's charge according to what he finds in the evidence, and he has copies of the evidence made. He puts this charge in full before the visiting committee. That comes before the visiting committee and they take evidence on it and investigate it. If they find the charge not proved they say so.

6676. You hold that they are the same charge?—I know it, I am certain of it.

6677. It would not have struck me that it was the same. There appear to be two counts in the one and about five counts in the other?—I am certain it was the same offence.

6678. With regard to picking the mortar out of the brickwork, you say he was charged with breaking prison?—I said it ought to have been a charge of breaking prison. That is what we expect whenever a man attempts to tamper with the walls or any part of the structure. That is an attempt to break prison, but I put it in the words of what he did do and admonished him so as to give him a chance.

6679. You admonished him?—I did.

6680. That was a very mild punishment?—It was not a punishment at all.

6681. He had had in the same month 12 stripes with the birch, seven days in the punishment cell, and No. 1 punishment diet. After the punishment which I have just read to you your admonition was a very mild treatment?—Yes. May I explain to the Committee my object? It was that I found after the man had been punished so repeatedly that it was no good; and very often kindness may change it.

6682. You would not call it temporising with the prisoner?—No, I would not in that particular case. I call it stopping punishment and seeing what is the effect of a little kindness.

6683. You used the word "temporising" with prisoners in connexion with Captain Schuyler?—I said I considered that Captain Schuyler through want of experience of knowing how to deal with prisoners, not only occasionally, but systematically, did not punish as he ought to have done—not from wilfulness but from ignorance.

6684. And you use the case of this prisoner as illustrating it?—No, I use the case of another prisoner who had assaulted a prison officer, and who was dealt with by the ridiculous punishment of three days' stir-about diet for committing an assault on a prison warder. That was not the case of J. E. at all.

6685. With regard to punishments, do you know the number of punishments at Pentonville in the year ending 31st of March 1892?—I have not made any comparison. I have not gone into that because the conditions of the prison are totally different.

6686. Do you know the number at Wandsworth for the same period?—Exactly the same remark applies to Wandsworth. I may say that Wormwood Scrubs contains nothing but long sentence prisoners and half a dozen a day short sentence prisoners. Therefore, out of nearly 1,000 prisoners, 900 were long sentence prisoners. The mass of the men had been sentenced to penal servitude before. 260 were actually sentenced to penal servitude, and I should say of the remainder nine-tenths of them, or at all events a great many of them, are ex-convicts who would have been, under the old régime, in penal servitude. They are a class of themselves and require different management.

6687. I understood you to say that the long sentence men were, if anything, better behaved than the short sentence men?—They were kept up to the mark by proper discipline, not by relaxation.

6688. And you yourself are not in favour of giving unnecessary punishments?—I would rule by moral influence, if possible. I look upon punishment as a last resort.

6689. Then would you say that during the year in question the punishments at Wormwood Scrubs would be fewer or more than in prisons where they had larger numbers of local prisoners?—I should say probably more, for the reason that the ruling power at Wormwood Scrubs was changed three or four times during that year, which is a great disadvantage and misfortune, over which the Commissioners had no control. The governor was in bad health; I got into bad health, and they had nobody to send there but an inexperienced officer.

6690. Apart from the interference of the inexperienced officer, were not the punishments at Wormwood Scrubs very much more numerous than at other prisons?—I have no knowledge of it.

6691. I suggest to you that there were 3,298 punishments at Wormwood Scrubs for a population of under 1,000, and that there were only 1,436 punishments at Pentonville for a population of over 1,000?—What year is that?

6692. For the year ending the 31st of March 1892. At Wandsworth for a population almost the same as Wormwood Scrubs, there were only 3,225 punishments as against 3,298 at Wormwood Scrubs?—I say the reason for that is, that the populations of these prisons was so different. The conditions of the prison were completely different, so that I am not surprised to hear of what you tell me as to the great number in Wormwood Scrubs as compared with anywhere else.

6693. This record of J. E., I suppose you would say, does show a very considerable amount of punishment?—By the visiting committee.

6694. I did not say by whom, but it shows a considerable amount of punishment altogether. Look at it merely from the point of view of punishment in 12 months, and it is a very heavy record of punishment for one man?—It is a very heavy record of offence too.

6695. I suppose it is; but it is more than usually heavy punishment?—No; I have known other prisoners commit offences who have been just as incorrigible as he was. The average prisoner does not commit offences such as that, but you have a per-centage of prisoners who are incorrigible, and defy all law and order.

6696. He was incorrigible?—Yes. He was an old convict.

6697. Would it be within your authority to ask for a record of this man at Wandsworth after he left Wormwood Scrubs. Could you get it?—I can ask for it.

6698. The outbreak at Wormwood Scrubs was confined, if I understand you, to one block?—To one block occupied by convicts and the disturbance was by convicts alone.

6699. Would you explain how it was that the outbreak was confined to that one block if the cause which provoked it was a general cause extending over the whole administration of the building?—The convicts had a grievance themselves on certain points. They had been laxly dealt with. The officers had lost heart in their management. The prisoners had been allowed to communicate freely with each other, and they felt strongly against the officers because there had been a great many reports against them before I came back. Before I left in September the whole prison was quiet. It wants very little among that class of prisoners to set them ablaze.

6700. Then you knew when you went on leave on the 18th of September that that block was in an unsatisfactory state?—No, it was in a most satisfactory state.

6701. I thought you said it was so before you went away?—No, it was when I came back on the 12th of December.

6702. You are charged also I think with the equipment of the prisons in connexion with officers and the clerical staff?—I am consulted by the Commissioners on that point.

6703. With a diminution of the number of prisons will not you have upon your hands an unnecessary number of officials?—No, they may be absorbed.

6704. How do you absorb a larger staff in a smaller number of prisons?—People die and people retire, and when they die we do not fill up their vacancies until we bring it down to the established number.

6705. With a very rapid diminution of the number of prisons from 120, I think, to something like 50?—56 or 57.

6706. That would be less than half?—But that extends over a period of 17 years.

6707. It is a little less than half?—Yes, a little less than half.

6708. You have had some appointments during that 15 years?—Yes, a great number.

6709. You would not have lost by death and retirement 50 per cent. of your staff, especially if you kept feeding it for a number of years. Therefore, as you diminish the number of prisons you must have an accumulating number of officers in proportion to your prisons. Your staff will not be annually depleted at so great a rate as your prisons?—Well, you see, a great many of the prisons that have been closed have been such small prisons. We have closed no large prisons worth speaking about.

6710. But the diminution of prisons and the diminution of the need you have as regards a numerous staff will leave you utterly unable to provide promotion for your existing staff at the same rate that you did before?—I think the promotion is considerably increased, because before the prison officials were only promoted in the particular prison they belonged to; whereas promotion now is very general. Above the rank of warder promotion is general.

6711. In theory it would be so, but in fact is not it true that a very large number of your assistant warders are at their maximum and have been for a considerable time?—Yes, a good many of them are.

6712. Then there is a certain amount of block of promotion?—Yes. That is also a question that was well gone into by the departmental committee.

6713. You were asked by one of the Commissioners whether as a matter of fact you could not always get men to take the posts?—Yes, we can get any quantity of them.

6714. You thought that was a sufficient answer?—Yes, so far as it went.

6715. Do you know any post in the service which you could not fill on this principle for probably half the pay the office is now getting?—No.

6716. Do not you think you could get a prime minister for 2,500*l.* a year?—I think you could get an officer in the army for nothing.

Col. Garsia.
22 Nov. 1894.

6717. The argument is not so very convincing after all?—No, that was put into my mouth.

6718. Yes, I know it was, by Lord Rosebery?—Yes.

6719. Are you satisfied that the staff at Holloway prison is sufficient for all your requirements?—Yes, I think so, on the whole.

6720. From what prison do they bring the men to Newgate?—From Holloway. Holloway and Newgate are one for the purpose of accommodation.

6721. Have you ever had occasion to go to Newgate and to Holloway on the day when they bring down the prisoners from one to the other?—No, I have not visited them on that day.

6722. You have never taken stock of the number of officers in one and in the other?—No, but I have been very carefully into the question of the Holloway staff. It was on my recommendation that the staff was raised. I came to the conclusion that ordinarily the prison was properly officered.

6723. The reason I asked was, that I have myself done it, and if you will say the staff is sufficient you will enable me to appreciate what is and what is not a sufficient staff in your opinion?—Yes.

6724. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You have mentioned about your precaution against overcrowding. Has your attention been called to Newcastle prison?—Yes, I visited Newcastle prison last January.

6725. Do you know that, practically, it is always so full that there is no margin at all?—No, I should not have said so. If occasionally Newcastle prison has been represented as full, we would have removed them to Durham, I think; but it does not appear by the returns that it is overcrowded.

6726. Has not the return recently said that there is a margin of perhaps, one cell or two cells. You know Newcastle prison?—Yes.

6727. Do you think it is a satisfactory prison?—I consider it is the worst prison I have ever seen.

6728. How does it come that that was taken over by the Commissioners?—When the Commissioners took it over they had no choice, but they knew from the start that it was a bad prison. There were two prisons in the county, Morpeth and Newcastle, and the Commissioners proposed to keep the better prison of the two, Morpeth, and to close Newcastle; but there was great local opposition to that.

6729. Was Morpeth a better prison than Newcastle?—It was better locally situated. There was a great deal of opposition to the proposal, and a great number of conferences were held; there were propositions and schemes submitted, and the Commissioners were anxious to meet the Newcastle opposition by closing Morpeth which they afterwards did. They ought to have done away with this one at Newcastle, which was so bad. There was a difficulty about getting land except for a few years, and the cost of it was great. To make a long story short, going back to 1880 the compromise was that some little additions were made to the existing bad prison at Newcastle, which seemed to satisfy the requirements at the time.

6730. Were the cells ever certified under the old system?—Yes; they are dark.

6731. Are any steps being taken to replace them?—The matter is now under the active consideration of the Commissioners, I have no right to say so, but I think there will be a proposition submitted to the Secretary of State on the subject.

6732. Are any prison as bad as Newcastle?—There is no prison so bad as Newcastle. The only one that can be said from my experience of visiting prisons to be bad, but not nearly as bad as Newcastle, would be the female prison at York. That is exceptional, I will not say it is unsanitary, but it is dark. It is not nice. I say Newcastle is the worst prison you have got, and the Prison Commissioners would have been very glad long ago to have got rid of it.

6733. Has your attention been drawn to the fact of whether the effect of imprisonment as now practised is deterrent; whether, as regards the mass of the prisoners sent there on first convictions, it is so deterrent that the mass of them do not return again?—I have not taken particular notice of that.

6734. Would it be possible for us to have a return presented showing, we will say, in three separate years, at intervals of five years, the number of persons who have been convicted the first time who come again to prison?—I think we could get such a return.

6735. And a second form showing how many of those who have been convicted a second time or more, got re-convicted?—Within a given period?

6736. Taking three separate years; taking we will say 1874, 1884, and 1894; that is 10 years apart?—I could not tell you straight off whether our records would be enough for that because we should have to get a good deal of information as to that from the general register. As regard local prisons it would depend on the information we could get, and the number of prisoners whose records may have been destroyed or lost; but if you will put down the point for me I will promise to work it out as carefully as possible.

6737. In your present returns you have apparently the means of getting it?—We show the different convictions.

6738. It will be to tabulate them in fact in a different sort of way?—But I must tell you how we get them; and the way we get them is this: the different convictions are taken from the convictions proved in court, or which a man admits to. I do not know that it would be strictly reliable.

6739. I think presumably they would not be accurate, but it would be a fair approximation?—It would.

6740. And the returns being based on similar materials in each year we could form a fair idea as to whether we were making progress or going backwards?—Yes.

6741. I have taken a little pains about it myself, and I have come to the conclusion that taking 1870 and 1893 we have this; that while we had in 1870 the re-convictions of persons first convicted to the extent of 17·7, in 1893 it was 18·2. It would be rather upon those lines that I should like to see some return, so as to enable us to judge whether imprisonment is working satisfactorily or not?—Let me put it down so that I know exactly what is required.

6742. I will hand you a calculation that I have made, but I should like to go a little further as regards the persons who have been convicted oftener than once, and to ascertain whether the great mass of convicts do not come out of that class; and whether after they have been convicted a second time they are not constantly returning. That would bear very strongly on the question whether imprisonment is deterrent after a second conviction?—I do not think it is.

6743. The Chairman authorises me to ask you if you will give us such a return as that, and I will put in writing what I think will be the best form?—Yes.

6744. I think you seem rather in favour of strengthening the position of the visiting committees in the gaols?—Yes, I think that we cannot do too much to encourage the visiting committees.

6745. Could they be brought into actual association with the governor in carrying on the business of the gaol with advantage, being thus able in conjunction with the governor to assist the commissioners?—I look upon the commissioners as having taken the place of the old visiting committees. The latter now are the eyes and ears to advise the Secretary of State whether those concerned in the management of the prison are doing their work properly, and they moreover assist in the management of the prison by dealing with the judicial part of the work.

6746. In fact you think the position is exactly reversed from what it was, that whereas the inspectors used to be the eyes of the Secretary of State, now the inspectors have become the machinery to carry it out?—Yes, under the Commissioners; but I think it is as well that you should realise that the inspectors have no powers of punishment, and they have no powers of reward.

6747. And no powers of administration?—No; well you cannot have rival administrations, I think the visiting committees should have great powers of recommendation, which they have under the Act, and that every recommendation should go direct to the Secretary of State, as they do not recognise the commissioners to be over them, but rather to be under them.

6748. Do you think the inspectors visiting once a month as they do and coming from a distance have sufficient local knowledge to find out if anything is going astray in the gaol?—Well, as I said before, if the inspectors do their work properly and not perfunctorily; if they really look into everything they can see as to the cleanliness of a prison, the contentment of the prisoners, the work that is going on, and the books; and they could do this by less frequently visiting. I think also that in prisons governed by chief warders it is very essential to have somebody of superior rank coming there frequently to keep these people up to the mark. It is not so necessary in the London prisons as in others, because they have active visiting committees, but I think, taking it altogether, there is a use for the inspectors, and it would be a less expensive thing to the State if they had the assistance of visiting committees with local knowledge.

6749. I was rather thinking whether the visiting committee might not take up the position of the inspectors, and the inspectors took up their old functions of being the eyes of the Secretary of State?—I do not see how you could put the visiting committees under the commissioners appointed under the terms of this Act.

6750. Have you any experience within the last 16 years whether any prisons have been found slack in discipline where that has gone on for a considerable time without notice?—No, I will not say that. Of course, occasionally at prisons if the inspectors have considered that the old governors were failing they have retired without any pressure, and have felt they were too old for it.

6751. (Sir Algernon West.) You have the Civil Service limit of age, I suppose?—No; as regards men like myself who came in under the regular Civil Service, we are brought under the limit of age; but as to the old governors who were brought from the former authorities it has been ruled by the Law Officers and the Treasury that as there was no limit of age under the former authority they can go on for ever.

6752. Do you think, for instance, an inspector would find out whether fire drill was practised regularly?—The governor has to record it in his journal, and if he fails to do it the inspector should report it.

6753. You have never heard of such a thing not being done for a year or two?—I have not heard of it in my experience at convict prisons. I had to record it in my journal.

6754. Or such things as governors not being quite straight in their commercial relations, say, outside the prison, which would be well known to local authorities or local personages, but which inspectors might never discover?—I think there would be great advantages in having local people to help the Commissioners.

6755. Do not you think there is rather a danger in attempting to manage a great many independent establishments from London, and that you are not sufficiently acquainted with what my be commonly bruited about in the district?—There are such things as anonymous letters. A man in the prison service lives in a glass house, and he has so many rival interests occasionally to tread on, that he has not got too many friends, and if he makes the smallest trip an anonymous letter comes into the Commissioners which then becomes the subject of investigation. It is extraordinary how every now and then we find that to be the case.

6756. (Chairman.) Will you take this book in your hand (handing book to the witness). Mr. O'Connor asked you a question with regard to the prison punishment at Wandsworth and Wormwood Scrubs. I have just been looking at these figures and I do not quite understand them, because it appears if you will look at the year 1892 that the total number of offences at Wormwood Scrubs was 2,551 for the males. Adding up the first columns of prison restraints and prison punishments I get a total of 3,358?—This is a most difficult return to understand. It has puzzled a great many people to follow this return.

6757. There is another point that I do not quite understand; that is the different way in which the system appears to work at Wandsworth and at Wormwood Scrubs, because taking the figures for 1892 the offenders punished at Wandsworth amounted to 1,894 and the prison punishments to 2,326; and at Wormwood Scrubs you have this, that while the prison punishments amounted to 3,358, you have only 1,083 offenders punished, and it is the same in the year 1893 only more so?—At Wandsworth, and other short-sentence prisons, where the most of the prisoners are in for a few days or a few weeks, the opportunity for the same individual to repeatedly offend during his imprisonment is very limited. Many, by reason of the shortness of sentence, cannot be punished at all. A large number offend only once and are not punished, and thus you have a large number of offenders and a comparatively small number of punishments. At a long sentence prison like Wormwood Scrubs you have a large number of incorrigibles and of badly behaved prisoners who offend over and over again in one year, with the result that the number of offenders is less than in the short sentence prison of similar population, but the number of punishments is far greater. Take the case of J.E.—see how many times he was reported and punished in the year—look through this punishment book. You see here a prisoner H.M. reported and punished eight times in the sentence of a year or so. You get the same men over and over again, the one offender punished many times. Another point is the different systems of governors. For example, a not uncommon offence is stealing food from dinner tray or another prisoner's cell. For that offence one governor may award three days' bread and water, another governor three days stirabout diet in close confinement, another governor one day bread and water in close confinement and fined 2*d.*

The first counts as one offence one punishment.
„ second „ „ two punishments.
„ third „ „ three „

The first was undoubtedly the most severe. The comparison is not fair it is of no use.

6758. That brings me to the point I want to get at. Is it the fact that at Wormwood Scrubs you have a greater number of incorrigible offenders?—Yes, certainly you have; because the class of prisoners there are the worst type of men as shown by their long sentences. They are nine-tenths long sentence prisoners. Many of them are ex-convicts who would formerly have been sentenced to penal servitude, whilst now they get six months to two years hard labour, and have not the incentive to industry and good conduct which is given to penal servitude convicts.

6759. Then your evidence goes to show that there is no fair comparison between the two prisons?—None whatever.

6760. With regard to the prison industries, would you be in favour of reverting to the old system which obtained before the transfer, of giving premiums to prisoners for their work?—No, I do not think I would, but I would be in favour of giving a long sentence prisoner a better gratuity than he now gets.

6761. He should continue to earn a gratuity?—Yes, I think it is a great matter to let a prisoner have a little money when he goes out, particularly if he has been industrious; so that he can get a little chance of a start. That is why in my punishments I never touch a gratuity. Some governors fine prisoners out of their gratuities; but that is a thing I never would do.

Col. Garsia.
22 Nov. 1894.

I have been inclined to encourage them by letting them earn marks.

6762. Do you think it desirable to make any special allowance to the warders for training prisoners in industrial labour, and do you think it is desirable to employ a special class of warders who are skilled artisans, for instance ?—I think if you have shops to turn out an industry it is most desirable to have people who are competent to teach. As regards the question of recompense to the warders for superintending it, that is a very big question. We do not do it in convict prisons. Every warder who has charge of a party would see his instructions go inside the prisoners' cells, which would not the best thing for general supervision. Of course, if a warder is an artisan and is actually capable of giving instruction in the work, I think it would be well to give him some addition to make him take heart in his work and give him an interest in it.

6763. And if a warder acquires a degree of skill in teaching prisoners industrial work it might be desirable to recognise that by some extra payment ?—Of course the contention against that is that the warder is only a warder. He came in knowing he would be generally utilised, and that if he is not doing that he is doing something else. That is the contention of the Commissioners.

6764. With regard to carpet beating, that used to be done at Wormwood Scrubs, I think, for the Government Departments ?—No.

6765. At some other London prison ?—Yes, but not at Wormwood Scrubs ; not in my time.

6766. Why was it given up ?—I do not know. At Wormwood Scrubs, I may say, we used to have at one time a 25-acre field adjoining the prison that we used to cultivate when it was a convict prison and until it was made a local prison. That was a very good employment for the convicts there.

6767. (Sir Algernon West.) Supposing the classification which you are in favour of was carried out, and we will call it first offenders, though it is a distinct class, a star class, would you have any objection to that class earning some small wage which they might expend on prison luxuries ?—I think it is a very dangerous thing to start. It gives way to one's heart, but when you become intimately associated with prisons and prisoners, you realise what a danger it is.

6768. (Chairman.) Would you be in favour of the longer sentence prisoners in local prisons earning a remission of time ?—Well, of course, I do not see any reason against it. It is a question of policy. The machinery for doing it is there. In the case of a licence holder, a man sometimes comes back to prison or three months as a licence holder to perform part of his original sentence. By the Act he earns remission of that sentence to the extent of one-fourth, so that the machinery is there. It is applied in case of short convict sentences, and there is no reason why it should not be applied in the case of long sentence local prisoners. The question is whether it is politic. We know in the case of convicts that the judges, in sentencing them to penal servitude, know that a man will not do the whole of the sentence, but a lesser sentence of one-fourth. Now, if the same understanding goes on with the local prisons and if the sentencing authority knows that he will not do more than three-fourths of the period he is sentenced to, if he behaves himself well, I can see no objection, in that it is an incentive to good conduct.

6769. (Sir Algernon West.) Suppose at the present moment a man who is sentenced to three years' penal servitude is better off than a man who is sentenced to two years' hard labour ?—Distinctly. I have been told by prisoners that they would sooner get five years penal servitude than two years' imprisonment with hard labour. I have often been told that by prisoners.

6770. But how about the three years ?—He gets off nine months, and he gets a bigger gratuity than the long sentence local prisoner, and he gets only nine months in separate confinement. Then he gets out into association in the open air. We hear a great deal about the terrible silence in convict prisons, but in a convict prison, though silence is the nominal order of things, talking goes on about the work. We never punish them when they talk about work. If you put two men together, a bricklayer and a labourer, how can they work without talking ? They do talk, but we do not allow talking of a kind which would be demoralising or degrading, and if a man fights against that rule he is reported at once.

The witness withdrew.

Lieut.-Col. E. S. Milman.

Lieutenant-Colonel Everard Stepney Milman called and examined.

6771. (Chairman.) You are Governor of Holloway ?—I am.

6772. How long have you been there ?—15 years and a half.

6773. What was your previous service ?—I have been 20 years and a half in the prison service. I was four years in Monmouthshire ; a year at Leicester, where I had charge of two prisons, one the county and the other the borough prison, the latter containing soldiers, court martial prisoners ; and on the 1st of July 1879 I took charge of Holloway ; and in 1886 I also had the charge of Newgate given to me when the Clerkenwell House of Detention was broken up and removed to Holloway.

6774. So that you are responsible for Newgate now ?—I am responsible for Newgate now. I have prisoners there at this moment.

6775. Is Newgate ever crowded ?—No.

6776. There is plenty of room there ?—I have had it very nearly full. Once we had a very large Central Criminal Court Sessions. That was about three years ago, after the holidays at the end of September. That is generally the largest session, and Newgate is now a kind of chapel of ease to Holloway ; so that when I find that the numbers are large at Holloway, and there is likely to be an excess of population, I have the authority of the Commissioners to send the prisoners awaiting trial at the Central Criminal Court down to Newgate, and even prisoners from the North London Sessions if it should be in their week and not the Central Criminal Court week.

6777. The prisoners at Newgate are mostly remand cases, are they not ?—They are all the cases of those who are awaiting trial at the Central Criminal Court. As soon as they are sentenced I send them off to their different prisons. Sometimes they sleep a night at Newgate, because the warrant may be out late, and it would be difficult to send them in the winter late at night to such distant prisons as Wandsworth or Wormwood Scrubs, so that I keep them a night there. I have two vans down there. For instance, to take a case, there were five or six men sentenced to penal servitude last night, and the warrants were out to send them to Wormwood Scrubs, but I sent them to Wormwood Scrubs this morning.

6778. Are you satisfied with the treatment of the remand and unconvicted prisoners ?—Yes, I think on the whole we could not do much better.

6779. But they get the ordinary prison food ?—They get the ordinary prison food unless their friends make an arrangement with the taverns outside, to send them in private food. Sometimes they send in a dinner ; sometimes all three meals, and sometimes they send in a newspaper if they like.

6780. Otherwise they are subjected to what kind of treatment ?—The third class diet in the prison code.

6781. And all other restrictions ?—Yes. I do not think we are as strict with them as we should be with convicted prisoners. I think we treat them with all consideration possible under the unpleasant circumstances in which they are placed. Nearly all respectable men, unless they are in under a very heavy charge, get bail, and three-fourths of the prisoners I have are those that have probably been to prison before or belong to the lower criminal classes.

6782. The Act of 1877 says that special rules shall be made requiring their confinement in such a manner as to make it as little as possible oppressive, due regard being had only to their safe custody?—Yes.

6783. But they are not allowed to smoke?—No, they are not allowed to smoke.

6784. They are not allowed to have any particular comforts?—They are allowed a newspaper and the food that I told you of. They have no particular comfort unless they have special rooms. You see there is a paragraph there allowing prisoners to have a room specially furnished. I generally have about eight or ten of those prisoners who pay half-a-crown a week for their rooms, and 6*d.* a day besides. That is 6*s.* a week. The extra 6*d.* a day is for having a person to clean that special cell.

6785. So that persons who like to pay for it can secure superior accommodation?—Yes, I do it at once. It is put into the hands of the Visiting Committee, and the governor may do that in anticipation of the confirmation by the Visiting Committee. It is an ordinary cell, but it is better furnished.

6786. But that accommodation depends on whether a man has money enough to pay for it?—Yes.

6787. Does not that make rather an unequal distinction between a rich man and a poor man?—Well, the Act says that you shall give those who wish it, if you have special rooms, the opportunity of occupying a room on payment. Of course it is a distinction, and some people think that that distinction should be made, and that what is hardship to a gentleman is not such a great hardship to those who have been knocking about in Whitechapel.

6788. Have you any suggestion to make for improved accommodation there?—Not without great structural alterations. Without the expense of structural alterations, I do not see what else can be done We treat them as kindly and considerately and gently as we can. I teach my officers to do so. I very seldom have any complaints. A visiting magistrate comes round my prison every week, and goes round to all the cells, and asks the prisoners whether there are any complaints. It is a very rare thing for any prisoner to complain of his treatment in prison. He generally complains that his case has not been properly considered at the Police Court, but then the magistrate tells him he cannot interfere with that. He did not come about his case, but he came to ask whether he had any complaint to make about his treatment. I say it is very rare that there are any complaints.

6789. Have you had difficulties with regard to overcrowding at Holloway?—No. I think in August 1891, that is more than three years ago, and perhaps on a dozen previous occasions, I had prisoners sleeping in association—10 or 12 of them. They were in two rooms, each containing 12, and the prisoners I put there I selected from those who were going up to the police courts the next day. They were visited every hour or half hour by the night watchman and there were inspection lights in the doors. We could see what they did, and I never found there was very much trouble with them. They would talk up to a late hour perhaps, but they were told to go to sleep and there was no quarrelling or anything.

6790. There was no warder in the cell?—No.

6791. Where were these 10 or 12 men?—They were in two wings in the debtors' room—that I use for association for the debtors in the daytime. It never lasted more than a night, because I have got authority from the Commissioners to send my surplus men down to Newgate, but about six months ago Captain Stopford told me that I could send them at once to Newgate and let the Commissioners know afterwards, so that that makes me responsible that there should be no overcrowding, and if I find there is a large influx of prisoners from the police courts in the evening I should send them down in the van or in cabs to Newgate, but it very seldom occurs now. I had a case occur last Monday week. I had 88 male prisoners in that night, and 50 females. That brought me up to 418 male prisoners. Now I have not accommodation for much more than 400, but a good number of those men were in hospital. I suppose there were 16 in hospital, and I had to put 402 up in cells. I could do that in separate cells, so that they were not associated; but the next morning I sent about 50 prisoners down to Newgate, which prisoners were to be tried at the Central Criminal Court this week, so that I actually sent them down to Newgate six days before it was required they should be there. When I do that I give them an opportunity of communicating with their friends and solicitors, and they rather prefer their friends and solicitors to go to Newgate than to Holloway. But Newgate is rather gloomy; it is not so bright a place as Holloway; but I have no complaints about it.

6792. You are receiving prisoners very often up to 10 or 11 at night?—No, I receive prisoners up to about 8, or half-past 8, but not often after that. It is very exceptional after that. I think the matron said in her evidence that we had a case of the officers being kept up to about 11 o'clock at night dealing with the receptions that came in. When we have actually a large number of receptions, as some of them are, with 50 or 60 female prisoners, it takes some time to bathe them with the number of baths that we have, and to put them away in their cells. That keeps the officers up rather late, and makes their hours rather longer.

6793. Do you think the hours of your officers are too long?—I do.

6794. Do you think there is greater strain on the female warders or the male?—I think there is a greater strain on the women warders, because they have to deal at Holloway with those short sentence prisoners; and there is very little power over the short sentence prisoners, because they have no marks to lose and very low diet as well. I think the alteration in diet that has beea lately started will have some effect on the conduct of prisoners, for they will not have so much reason to complain of their diet. They used to complain of the diet of the stirabout, and if the doctor did not give them some extra diet they used to smash their windows, but I have had, comparatively speaking, little of that lately.

6795. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Is the stirabout done away with?—Yes. At least, there is an alternative diet, and the alternative is universally adopted by the prisoners. In all my experience in the prison service I have found the Indian meal rejected. I found the same in Monmouthshire and Leicestershire.

6796. Do the warders complain to you of their hours?—No, they do not complain, but I know the strain is very great on the warders at Holloway. For instance, they are at the courts all day long in the very responsible position of looking after prisoners in the dock, and sometimes after a long day at the sessions they have to take their turn at evening duty when they come home. I think that is too much for them.

6797. You have great difficulty, I suppose, in providing occupation for your short sentence prisoners?—Yes; we were making some soldiers' bed cases and Post Office bags, but I think I shall not be able to do much in that way with only three months' prisoners, and it is now ordered that I shall not keep prisoners who have got three months' sentences and over. So that I have all those short sentence people to deal with; and they are the most difficult people possible to deal with, because there is nothing to restrain them; but, on the whole, they behave very well. The misconduct is generally confined to from 12 to 20 shameless prisoners; the other women are generally very quiet.

6798. What is their occupation for the most part?—I shall have now to select from these short sentences about 40 for the kitchen and the laundry. They help in the female warders' quarters. I have 12 in the kitchen and 18 in the laundry.

Lieut.-Col. E. S. Milman.

22 Nov. 1894.

6799. Have not you any mill work and the treadwheel?—No.

6800. Not at all?—No, we have no treadwheel. The women are never put on a treadwheel anywhere.

6801. But the men prisoners?—I have no male convicted men, mine are all awaiting trial, with the exception of a few specially sent me from Pentonville for cleaning the vans.

6802. Do you have many old offenders amongst your short sentence prisoners?—A great many; they will come in over and over again. I think there is one old woman, "J. C." who, they say, has been convicted 260 times.

6803. Has she always been to Holloway?—Generally; but she has been to Chelmsford, too. She has been a very good old woman in prison. She behaves capitally when she is in prison as a rule. She is a very good needle woman.

6804. Is she now of weak intellect?—Not at all. She says she is a lady of good family, and has had a very good education, but she certainly does the needlework which is given her very well, and she is very polite when she is in prison; but she can get into a rage.

6805. (Mr. De Rutzen.) Do you ever have any convicts at Holloway?—Male?

6806. Yes, male?—No, I have no male convicts, except a dozen I have got from Pentonville, to help me in cleaning the vans, &c.

6807. Then, occasionally, you have convicts there, but they are borrowed from other places?—I borrow men, who have six months to complete their sentences, from Pentonville.

6808. How long are they kept at Holloway?—About six months; I get them from Pentonville for the purpose of cleaning the vans and using the fire-hose, and so on; because I cannot force men on remand to do these unpleasant duties; and on a cold morning, to go out and wash the vans and carts is a thing we cannot get the men who are awaiting trial to volunteer for.

6809. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) You mean convicted prisoners, not convicts?—Convicted male prisoners, but not convicts who have been sentenced to penal servitude. They are men who have got, perhaps, 18 months' imprisonment.

6810. Long sentence prisoners?—Yes, they have done about a year at Pentonville; and if they are fairly well behaved and able-bodied, they are sent to me by Mr. Manning, under warrant of the Commissioners, for the purposes I have mentioned; that is, to do a little labouring work on the ground, so as to use the fire-hose and practise it in case of fire, and to do things that you could not very well get done by the voluntary work of prisoners awaiting trial.

6811. (Chairman.) Would these be men of good conduct?—Yes, men of fairly good conduct that Mr. Manning selects for me and sends me from Pentonville, under warrant of the Secretary of State.

6812. And they are always fully employed?—Yes, they are always fully employed; there are three of them employed in the stores, and nine men on cleaning the vans, and these men also have to help in repairing the exercise grounds, and doing different odd jobs about the place, working as ordinary labourers, in fact.

6813. Apart from the old offenders who are in for drunkenness, and recurring convictions for drunkenness, do you have many old offenders there who are in for thieving, and other offences of that kind?—Yes.

6814. Who come in apparently for theft?—Yes, for anything under three months. You are talking of women, I think.

6815. And who you would call habitual criminals?—Yes, habitual criminals; those who, perhaps, have been in half a dozen times, or, at all events, more than once.

6816. And these women, I suppose, have very little regard for prison?—They have very little respect for anybody or anything, but they use very strong language when they are put out.

6817. These short sentences in prison do no good to them?—Very little good.

6818. Would you be in favour of a cumulative punishment for such an offence as that?—I think it would be very much better.

6819. Do you think that any further classification is desirable for female prisoners?—I do not see how we are to classify them for short sentences; they come in for from three days to three months.

6820. Could not you classify those who come in for first offences?—My good matron helps me in this, she places the first offenders alone in one gallery, as far as she can find it out.

6821. Would you be in favour of putting those who come in for drunkenness in a separate part of the prison or treating them differently from ordinary prisoners?—Yes; but of course that would require a great many structural additions to the prison, though it would be a good thing no doubt to separate those who are drunk and riotous and those who are thieves.

6822. There are some distinctions between the two?—Yes, some of the poor wretches cannot keep from drink. It is a mercy to keep them in prison, I think.

6823. You have read the evidence that has been given before this Committee by other governors?—Well I cannot honestly say that I have gone all through it, but I have seen a good deal of it.

6824. Have you any particular points of difference to call our attention to?—No, I think not; I do not think I can add much to the information they have given.

6825. You agree generally with the evidence they have given?—I agree generally with it. I have seen Mr. Manning's evidence, and I have seen some of Captain Helby's, I do not think I differ much from them.

6826. (Sir Algernon West.) What is the longest time you ever had a prisoner under remand?—Very nearly three months; between quarter sessions and quarter sessions. I must tell you that since they built the courts at Kingston in Surrey, they have established adjourned sessions, so that they have sessions every six weeks; but there are some sessions like the Croydon Borough, the Guildford Borough, and the West Ham Borough where the prisoners are tried every three months; and I always employ those men out of their cells as much as possible and give them every consideration I can if they are at all handy and well behaved.

6827. You have men, I think, sent to Holloway for contempt of court who practically are debtors?—Yes, I have usually 30 or 40 of them.

6828. These men, I take it, are men who can pay and will not pay?—Yes, they are half of them in for rates and half of them are sent from the County Court. That is virtually for contempt of court.

6829. Therefore, do you see, why a man who can pay and will not pay, should have the privileges now given to debtors? Why should not he be a common prisoner?—Well, you see, there are those who habitually pay their rates by staying in prison. I have some of those, and I think they had much better go to the prison side.

6830. Is not it subversive to the discipline of the prison to have these people about your prison?—No, I do not think so, they occupy a distinct part of the prison. I have them in pretty often and they walk about in the morning talking to one another. They are in association; they have their meals separately in their cells, but they walk out in the garden together.

6831. Why should not they be treated as criminals?—I think they ought to be.

6832. I have been told of the case of a man who was in for a debt of 9*s.* 6*d.* and who had a dinner brought to him which would cost more than 9*s.* 6*d.*?—That is an extreme case, but they do get dinners sent to them.

6833. You have no objection to them being treated as ordinary prisoners?—Some of them are very wretched creatures indeed, I think some of them take houses and fail in getting lodgers, and the wife lets them go to prison to pay the rates.

6834. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Are your cells at Newgate very much smaller in cubic capacity than at Holloway?—No, they are the same size; it is not such a very old prison.

6835. There is no objection to the use of the cell?—Not the least.

6836. Of the female prisoners you have got now, what number of them do you suppose are there on first convictions?—Well, I am afraid it is rather a shot, but I should say about one-fourth of them have not been in before.

6837. Then, practically, three-fourths of them are old offenders?—Yes, three-fourths of them are old offenders. Then besides those short sentences I have another set of women, some 50 or 60, namely, those on remand, or awaiting trial. The people you are asking about are those who mostly come from police courts and get short sentences; those who are awaiting trial will probably get penal servitude or long sentences, or be acquitted. Perhaps only only one-fourth of that 60 I am talking about would be old offenders, but of the short sentences about three-fourths.

6838. (Sir Algernon West.) In the case of Mrs. J. C. I suppose you would prefer some other treatment?—Could not she be sent to an inebriates' home?

6839. Supposing there were inebriate homes would not you prefer that immensely?—Yes, and she would too. I am not certain that she has not been in one and come out again.

6840. Then, of course, the sentences would necessarily be longer, because a year is the shortest time in which to effect a cure?—Yes.

6841. Do you suppose Mrs. J. C. could be cured in two years?—No, I do not think she will ever be cured. It is a very awful thing to say but drink has got too great hold upon her; and I suppose people treat her. I do not know whether you want me to say anything more about the officers' hours.

6842. (Chairman.) If you wish to give us any information, do so?—I have no information to give you I think beyond this, that it is a very great strain upon the officers being at court all day, and in turn to take up evening duty at Holloway or Newgate afterwards. It is true they have got some compensation in the way of a dinner allowance. They have to get their dinners away from home in the vicinity of the courts.

Lieut.-Col. E. S. Milman.

22 Nov. 1894.

6843. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Is your per-centage of officers higher than in other prisons?—Yes, than in other local prisons.

6844. It is specially calculated with a view to this?—It is calculated with a view to the sessions. I have nine officers allowed for Newgate, in addition I think to about five per cent.; and I do not find it is enough, because I had three sessions on Monday in this very week, the Central Criminal Court; the North London Sessions; and I had to send five officers to Kingston-on-Thames for the Surrey Sessions. I had 20 officers away from Holloway at the Sessions, and three away sick.

6845. Twenty were away on sessions duty, and your allowance in respect of sessions duty is only nine?—Yes, nine allowed for Newgate, but on the first two or three days of the sessions about 12 would have to be at Newgate from Holloway; the other sessions in progress at the same time would be provided for by the extra per-centage.

6846. (Chairman.) Then you could send to the Committee some figures with regard to your staff?—I can tell you that the average number of hours varies from 10 hours a day. Taking all the hours every day for a fortnight and dividing by 14, it is about 10 hours a day. Sometimes they are on for 12 hours a day and so on. They have an alternate Sunday to themselves, and an alternate Saturday afternoon, and taking all that into consideration and counting the hours they may be in bed in prison (that is those who have to sleep in in turn), they would have from 10 to 10½ working hours. (See Appendix VIII.)

6847. (Sir Algernon West.) Is that deducting time for meals?—That is actually deducting meals, and that continues every fortnight; and 10 hours is rather heavy continuously.

6848. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Is the duty of the warders in your prison heavier than in another prison owing to the quantity that come every day?—Yes, owing to the number of receptions. The receiving these prisoners from different police courts is very heavy as is also the bathing them.

6849. And the five per cent. of warders you are allowed is in excess of what other people have?—Yes.

6850. So that the duty of receiving them makes the work very heavy every day?—Yes.

The proceedings were adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, 23rd November, at 12 o'clock.

FOURTEENTH DAY.

Home Office, Whitehall.

Friday, 23rd November 1894.

PRESENT:

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HERBERT JOHN GLADSTONE, M.P. (CHAIRMAN).

The Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON EDWARD WEST, K.C.B.	ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Esq., M.P.
Sir JOHN EDWARD DORINGTON, Bart., M.P.	ALBERT DE RUTZEN, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis; and
JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, Esq., M.B., F.R.C.P.	Miss ELIZA ORME.
RICHARD BURDON HALDANE, Esq., Q.C., M.P.	JAMES GRANVILLE LEGGE, Esq., Secretary.

Mr. TALLACK called and examined.

Mr. Tallack.

23 Nov. 1894.

6851. (Chairman.) You are the Secretary to the Howard Association?—Yes.

6852. How long have you held that position?—Nearly 30 years, over 28 years.

6853. You have not been officially connected with the prison system I think?—No; I have visited a large number of prisons over and over again, and have studied the question, and have written several books on the subject and many papers. In particular a book entitled, "Penological and Preventive Principles, "with special Reference to Europe and America." [London, 1889], which has had a large circulation.

Mr. Tallack.

23 Nov. 1894.

6854. You are acquainted with the general objects of this Committee. I think you have something to say in the first instance upon the question of classification in prisons?—Yes.

6855. First with regard to the juveniles then?—We recognise with great satisfaction the action which has already been taken by several of the recent Home Secretaries, in doing away as much as possible with the imprisonment of children. We had a Deputation to this Office some years ago from the Howard Association asking Mr. Cross, who was then the Home Secretary, to do so, and since that time a good deal of progress has been made, but there is still more child imprisonment than there ought to be; and we hope to see, perhaps as a result of this Committee, that children are entirely removed from prison. An authority, who is still an authority to us, John Howard, said, "Boys should always be separated from other prisoners;" and he went so far as to add, "and indeed from one another." Of course that is an extreme statement, in view of the good that has been done by reformatories; at the same time I might say, even with regard to reformatories, and I mention it as bearing on the remark of John Howard, that the principle of classification needs to be carried further than hitherto, even with those institutions; for during the last few months the governor of one of our chief English prisons made this remark to me, "Reformatories are nests of crime." The governor of another prison said to me that reformatories are "vile places." Those are the opinions of two experts.

6856. The question of reformatories stands rather on a different basis, and the opinion of governors or principals is not necessarily conducive to elucidating the subject. Assuming that reformatories are or could be made to be desirable places for the detention of young people, should you be in favour of raising the limit of admission to reformatories from 16 to 18 years of age?—Assuming that there is more classification and that the reformatories are not large; when you have some of the lads from 16 to 18, there will be amongst them some of those who are most undesirable to be placed in communication with the others.

6857. Assuming that there is a proper classification in the reformatories, you would be in favour of that?—Yes.

6858. What is your definition of "juvenile"?—Well, I am not prepared to give any precise definition, because it is a very wide term, and has different definitions according to the object. For instance, the definition of "juvenile" for the Industrial Schools Act is from 12 to 14 years. According to its application under the Reformatories Act it is 16 years. I do not use the term "juvenile" myself in any particularly technical sense, because you cannot draw a hard and fast line between young persons. Some young persons are more precocious criminals at 13 than others at 17 or 18.

6859. Will you accept 16 as the limit?—I have not any strong opinion on the subject.

6860. Then I understand you have an opinion with regard to casuals?—Yes, but before we pass from juveniles may I invite the attention of the Committee to one or two important precedents?

6861. I think first I will ask you with regard to the casual offenders?—I here prefer the word "casual" instead of "first term offenders," because there are often cases like this: where a man commits one petty offence and then several years pass by before he commits another. It is hardly fair to consider such a person as an habitual offender, so that when I say "casual offenders" I mean to include either those who are first offenders or those with whom there has been a considerable interval since the last commission of crime. I think that this class should have separate prisons and generally be under prison conditions which, at first, might admit of some relaxation. There has been lately a considerable public demand for more of such relaxation. It has been considered by some (I allude now to the recent newspaper controversies) that our present system is too severe in some cases; but in those newspaper controversies there has not been sufficient distinction drawn between the casual and habitual offenders. As to the casual offenders, there is often ground for pity; with regard to the habitual offenders we must pity the community as well. With regard to the casual offenders we might relax some of the conditions, such as the plank bed and the penal dietary, which have given rise to some complaints; but relaxing such deterrent conditions for habitual offenders would require considerable hesitation.

6862. But is not there a danger if you make relaxation for the class you call "casual" that to a portion of them the prison would not have the deterrent effect it has now?—I am very desirous that we should retain the deterrent effect of prisons. Some gentlemen consider that we go too much now for deterrence; but it was rather with reference to the controversy that has really taken place in the newspapers that I suggested that if there are to be these relaxations, they should be confined to first offenders and casuals. We have already by recent legislation, in the First Offenders Act, and to some extent by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, recognised the claims of first offenders to special consideration. And we might carry that perhaps a little further now with regard to some other matters, because there is no doubt that the penal dietary, the very low No. 1 dietary, for persons who are committed, say, for a week, on bread and water, is very severe in some cases for persons who are already weakened by drunkenness and have an impaired and thoroughly bad constitution. So also as to the plank bed. We are advocates for separate treatment, and we believe that if separation is carried out in prison, that will be the main element of deterrence, and will enable other elements now relied on for deterrence, under a mixed system, a system of associated labour, to be dispensed with. You can safely dispense with such things as plank beds and treadwheels, provided you retain separation, but if we are to have association in prisons then we shall want to retain some of these tests. I most perfectly agree with you as to the importance of deterrence.

6863. Then coming to habitual offenders do you think that they should be kept as a class apart?—Yes. There are habitual offenders of two classes. There are habitual misdemeanants or petty offenders, and there are habitual criminals, those who have committed felonies and burglaries and serious crimes. Even for the habitual offenders, probably wings of our prisons might be devoted; but for the habitual criminals I think we should, in general, have separate prisons where there would be no confusion as to the mode of treatment. Also with regard to habitual offenders of both classes (misdemeanants and greater offenders) it is most important that we should have a more gradual and certain cumulation of penalty than we have. I am one of those who believe that the main desideratum in our criminal treatment now does not consist in any alteration in the prison system so much as in the system of sentences, and I have found veteran governors and others who agree with me in that. Last year, in this Office, I waited twice on Mr. Paulton, M.P., the Home Secretary's Private Secretary, and submitted to him a scheme of gradual cumulation which I have no doubt would be effective to habitual misdemeanants by adding, say a fortnight each time. Cumulation has fallen into disrepute in consequence of the system of cumulation by leaps and bounds which was approved some years ago by most excellent men, such as the Earl of Carnarvon, and others, under which system there were extreme jumps from two months' sentences to sentences of five years and seven years' penal servitude. Those were tremendous leaps. If we had a mild system of increase for misdemeanants, so that poor drunkards and other petty but habitual offenders should feel that every time the law grasped them there would be a little more pressure put upon them; and if those guilty of more serious offences than misdemeanours were met by an additional three months every time, I think it would do much good, and I believe that that is the main desideratum, now, for the improvement of our criminal system.

6864. With regard to these cumulations do you think it should consist altogether of imprisonment under existing rules, or would you have a system of detention?—It need not consist necessarily of imprisonment. It might consist also of conditional liberation. We have that in our indeterminate sentences in connection with the convict system. Then in connection with the juveniles, we might have systems of probation, especially for the younger ones. They have probation officers, and probation courts, in Massachussetts, and Australia, and New Zealand, and they are now agitating for them in Canada. We might allow some of these young offenders, and others, to be at liberty under the special superintendence of probation officers. I do not mean to say in every case, but I would combine it with our gradual increase of imprisonment, and if we had the system of cumulative sentences I am sure we should ultimately be able to apply the probation law, and it would lead to a great diminution of crime, because the present system of constant short sentences is admitted by all who have paid attention to the matter to be a failure in England, in Scotland, and everywhere else.

6865. Now passing to prison labour. You have said that you are against associated labour?—Yes, for this reason. In those countries where there is that system which is now contended for by some parties who desire the discontinuance of separation in prisons, and the introduction of labour in common, I find that such system of associated labour has failed. It is no novelty. It is the prevalent system in the United States of America, in France, in Italy, and in Canada, and in all those countries it has failed, wherever it has been tried.

6866. We have had it tried in our own convict prisons?—That introduces another question. Are our convict prisons wholly a success? I have been told over and over again by the officers of convict prisons that they consider the excess of association there is fraught with many mischiefs, and it confirms the principle in which we believe, that "evil communications corrupt good manners," whether in local prisons, in convict prisons, or anywhere else.

6867. We have not had that put forward yet. At any rate, we have the experience of our own convict prisons to go on, and we have certainly had it put forward strongly in evidence that association is desirable for prisoners?—However, both in my writings and here I say that I believe that in matters connected with crime and pauperism and everything else, the via media is the best course. Whilst I am a decided advocate of the separation of criminals from one another, I only believe in the separation of them from evil influences, and that is necessary in prisons; but I fully admit that for persons under long sentences, such as convicts, you must relax that rule, because you must with such, at least to a considerable extent, have labour on the land. It would be cruel to carry out complete separation with those. I believe that for the most part if you keep the ordinary run of offenders, who constitute 60 or 70 per cent. of criminals in separation up to one year, which is within the existing legal limit of two years, that that will answer the purpose. With regard to convict prisons it raises a large question as to whether we should not largely modify our system of dealing with convicts.

6868. Perhaps at present it would be as well to keep to the question of associated labour. Do not you think that it is desirable from the point of view of prison treatment that the occupation given to prisoners should take them out of themselves, and should teach them to lead natural lives and have natural thoughts. Do not you think that industrial labour whether in association or not per se is desirable for them?—To that question I answer yes and no. Most decidedly it is desirable that prisoners should have labour. They should be reformed by labour, but I believe that for the shorter terms labour is best in a cell, and for this reason. Where you have the men working together in prison workshops they do more work, but in addition to the element of contamination which comes in, though they do a good deal more work, they come into labour competition with the outside labourer, as they do especially in America and France, where the outside workers are now grievously complaining of the prison competition.

6869. I think we may leave that for the present?—Also they are not taught so well. In the Philadelphia and separate prison in America they particularly take credit for this thing. They say, "in our cells the man is taught "to make a whole shoe or to make a whole "garment," whereas in those prisons where the men work in large companies, many men being at the bench together, one man may learn how to make merely a buttonhole of a coat or part of the sole of a shoe, and he does not learn the whole trade. But such men also compete a great deal more with the outside worker when working together, than when working separately.

6870. We may leave the outside workers to take care of themselves at present, I think?—Very well.

6871. (Mr. O'Connor.) Has the witness seen the cells they work in in Philadelphia, and can he compare them with ours?—Yes, I have been over the Philadelphia prison, and in that particular prison the cells are larger; but generally, in America, the cells are too small.

6872. (Chairman.) I want to know what is your main objection to associated labour, putting aside the question of its possible interference with outside labour, and assuming that the labour is good of itself?—My main objection is, that it has been found not to be a success in those countries where it is most used, the countries I have named.

6873. But that, of course, depends on the conditions on which it is carried on, and it also depends, surely, on what classification of prisoners is adopted?—I have yet to learn that it can be carried on anywhere with success. When you take moral considerations especially into view, I have yet to learn that it can be carried on with the same success as separation under moderate conditions.

6874. You state a general objection that it has not been found to succeed in other countries. Now what is your particular objection to it?—My general objection is also a particular objection. If you have a lot of men, at any rate, of a criminal class, it is an evil to have them together. There are many poor creatures of the misdemeanant class that it might not do much harm to allow to be together, as I have seen them, both in this country and other countries; but where you have the criminal class specially together it is a primary necessity to keep to them from corrupting one another. And this applies also to certain classes of misdemeanants. Take, for instance, the class of prostitutes. The prostitutes in women's prisons would do harm to one another, or to other women who were not prostitutes, who might mix with them. There it is mainly the moral objection. I admit that you may have more pecuniary result from associated labour. There is no doubt of it, and that is why France, America, India, and other countries have so much associated labour in their prisons. It is more immediately profitable; but it is not profitable in the long run; and while you are thus manufacturing profitable goods you are also manufacturing criminals.

6875. Do not you think that natural hard work is the best thing to counteract the desire to contaminate other and more innocent people?—Naturally, hard work is most important; but this is a thing that is often forgotten; the whole conditions of a prison are unnatural. They are conditions which are materially different from outside society, where the good associate with the evil. The same conditions do not hold with imprisonment that hold in society, because imprisonment is not a natural system, in massing evil doers together apart from better people, as also in other respects.

Mr. Tallack.
23 Nov. 1894.

6876. Ought not it to be our object to make it a natural system and approximate it to the conditions outside?—That depends. A doctor to bring about a natural condition of the human body, may have to use means which are at present unnatural.

6877. Supposing you abolish associated work in prisons, what work would you put them to?—A variety. They could do better work than they often do now. That is no theory, for I have seen it in some of our English prisons, and also in Belgium, in Holland, and in Scandinavia. I have been over the Ghent prison in Belgium. I have visited Belgium two or three times. In one cell they may be making coats; in another they may be making boots, and in another they may be doing the clerkage of the prison. In some cells they may be cutting out patterns. There is no end to the variety of labour. It seems to me that you might do almost as much work in the cells as in association. I have seen a prisoner in one of the Belgian prisons with a blacksmith's forge in his cell.

6878. (Sir Algernon West.) I think the prison at Ghent is divided into aisles—into wings; and that the associated labour is carried out in each wing?—There are two prisons at Ghent. There is the Maison Centrale, the great prison which John Howard visited a hundred years ago, and also the local prison. But the Central Prison is divided into two portions, one of which is cellular and the other congregate. I would not advocate cellular employment for the life-sentenced prisoners.

6879. It is divided into eight aisles?—Yes.

6880. No doubt some prisoners are kept in cells?—Yes, a number of them.

6881. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) But those are all for the local prisoners?—No. There are some prisoners who were sent from other prisons, partly for the convenience of relieving those prisons.

6882. For short sentences?—No, not to the Central prison for short sentences. I saw one prisoner in the cellular part of Ghent Prison, who told me he had been kept for six years in separation.

6883. (Sir Algernon West.) I think six of these aisles out of the eight are used for what we should call here associated labour?—I believe they are. I might also mention the excellent Belgian prisons of St. Gilles and Louvain. Ghent is for life-sentence prisoners. I spoke when I was there to a prisoner who had been continuously in prison for over 30 years.

6884. Should you call that prison at Ghent what we should call a convict prison?—Yes, the central prison. We understand by "convicts" men with sentences of over two years.

6885. But they have got boys there. They have got two wings entirely devoted to boys?—It depends on the definition of a "convict." These boys may be there for long terms.

6886. It is not what we should call a convict?—It is somewhat mixed. It is not a matter for comparison.

6887. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) In the sense of long term prisoners it would be equivalent to a convict prison?—Yes.

6888. (Chairman.) Evidence has been given before us which shows that one of the great difficulties in prison is to find proper accommodation for this cellular work?—It is.

6889. And they say that if they are allowed to work in association, and if they receive a sufficient amount of money to enable them to do so, they will have less difficulty in finding work?—I fully admit that. There is a difficulty with regard to cellular work in prisons, and especially when you have very short sentences. Then, again, if you shut up men only for a few days or a week, over and over again, you cannot teach them any trade at all in a cell.

6890. I understand you that there is no difficulty in finding labour for these prisoners in the cells?—I was alluding to those who are in for a sufficient time to be taught a trade; say those who are in for three months at least.

6891. We are talking of local prisons in which there are a vast number of short sentence prisoners?—Yes, but also prisoners up to terms of two years.

6892. The per-centage of those prisoners is very small?—If we had this method of cumulation of sentences I spoke of, the number of those who are in for a very few days or weeks would soon decrease, and we should have comparatively more than we have now in for terms sufficiently long to enable them to be taught something.

6893. Then, of course, you will admit that there are considerable difficulties if you are to teach each man separately, inasmuch as a very large expenditure is at once set up?—Well, that has been recognised in other countries, such as Holland and Belgium, and they do not find it so very expensive, I believe.

6894. But obviously it must be very much more expensive to teach a number of men separately in their cells than to teach them collectively in a room?—That I admit, but it is more economical in the long run to diminish crime—that is the main object in view.

6895. That is assuming the superior benefits of working in cells as against working in association?—Yes; which we do assume by experience.

6896. Now with regard to visits, are you in favour of appointing lady visitors for female prisons?—Yes, we have advocated that for years, and we were very pleased to learn by the answer of the Home Secretary to Mr. Pickersgill, who put the question at our suggestion in the House of Commons lately, that in 29 out of 54 prisons in which women in England are confined, ladies are allowed to visit; and I hope this Committee will recommend that in all other prisons they may be allowed to visit also. I was at Leeds the other day, and I understood that no ladies were permitted to visit that prison. I mean at Armley. I think it is very important where there are women that they should have the advantage of lady visitors; in fact it is most important.

6897. Do you think the system of visits to prisoners should be further extended?—Yes, the prisons should be much more thrown open. Not only would I have the lady visitors permitted to go, but I think there may be with advantage much more visitation allowed to men and to all classes of prisoners. For example, it would be desirable, I think, to permit persons to lecture on such subjects as temperance and health. Even of the short term prisoners, how many are so ignorant that if you had intelligent and judicious persons, men and women who might be allowed to lecture to them, they would have their minds awakened by it. It would be one of the most reformatory and elevating elements we could have. Then also, as to the visits from the magistrates, I have received the most opposite opinions in the various prisons I have visited. In some cases I find the magistrates are most exemplary and do their duty thoroughly, under the Act of 1877, and in other places they say the magistrates do not take any interest in the prisons, and they do not seem to care, now that they have scarcely any power. I do not think it would be a bad idea if the precedent which was adopted partly at our suggestion in the convict prisons, of the Government appointing certain local unpaid visitors, were also adopted as to the local jails; and if the Government were to nominate from this central place, several special magistrates to take a more active part than the average justices do now, and with more power, I think it would be an advantage. Then also in view of the recent public outcry, I think it would be as well if representative bodies such as municipalties and county councils were allowed in future to appoint representatives to visit the prisons. I have been over most of the Scotch prisons this summer, and the public there have considerably more access to the prisons we have. They do appoint locally-elected representatives there, and I was told that with the exception of Edinburgh and Glasgow there is a very general amount of negligence in Scotland on the part of those appointed visitors; but at Inverness they have to go a long way, so also they have at Aberdeen and other parts of Scotland. I should like to hear of there being more prison visitors in England also, and of men as well as women being appointed by municipal and representative bodies. It would be desirable that the Government should ask some particular magistrates to take a more special interest in the prisons than their class now do, at any rate, in many prisons. Before we pass from that, I have lately had this suggestion made to me in several of our prisons by governors; that in regard to discipline, it would be a great improvement if, instead of a resident chaplain, or in addition to him, there were gentlemen—clergymen and ministers who have the care of outside congregations—to come to the prisoners. They would bring some freshness in with them; there would be more individuality about them; and they would enliven the prisoners so that they would not get so much into a groove. I have a high opinion of some of our prison chaplains, but I do think there is something in that suggestion that has been made to me by several of our governors who know what they are talking about; and there are many clergymen and ministers who, for an extra 50*l.* or 100*l.* a year, would be very glad to come into the prisons, and would bring in a deal of fresh air with them, both in a moral and an educational sense.

6898. Then passing to the officials in the prison, you are of opinion that a great deal depends upon the warders?—Yes, I think that that is one of the weakest points in our prisons at present. I have a very high opinion of our present prison administration, from General Du Cane downwards, and amongst the warders I have found some of the best men, and I could, if necessary, name some of them; but, at the same time, while there are some of the best practical Christians living in the prisons as warders, there are also some great brutes; and it is some of those brutes who have brought down on our prison service, from the top to the bottom, some of the complaints which have recently been raised in the newspapers and elsewhere. We do want something more than we have at present to be done with regard to this matter I think if we had a special Departmental Committee with some ladies on it—in view of the number of female prisoners we have—to give their special efforts to improving the class of warders, and raising them, it would be a good thing. A great deal has been said with regard to their selection, and there is so much to be said on both sides that I find one gets puzzled when one goes into it. Some say the present system of selection is a failure, some say it is an excellent system; but I think we might induce the warders to take much more interest in prison subjects. We might have them examined in handicrafts and skill, and so qualify them to be better instructors, and we might encourage both warders and other officers to hold periodical meetings. The German prison officers have annual meetings, and are encouraged by the Government to attend them. They have a "Prison Magazine;" and in Scandinavia there is a Prison Officers' Union, and the same in the United States. We have nothing of the sort; but if these things were encouraged by the Government they would wonderfully increase the tone and raise the spirits of the officers.

6899. A suggestion was made yesterday that certain prisons in certain parts of the country might be manned with people of great experience and highly trained competent head officials, and that then those prisons should be used as training schools?—I had jotted that very suggestion down to make to you, and I most cordially unite with it. I could name some of our existing prison governors who would make splendid trainers for warders. More than that, it is desirable to have a reserve body of warders, because at present, our prisons are much undermanned. That is admitted by the best officials. Although we have in some of the prisons more than the average of 5 per cent. of officers, yet it is insufficient, and the more you have congregated labour the more officers you will want. Thus, recently, in one prison I saw a boy going about, and there was one officer attending on him; and in another prison I saw a man on a ladder, and there was a special warder detailed to look after him. There are so many special matters now requiring extra warders, and owing to so much labour outside the cells, that if we had in several of our larger prisons a reserve body of warders, not only would that give facilities for the better training of warders, but it would also be a source of supply for prisons that are now too short of men.

6900. Then with reference to the class of men you get, a great deal depends on the terms you offer?—Yes, and it is better to offer good terms, because there is hardly an office which requires more care. We appoint excellent governors, but the men who come mostly in contact with the prisoners are the warders. It has been said, "Well, we can get plenty; these "men are paid as well as the average outside la- "bourers." That may be so, but the office of warder is so important morally and otherwise, and there is such a strain upon their tempers that it is well they should have better pay, or at any rate, better opportunities of promotion than they have at present. They want something to stimulate them more.

6901. Have you any opinion on the size of prisons?—Yes, I have had it remarked to me by veteran prison governors that in their opinion, with which I quite unite, we should have no prison for more than 500.

6902. What would you do with the existing large prisons?—Well, we might use parts of them. There are a number of prisons, I suppose, under the old system that are still not sold, and which are on hand. I apprehend that would not be a very formidable difficulty.

6903. By 500 do you mean 500 all told, whether men or women?—500 all told.

6904. But supposing you had 300 men and 200 women?—Practically you might have two separate prisons, one for the men and one for the women. I mean 500 men or 500 women, because a women's prison is practically a separate prison for many intents and purposes.

6905. Would you object to a prison of 1,000 supposing it was divided into 500 men and 500 women?—Not in that case, providing you had a good staff of officers for each. It would largely depend upon that. There are just two or three miscellaneous items which perhaps you will now permit me to speak a few words upon. One is as to the separation of weak-minded persons. Such prisoners under observation now in cells often have two other prisoners placed with them. I think that that requires consideration. There are very serious evils arising from putting two or three prisoners in a cell, and if persons really require observation, ought not they to be put in hospital cells? There have been cases in which there has been attempted murder in cells. In 1888, at Armley Gaol, Leeds, three prisoners being in one cell, one of them killed another; in 1890, at Derby, three prisoners were, for more than a week, in one cell together, one of them being insane, and charged with murder. The Howard Association had the matter brought under the Home Secretary's notice in Parliament by Sir R. Temple, Bart., on April 15th, 1890. Mr. Justice Hawkins, at the Derby Assizes, said, "Do you mean "to tell me that in this gaol persons awaiting their "trial are employed to take care of a madman who is "charged with murder. It is surprising that such a "state of things should be tolerated." This year, 1894, at Nuremburg, in Germany, there were three prisoners in one cell; two of them beat out the brains of the other. There is one other matter I wish to mention. In going about a number of prisons lately, I have observed that the cards which are on the prison cells have the prisoners' names upon them. Now, when you consider that, especially with partially associated labour, in some of our prisons, there are prisoners walking about all day who can see the names of those who are inside, and that the warders can also see the names; I think you will say that is wrong. These are, comparatively speaking, small items; but I think they deserve some little attention. It is not desirable that the prisoners' names should be on their cards outside their cells; their numbers are sufficient.

Mr. Tallack.

23 Nov. 1894.

6906. (Mr. O'Connor.) Is not that an exception?—I have seen it in several prisons lately, and in one case the governor complained to me about it, and doubted whether it was legal.

6907. In some prisons they do not do it?—They do it in some prisons, and in one particular prison the governor drew my attention to it, and said how much he objected to it.

6908. Is there any further point you wish to mention to the Committee?—Yes. In some of our prisons I should like to see more gaslight. Generally speaking, the prisons are excellently ventilated, but it would be well, I think, if some prisoners had more light. I believe in light and air everywhere, as much as possible, and also sunshine.

6909. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Artificial light or natural light?—Both, but more particularly the light at evening. There was one matter which was brought under my attention by a gentleman who has had a large experience of prisons; it is with regard to the examination of the medical candidates. He thought it was desirable that such an examination should be conducted by a medical man who is either a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians or of the Royal College of Surgeons, and who also has had some hospital appointment. That is a matter I am not competent to go into, but it has been brought under my attention by a gentleman who knows what he is talking about.

6910. Has there been examination hitherto at the prisons?—There are examinations. When medical gentlemen become candidates for appointments in prisons, of course, they have to undergo an examination.

6911. Are you sure of that?—I took care to explain that I merely spoke from what had been suggested to me by a person who is competent to give an opinion. I bring that before the Committee at his particular wish.

6912. I observe that in connection with warders you use the term "brutes." You said there were some brutes in London?—No, I did not say "in London." I said "in the service"; I said there were some brutes among them, but I particularly wish to limit that, because I have found splendid men amongst the warders.

6913. I should like to know whether you have had specific cases brought to your knowledge which prove the brutality?—I am referring now more to certain prisons and to certain confidential information which I had, and also I have had the admission from the prison governors themselves.

6914. Do you know of your own knowledge and your own experience of any such case?—I cannot say from my own experience, because I have never been a prisoner, but I have heard so from discharged prisoners.

6915. Then when you used the term "brutes" it was really not of your own knowledge, but because of things which have been told you, which may or may not have been true?—Yes, excepting this, that I have had very good authority in certain cases.

6916. We can understand that however carefully you select a body of men some of them may not be so careful as others?—Certainly.

6917. But "brutality" is a strong term to use?—Yes; but I limited it; I mentioned it as exceptional.

6918. (Chairman.) Perhaps you would give the Committee such justification as you can for the use of the term "brutality"?—From what one hears occasionally from discharged prisoners, and what one reads too frequently in the public journals (without for a moment attempting to tie oneself down to believe everything that does appear in the newspapers), I think we may fairly assume that there is reason for great improvement in the way in which prisoners are treated by some warders. I will put it in that way; and that there should be less harshness than there is on the part of warders in some cases.

6919. Have you in your mind any inquests that have been held in prison?—I was thinking more of inquests in convict prisons than in local gaols. There is another thing. I believe now it is usual to discharge prisoners before death, where there is serious disease in our local gaols, so that you cannot say anything about it in some cases, even if a man may have been harshly treated in prison. He may not have had enough food, or he may have suffered injury, but he goes out and dies outside, and therefore it cannot be brought home definitely. It is a subject on which one can only speak generally.

6920. Have you any specific inquests or inquiries in your own mind?—I allude to nothing specific, except what may be found on looking over various records. I prefer to put it generally in that way. There is room for improvement, as there is with all of us, I suppose, in many ways.

6921. With regard to convict prisons, have you had any special experience?—I have been to most of our convict prisons, at one time or another, and to some of them several times. I admit that there has been very great improvement in the convict system. I think that the appointment of unpaid visitors, in consequence of the recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Penal Servitude Acts, under Lord Kimberley some years ago, together with the facts which were brought out before that Royal Commission has been of great use. I have spoken about this on many occasions with convict officers, especially with the late Captain Harvey at Wormwood Scrubs, a most humane and able man, and he admitted to me that there was still need for a great extent of improvement; but it is a wide question.

6922. (Mr. O'Connor.) When was Captain Harvey at Wormwood Scrubs?—Several years ago. He had been at Milbank and Portsmouth before that; he had very large experience, and he was summoned three times to give evidence before the Penal Servitude Acts Commission. I had many conversations with him, and I used to look upon him as being one of my masters in instruction.

6923. (Mr. De Rutzen.) You suggested that visitors—ladies and lecturers—should be appointed. Would it not be a satisfactory thing that those visitors should be selected by the visiting justices, the chaplain, and the governor?—Yes, they ought to be carefully selected, because it is most important that they should be judicious visitors; there are visitors and visitors, and great harm might be done. As it is, I think great care is taken, and I think it is generally admitted by the prison officers themselves that so far as the visiting by ladies has been permitted it has been advantageous. I have met with exceptions, but generally prison governors have told me that they have found it very helpful to them.

6924. Yes; assuming that, which is no doubt perfectly true, but the visiting justices would have a better knowledge throughout the country of people's ability?—Yes, certainly.

6925. You say that you would have no objection to a prison if it contains 500 men and 500 women—that is 1,000 in all—because they would be under two different heads?—Yes.

6926. But what would be your objection to a prison that contained 1,000 if the staff was adequate?—Well, the staff being adequate it would still be under one governor, and the question is whether one governor, however able, can have that individual acquaintance with so many that he could have with the smaller numbers.

6927. The governor, of course, is one person, but then there would be the chaplain. I am assuming that the staff was sufficient for whatever was necessary, and, if so, would you have the same objection to 1,000?—I should rather put it in this way that it is preferable. I may admit that we have large prisons now of 1,000 or more men that are well administered, but I believe they would be better administered if they had only such numbers as that the governor and chaplain could have better individual acquaintance with them. Even if you have an assistant chaplain there is not generally a proportionate number of chaplains to the number of prisoners.

6928. But if one chaplain would do for 500 two chaplains would do for 1,000?—But would you say that one chaplain is really enough for 500 men.

6929. You would draw the line at 500, but assuming that the staff, whether of chaplains or not, was adequate, what would be the objection to a prison of 1,000?—I do not raise any insuperable objection, I merely put it this way, I think it is preferable to have the smaller numbers.

6930. You do not think there is any reason why it should not be 1,000, given a sufficient staff?—No, but I think it would be better to have the smaller numbers.

6931. You were speaking about the warders and the supervision as to the appointment of warders. Would your same remarks apply to the visiting justices being the parties to appoint the warders?—Yes, the greatest difficulty I have had in forming conclusions on this subject is the extent to which men of equal experience disagree. I have been told lately by gentlemen in the same position of authority and of veteran service, that on the one hand the appointments were better under the old county magistrates than they are now: and then on the other hand I have been told, and also by reliable authority, that there are less evils now on the part of warders than there were under the old system. This bears somewhat upon what I said about warders. The governor of one of our principal English prisons told me about three months ago that when he took over the prison in 1878 after the Act of 1877, in the first year after that Act he had to discharge or get discharged 18 warders from his own prison for drunkenness.

6932. (Mr. O'Connor.) Out of how many?—Out of one of our average county gaols.

6933. You do not know what the proportion was?—No, I could not say that off hand. In Scotland they had to discharge a large per-centage of their warders the first year after the new Prisons' Act was passed, but on the whole I do think that it would be an advantage that the local magistrates should have more power given to them than they have now with regard to such matters as these visitors.

6934. Would you have that as it is?—Yes, I believe on the whole the new Prisons' Act has been of great advantage, and that it has done away with various evils; but on the other hand it has been perhaps pushed rather too far and has had some disadvantages; and I should be glad to see some power restored to the visiting justices or other local authority in regard to such matters as these.

6935. If you say that you would not advocate the visiting justices having any further or greater power than they do with reference to the appointment of warders, in what direction would you suggest there should be increased powers given to them?—I merely gave the two opposite opinions I have had put before me. I should be glad if they had more power in the selection.

6936. In what direction would you extend the greater powers of the visiting justices?—For instance, that they might be put on some departmental committee; that they might have a greater share than they now have in deciding upon the selection of warders, and management of them; in looking after them; in stimulating them, and in endeavouring to raise their general tone. I think the services of many of our magistrates would be useful in that way. That raises another question. Our magistrates, at any rate, are many of them civilians, and many of our prison authorities are military men. Now the military idea of perfection is unthinking obedience, but in the prison service we want thinking obedience—we want more of the civilian mind which can originate. The military mind is trained not to originate, but simply to obey orders and go in a rut.

6937. You have had an opportunity of consulting with officials of all grades as well as with prisoners?—Yes, and I often say the Howard Association does not so much pretend to instruct practical men in their own business as to collect and diffuse their experiences, and so aid them to instruct one another.

6938. You have had occasion to discuss matters with governors, deputy-governors, chaplains, warders and prisoners?—Yes, all along my course.

6939. You said that you had heard from a number of excellent prison officers that the service and the staff was undermanned?—Yes.

6940. From your own observation would you say that that is true?—I think it is.

6941. Would it apply to local prisons or to convict prisons or to both. I was especially alluding to local prisons.

6942. But are there any particular prisons you can think of now more than others?—I should say to most of the prisons, especially the larger prisons. Then even the very construction of a prison will make a difference. In some of them, the wings or the different parts of the prison are more out of the way than in others.

6943. Some prisons from their construction would require a larger proportion of officers and staff than others?—Yes.

6944. In your intercourse with the subordinate officials have you ever heard them express dissatisfaction with the service in respect of promotion, pay, hours of work, or anything of that sort?—Yes, I have heard a good deal about that. Of course it is natural to most men to grumble.

6945. Do you think the complaints are well founded?—They were, but they admit that during the last few years they have been improved through the recent action of the Home Office on their behalf.

6946. But speaking at the present time do you think any of those complaints are well founded?—Some of them are. For example, I could name several prisons in which there is an inadequate supply of officers' quarters, where the men, in lieu of those quarters are allowed 3*s*. 6*d*. a week. Also the warders think they ought to have a better retiring allowance.

6947. Then there is a sense of grievance with regard to superannuations?—Yes.

6948. Is there anything that you have heard of with regard to promotion?—Well of course they would like to have better opportunities of more frequent promotion if possible.

6949. From what you know of these men do you say the service is at present congested in the matter of promotion.—Yes, I think it is.

6950. With regard to pay; you say it is important to get good men for these responsible duties; but do you think there is any ground for complaint with regard to the average rate of pay given to the great body of them?—It is not so much their present pay they object to, but it is looking forward to the inadequate amount they have to retire upon.

6951. That you have dealt with, but with regard to the present rate of pay you say there is no substantial ground for complaint?—Except with regard to the quarters where they get 3*s*. 6*d*. allowed them, and they actually have to pay 5*s*. or 6*s*. for the lodging that they get at a distance. That is a serious complaint with some of them.

6952. Then with regard to the length of work?—Yes, several of them complain; at least many of them complain that they have to sleep in the prison once or twice a week, and although they may not be called upon, they are liable to be called upon.

6953. From your own observation should you say that any number, however small or large of these men, are given to long hours of work?—I think on the whole that it would be better if they could be rather shortened, because the strain is so great on them; it is so dull.

Mr. Tallack.

23 Nov. 1894.

6954. Is there any room for dissatisfaction in any of the prisons at the length of hours?—I think the strain is too long; I think that it would be desirable to give them some advantage in that way, and shorter hours, in view of the special strain there is upon them.

6955. With regard to the warders some of whom are civilians and some of whom are military men, would you, from your own observation, say that one class is to be preferred to another, and if so which?—Each class has some advantages over the other. The military men are better disciplinarians. They have been accustomed to handle, or see handled, bodies of men, and they know how to do it better. I say that that the military officers are better for discipline.

6956. I am speaking of warders?—Yes, military warders.

6957. Would you prefer them for warders, ex-soldiers?—To a limited extent, but on the other hand I have generally understood civilians have a higher moral character than the soldiers; they have some knowledge of trades, and they have been more accustomed to think for themselves.

6958. You would be then in favour of a certain proportion of the warders being ex military men, but men selected for their good character?—Yes, but a minor proportion of them; I think the larger proportion should be civilians; that is the case generally in Scotland. There is less of the military element in Scotland than in England.

6959. I suppose you would say the purpose of imprisonment is to hold out an inducement to the prisoner as well as to his contemporaries not to repeat his offence?—Yes.

6960. It is no part of the purpose of imprisonment to cause a man to deteriorate eithsr physically, naturally, or morally?—Certainly not.

6961. The condition of imprisonment you say is non-natural?—Yes.

6962. And therefore in a prison the need for safeguards against deterioration I suppose is at least as great as it is outside?—I should say more so.

6963. I suppose the mischief of idleness and want of occupation would be as serious inside as outside?—Worse, I should think.

6964. Some occupations may be occupations for the limbs without affording occupation for the mind?—Yes.

6965. Such as oakum-picking?—I do not like oakum-picking. I have heard many complaints about it, both from officers and prisoners.

6966. Or the treadwheel?—That raises a difficult question if you ask about the treadwheel. Of course, with the treadwheel we may put such things as the crank or the plank bed. I do not think that the treadwheel, the crank, or the plank bed are necessary, provided you have the penal element of separation, but if you do not have the penal as well as reformatory element of separation you must have some such things as the crank or the treadwheel.

6967. I am not now dealing with the condition of the men as they are in isolation or in company, but merely for the moment with their occupation. Would you say an occupation which is simply physical, which affords no mental exercise or pabulum whatever, is satisfactory from the point of view you have put forward, namely, that the man should not be allowed to deteriorate intellectually?—It is not satisfactory from the point of reformation, but it may be satisfactory from the point of deterrence. Many governors have told me that if we had not such things as treadwheels we should be overwhelmed with beggars and vagabonds, and people who would come in for the sake of the superior comfort a prison affords except for those deterrent elements.

6868. You have told me you were in favour of isolation for as long a period as 12 months?—I do not like to use the term "isolation."

6969. That was my term, you say "separation"? Yes. I like the way in which Mrs. Fry put it when she said there should be entire separation from evil influences, but as many good influences brought to bear on the prisoner as possible.

6970. Do you think that this separation, if it were continued for so long a period as 12 months, would not have a deleterious effect opon a man's nervous system and upon his intellect?—I think it would if it were isolation, but not if it is such as the Howard Association has advocated. That is one reason why we advocate more visitation; that is, frequent visitation with employment, instruction, and labour, and similar alterations. It is not a mere theory, because it has been tried over and over again. Even in France, where they generally are opposed to separation, there was a Government Commission in 1875, and they, after going most thoroughly into the matter, and especially in reference to the extent of insanity in confinement, came to the conclusion to recommend the French Government to adopt the separate system for all prisoners up to 12 months. I fully admit separation is carried too far in Belgium; but if separation is not isolation I think it has every advantage.

6971. Do you think it is desirable to have more publicity with regard to what takes place inside prisons?—Yes, for the sake of the prison officers mainly; because at present there is a great deal of misapprehension about our prisons. I remember a prison officer remarking a few months ago upon this. He said, "I am in favour of throwing the prisons "open for our sakes. I believe it is for want of more "real knowledge on the part of the public as to what "our present administration is, that there are com-"plaints. It is for want of real knowledge and more "access to prisons, as we know that statements "have been made in the papers which are of a mis-"leading character."

6972. Then in the interests of the officers you would advocate more publicity?—Yes.

6973. Do you think it is at all necessary in the interest of the prisoners?—Decidedly; it would tend to make the officers more careful. Human nature everywhere needs checks, inside prisons as well as outside.

6974. I suppose you have not only heard those complaints about some of the warders being brutes, but you have believed it?—Yes, but some of them also are amongst the best men alive.

6975. Would you have any observation to offer with regard to the desirability or otherwise of having the public admitted when men are tried for serious prison offences which involve prolonged confinement in punishment cells or personal castigation?—I think that some rightly appointed representatives of the public might with advantage be introduced.

6976. Do you think that a prisoner is sufficiently protected in the way of defence in the trials which take place before the visiting justices?—It depends on the character of the officer. There are some of our prison governors who may be perfectly trusted, but occasionally, even among governors, you meet with men who can be too harsh. For instance, I heard from a prison governor that he knew the case of another prison governor who one morning said, "How is it "there are so few reports against the prisoners? I "hope there will be some reports against the officers, "because there are so few reports against the "prisoners."

6977. Was that recently?—I heard it recently, but whether it occurred recently I am not able to say.

6978. Do you think the visiting justices are, as a rule, men who would be likely to notice a variation between the original charge against a prisoner and the charge as presented to themselves?—I do not quite understand you.

6979. Do you think that the average visiting justice or the average member of a visiting committee would be keen enough to be on his guard against any variation between the charge as brought before themselves and the charge as originally made against the man. I will assume a case in which, say on the 14th of December, a certain charge is brought against a man, and he is brought up before the governor. I will assume that on the 19th of the same month that governor brings that man before the visiting committee on a charge which in terms is different from the original charge; do you think the average visiting committee would be keen enough to notice the discrepancy?—That is an exceedingly difficult question to answer.

6980. Do you think a man has sufficient defence before the visiting committee when he is charged with any serious misbehaviour entailing, perhaps, serious punishment?—I really feel it is difficult to answer such a question, because the visiting justices are a valuable body, but, of course, like every other body there are different kinds of men amongst them. Some of them take a keen interest in the work and others not so definite an interest.

6981. You are not prepared to give me a definite answer to that question?—No, I am unable to give a definite answer to it.

6982. (Miss Orme.) You spoke of the objection of your society to the imprisonment of juveniles, and you based it on that opinion of Howard's as to separation being necessary. Supposing a boy is sent to a prison and is kept entirely separate, not only from the other prisoners but from older boys, what objection have you to his being sent there?—Well, because generally boys in prison, at any rate hitherto, have not been kept separate. They have had more or less opportunity of mixing with those around them; but we should not recommend that the boys should be kept for long periods of separation. I was referring there to what might be termed criminal boys. I had a very interesting visit to Luxembourg Prison lately. It was a sort of House of Correction for boys, in which I saw what I have never seen in a regular prison before. They were under the care of two ladies, two Roman Catholic sisters of mercy, or two sisters of some sort. I was very much pleased with that prison.

6983. Supposing the arrangements in the prison were such as you approved, and the separation was complete, have you any objection to boys being sent for a short term to prison, say, while a reformatory is being selected for them?—Well, there is something in the very name of a prison which is disadvantageous. I think it would be better to have separate establishments for boys. We might give them the name of a reformatory. The less you send children to a place with the name of a prison the better, but if you do send them, by all means keep them separate from the others.

6984. Is your objection then a merely sentimental objection to a child going to a place called "prison"?—I do not think it is merely sentimental, because we know that what is called the prison stigma does attach to them. Whether it is sentimental or not, association of the child with the prison in the public mind, or memory, is fraught with real mischief, which is not at all sentimental.

6985. You mean in regard to getting occupation afterwards?—Yes.

6986. Supposing it were the law that children should never be sent to prison, but to these other places you have in your mind, would not the public attach the same meaning to these as to a prison. It would mean that the child was sentenced for a crime?—I do not think they would. The public associate the prison stigma with repulsive ideas derived from association with adult prisoners. Now the public does not associate such ideas with reformatories and industrial schools.

6987. But you have quoted some very strong opinions against some reformatories and the effect they have on children?—Yes.

6988. Do not you think if any member of the public was going to put a boy in a position of trust they would have the same feeling against employing a boy of that sort as a boy who had been in a well conducted prison?—I think they would, but at the same time, as a whole, reformatories are incomparably superior to prisons as they have been found for boys; because the boys have not merely had in past years association with other boys, but with men also.

6989. The boy must go to some place while the reformatory is being selected for him?—Yes.

6990. What is the place he should be kept in before going to a reformatory? Do you think there would be any difference in the effect on the public mind between a boy going to a place of detention or going to a well conducted prison?—I think there would be a difference in the public mind, because the public thinks of the ineradicable association with prisoners.

6991. You said you were in favour of some different treatment for first offenders and what you called casual offenders?—Yes.

6992. Have you formulated any method by which you would find out in the case of women whether a young woman is a first offender or a casual offender?—When I use the words "first offender" I mean a person who is brought up for the first time before the court.

6993. But supposing she appears in another part of the country under a different name?—Well, if the endeavours of the authorities to recognise and to register prisoner are thoroughly carried out, there will be very little of that.

6994. But do you think it at all possible to do this. I am speaking of young women who change their dress and their appearance from time to time. Do you think there is the least chance of being able to distinguish first offenders from casual offenders or habitual criminals?—In many cases there would not, but you have to take these cases generally. I think, generally, in most localities you would know who were first offenders.

6995. In large towns you think like Liverpool or Leeds?—I should think so; the police take photographs of them and so on, and are accustomed to observe, and also if you have the Bertillon method of recognising criminals, that will make it extremely difficult for anyone to escape recognition afterwards.

6996. Supposing these methods were not effective, and several young women managed to elude those investigations, and were not first offenders, do you consider they would do great harm by being put into a prison with those who were really first offenders?—Yes, if they were allowed to associate with them.

6997. And the suggestion you made was that there should be more association?—I think you must have misunderstood me. I said there might be some relaxation for these first offenders in some of the penal conditions there are now. They might have a less penal dietary. With regard to men, first offenders might be dispensed from the month's plank bed.

6998. You did not mean there should be more association?—No, I say the less prison association you have the better, always.

6999. You gave us one reason against associated labour, the disadvantage of a prisoner only learning a division of the labour, and not learning to make a whole article?—Yes.

7000. But if the associated room is conducted with a view of benefiting the prisoners, I suppose you would agree that it is not in the least degree impossible that each prisoner, if he is in for a sufficiently long sentence, might be taught to make the whole of the article, and each part of it?—Yes.

7001. It is not a necessary objection?—No.

7002. And, I suppose, if that were considered, the fact of the workmen working together and doing different parts of the article, would assist them to teach one another?—In some cases, I dare say.

7003. With regard to appointing clergymen and ministers, how would you propose to deal with the strong feeling there would be on the part of the public, at a member of one sect or another being appointed in a particular neighbourhood, where there are, say, an equal number of Noncomformists and Church of England people?—Well, I admit that is a very difficult question; this religious element is always very difficult. We hear so much now about it in connexion with the School Boards, but still one must trust

Mr. Tallack.

23 Nov. 1894.

something to the common sense of the community. There ought not to be any insuperable difficulty in finding good men of unsectarian views, or who would not press their sectarian views in the prisons.

7004. But you agree that if one minister in a locality was suggested for an appointment like that, especially with a salary of 50*l.* or 100*l.* a year, that there might be a very strong feeling on the part of other sects?—In American prisons in general they have not chaplains; they have gentlemen who are called "Moral Instructors;" they get over the difficulty that way.

7005. (Dr. Bridges.) Have you any personal experience of reformatories?—Very little.

7006. Your personal experience of reformatories is not large?—We have not directed much attention to them, because there is an excellent society in London that deals with reformatories.

7007. With regard to the size of prisons, I understood you to say that you thought 500 was as many as should be trusted to the care of one superintending officer?—Yes.

7008. Supposing a prison of 1,000, of which 500 were women and 500 men. On the existing system there would be one governor of the whole of that prison?—Yes, to a certain extent; but I presume that the lady governor or matron is practically the governor of her own prison.

7009. Under the superintendence, if necessary, of the governor?—Yes.

7010. And in that modified form, I understand, you do not object to as many as 1,000 being under the same governor?—I say we have prisons which are well administered on that system at present, but I think it is better to have smaller numbers.

7011. What views have you formed about the communication of prisoners with their friends?—That is a subject which I have not gone much into, because we have not heard any particular complaints on that point. I presume the existing arrangements are very fair.

7012. Have you come personally very much in contact with prisoners?—Not very much; it is more with prison officials than with prisoners. Sometimes discharged prisoners call upon me, and I have had conversations with them, and we have had letters and complaints; and sometimes I have been allowed to have conversations with the prisoners, but not generally.

7013. That was merely occasionally?—Yes.

7014. You would not say you have any very special knowledge of the personnel of prisoners?—No.

7015. You have not had any reason to form an opinion as to whether prisoners at local prisons are either above or below the average of intelligence or otherwise?—I should say that generally they are below it.

7016. That is from what you have been told, I suppose, by officers?—And also from the examples and judicial statistics given in regard to the amount of education and knowledge and ignorance.

7017. From general sources of information available to everybody, you have formed that opinion?—Yes.

7018. You are a very strong advocate, not for isolation, but for the system of separation as at present carried out?—I should rather say, better than as at present carried out, because our system in this country has been too nearly isolation, and it is still. I think if we had some of these modifications and a better system of visitation and of chaplains and warders, we should have had fewer complaints than we have had.

7019. May I put it in this way, that you are in favour of the existing system of separation as modified by intelligent and worthy persons coming into contact with prisoners to a greater extent than at present?—Exactly.

7020. Even so, a prisoner would be left, would not he, a very large part of every day by himself?—Well, that is to a certain extent desirable. For instance, for meditation and prayer, it is very desirable.

7021. The view has been expressed to us by one witness that from a medical point of view great harm results from a person in the physical mental condition of most prisoners being left for a very long time in separation?—Certainly, I think great harm has been done by extremes. I contend for the viâ media. If you carry out separation so as to become isolation, and particularly if you continue that isolation long, great mischief is done. Now for instance in Belgium——

7022. But speaking of our existing system in England first?—I think we have carried it too far. Many of our convicts are now distributed about in local gaols for nine months' separation. The convicts have nine months' separation in cells. It is too rigid at present, and I have mentioned this to General Du Cane before now, as well as having it in our reports. They might, at any rate, have two hours' exercise instead of one. They might have other alleviations. We have advocated a relaxation of the existing isolation, especially in such cases as this.

7023. You have been asked some questions with regard to prison labour. I understand you have a great objection to all forms of prison labour which would involve the prisoners acting together?—More particularly for sentences under one year.

7024. Has your attention been called to agricultural labour as one form of labour that might be useful for unskilled prisoners under short sentences?—Well, it is, as you are aware, adopted to a certain extent, if instead of agricultural labour you put horticultural labour.

7025. No, I did not mean horticultural labour. I meant agricultural labour. I meant hard digging labour?—That would be very advantageous provided you could have the means to do it. There are, for instance, some difficulties as to the probabilities of escape, and our present prisons have not the ground for it; but there is no doubt the cultivation and tillage of the land is a most excellent exercise under certain conditions. That, in my view, would be more applicable to the longer term prisoners than to the short term prisoners, but I do not think it is necessary for short term prisoners of weeks or months.

7026. In the case of people who come on repeatedly over and over again for short sentences so that they have something like a continuity of prison life broken by short intervals outside, what should you say to that form of labour?—It would be very desirable, I think for many of them, and if by our plan of gradual cumulation of sentence you had this, then as they became inveterate offenders there would be the opportunity of putting them to this sort of labour.

7027. You have expressed opinions as to prisoners under observation. Did you mean by that prisoners who are rather suspected of being weak in intelligence?—Yes, prisoners whom I recommended more for the hospital department of the prison than for the ordinary department.

7028. For prisoners under that mental condition which is not positively insane, but who are feeble-minded, do you think that such prisoners require in many cases employment when they are not physically unfit for employment?—The more employment you can give them the better.

7029. Do you think that such employment would be better in the open air than in a cell?—Yes; and it has been tried in some cases.

7030. (Sir J. E. Dorington.) Your answer in condemnation of reformatories is that they lead to an increase of crime?—No. I quoted that as the opinion of two officers whom I met recently. I have a high opinion of reformatories, but at the same time I say there is not at present sufficient classification. Those were remarks made to me by prison governors.

7031. Do you think they are justified by results?—I should hesitate to say so as a whole.

7032. Would you say that if 80 per cent. of children who go to reformatories turn out well, that is a bad result?—No, that would be an excellent result, and I am aware that that is given. At the same time I am not quite certain whether that return of 80 per cent. can be taken literally, because they may turn out well in the sense of not becoming criminals again, but whether they have not been demoralised by their intercourse with a number of bad lads is another question which is not affected by the return.

7033. Demoralisation not going to the extent of being criminal. They are kept out of the criminal class?—Yes.

7034. Do you think the returns are reliable?—I dare say they are with regard to their being kept from crime.

7035. But they may be demoralising in their nature?—Yes. Monsieur de Metz, of France, a great philanthropist, used to isolate his boys for a time, showing his view of the pernicious effect of association with regard to mixing bad lads together. He used to keep them for two or three weeks together in solitary confinement; and this brief solitary confinement would be useful for certain bad lads, though there is nothing like healthy out-door exercise for them in general.

7036. That could be done without sending them to prison?—Yes, the name of prison carries a stigma.

7037. You are aware that in prisons they do not get associated?—I should not like to say they are not associated now in some prisons, because there was, I remember a meeting of gentlemen in London last year, and there was a difference of opinion amongst some gaol chaplains on that very point. Some said that the boys were thoroughly separated now; others said that they were not.

7038. You said until lately they were not separated. Would that be 20 or 40 years ago?—No, I should say within the last three or four years.

7039. What alteration in the prison system has taken place in that time?—Home Secretaries during the last few years have taken much more pains to prevent the imprisonment of boys.

7040. But has there been any alteration in the treatment in prisons since 1865 as regards the isolation of children sent to prison?—I should say there has. The governors have been much more careful with regard to children lately than they were.

7041. Was not isolation much more strictly observed in prisons at one time than it is now?—It may have been with some.

7042. According to rule?—Perhaps so.

7043. In fact any of the prisons where the children were not isolated, would be a regularly conducted prison?—There has been so much elasticity all along with regard to carrying out separation in prisons, that one could not say positively. As a general rule the less you send them to prison the better.

7044. You have spoken of places of detention separate from prisons. Has it passed through your mind how that is practically to be carried out. Say a child is sent to a reformatory school in Cumberland, and that he is not to be sent to a prison, what place of detention would you send him to specially authorised to detain him?—It might have some such a name as "training-house" or "home." You must have, for a certain class of boy, something where he may be separated, but it need not be the name of a prison.

7045. I want to know how you will organise a sufficient number of places of detention to be available for all children throughout England. I will take the case of one from Cumberland, and one from Gloucester?—As at present we have prisons for adults for separate counties, so in Cumberland you might have at Penrith a house for juveniles which might be available for Northumberland and Cumberland.

7046. How large would that establishment have to be?—That would depend purely on the local population, and on the proportion of offenders in that parish.

7047. Supposing we say you get about one in a month?—Then it would be very easy. You would only want a very small establishment.

7048. But you would have to keep a governor, a matron, a house, and a cell. Is it practicable?—I think there would be a good deal more than one a month. In London, for instance, there will always be a large number of children who will require special care.

7049. In London it would be practicable?—Yes, it would in large places.

7050. Would you set up a small place in London for the children?—Yes. Only it would be desirable if we could give it some other name than a prison; something that should not be associated with the ordinary associations of a prison.

7051. Supposing we were to take the women's prison at Wandsworth—it is within the curtilage of the prison—and say that all children from reformatory schools should be sent there?—I am not advocating the doing away with reformatories.

7052. I quite understand you, but I am trying to find out what place of detention is practicable, not being a prison?—Such a place as I saw at Luxembourg which is called a "House of Correction," or a "training house," or something of that kind, where those two ladies were in charge of the boys. In Luxembourg the State takes the responsibility over juveniles up to 20 years of age, somewhat like the reformatories do now, and it places them out with farmers and tradesmen, but keeps control over them until they are 21 years old.

7053. That place at Luxembourg is an actual reformatory?—Yes, in fact but not in name.

7054. They are sent for a term?—Yes.

7055. It is a reformatory without liberty?—Yes.

7056. It is more of a reformatory than a prison, but they are sent for long terms?—Yes.

7057. It is very much like Parkhurst was when it started?—I dare say it is.

7058. That was a failure?—That was for young convicts, was it not?

7059. It was a Government reformatory for juveniles of the nature of a prison rather than of the nature of that of Monsieur de Metz?—But the fact of its being a Government reformatory purely, would be all sufficient to procure failure, because one of the greatest elements of success of reformatories, so far as they have been successful, has been the calling in the co-operation of volunteers outside the Government.

7060. You think that the short sentences which are now imposed are unfortunate?—Yes, because they fail; the same persons come back week after week.

7061. Have you followed out the figures at all of late years to show whether the effect of our imprisonment is satisfactory or unsatisfactory. For instance, have you at all followed this. The number of offences committed, I may say, has not materially diminished; perhaps it has rather increased, but a very much less number go to prison?—Yes.

7062. Magistrates treat their offenders a great deal more leniently than formerly?—Yes.

7063. Of the number who were actually sent to prison a first time do more come back a second time, than did formerly or less?—I should say, as a whole, a larger number of repeated offenders.

7064. I am trying to divide it into two categories. Of those who do go to prison a first time, which is very much less than used formerly to go to prison, do the larger proportion or the less proportion come back to prison a second time?—That I cannot say off hand. That depends on statistical returns which may or may not be correct. I cannot answer that question precisely in that way, but I will put it in this way. There is no doubt that we have now a vast amount of recurrence of crime caused by the exceedingly short sentences on habitual offenders, but the blame, I think, has been of late put down unjustly to our prisons instead of our sentences. It is like this. Supposing a doctor orders a patient to take a box of pills, and instead of doing so he only takes a single one, you must not complain of the doctor if the patient is not cured. Now, if many of these had been sent to prison for three or four months, that is for long enough to form good habits and eradicate bad ones, you might blame the present system.

7065. You have not followed the matter out with regard to the first convictions, but you have with regard to persons sent more than once to Holloway. There is a greater amount of recidivism than before?—Yes.

7066. Your society looks into that as a science?—Yes.

7067. But they have not followed it up to that particular extent. They take a general rather than a specific view of it?—Yes. I find statistics are so slippery. The longer I live, the less reliance I place on statistics.

7068. On what do you base your assumption that there is more crime and more recidivism now, if you cannot find figures to prove it?—Because we see every day and every week in the newspapers instances of its constant repetition. For instance, there was a woman, I think, at Tottenham the other day who had been committed for between 200 and 300 times. We are constantly coming, in the newspapers, across cases, of whom it is known that they have been sent to prison, not only scores, but hundreds of times.

7069. Are you quite certain that similar cases did not occur formerly and in as large a proportion?—I cannot answer with statistical accuracy offhand, but I have a general impression that when the sentences have been longer the evil has been a great deal less.

7070. Would you think it rather worth while to conduct an inquiry in that way and see whether the view you hold, which I myself think is correct, is really correct and can be supported by figures?—It would be interesting. I have contented myself with the chapter of actualities, in regard to the admitted number we have in prison. There is a gentleman, Dr. Sutherland, in Scotland, who is a thorough statistician, and he has brought it out lately that one-thirty-third of the Scotch prisoners are re-committed such a great number of times that this thirty-third part represents one-third of all the Scotch re-committals.

7071. That is one-third of the prisoners have been committed, say, 10 times and over?—Yes, and some of them more. At Glasgow and Dundee there are certain inveterate drunkards and prostitutes—little groups of say a dozen—and if you could only get hold of those and keep them in prison you would make an immense difference in the local statistics of crime. I have here a similar remark in a letter which was addressed to me by Mr. Justice Wills, some two or three years ago upon this subject. I sent him a copy of my book on "Penological and Preventive Principles," and this was his reply: "I "shall read with special interest that part of your "book ('Penological and Preventive Principles') "which deals with the question of sentences upon "habitual committers of small crimes, the difficulty of "dealing with whom is extreme. As a rule, I believe "they are never reclaimed. The things they do, "taken individually, are very small, and society is "not, after all, very much the worse off, by reason of "the mere loss. But commonly, such people not only "steal, themselves, but are centres of corruption; and "to regard simply the smallness of the individual "offence, is to see only a part of a complicated pro-"blem. On the other hand, except in extreme cases, "to send offenders to long terms of penal servitude "for very small matters, has something about it "which tends to revolt people and to direct the "sympathy of the public from the administration of "the law to the offender, and to make a sort of "martyr of one who is generally a very worthless "object; this is a very undesirable thing." That points to the necessity for cumulative sentences not merely on account of the crime per se, but because this sort of people are centres of corruption to others.

7072. Do you think that recidivision is more common in France than it is in England?—I should think, seriously, recidivision is more common in France.
